TO THE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTY

PRINCE, JAMES, BY THE

Grace of God, King of England, Scotland, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c.

In this generall joy of affectionate and loyall subjects, testified by their frequent confluence from all parts, longing for nothing so much as the full fruition of that beautiful starre, which lately upon the shutting in of the evening with us after our long Summers day, immediatly by his radiant beames mainteined still a twilight from the North, and within some few houres appeared bright shining above our Horizon, suffering neither the dark night and confused Chaos of Anarchie to overspread and subvert, nor the turbulent tempests and bloody broiles of factious sidings to trouble and pervert our State: I also, for my part could not stay behinde, but in testimony of semblable love and alle-geance shew my selfe; and withall, most humbly present unto your Highnesse, This Philosophie of PLUTARCH: which being first naturally bred in Greece; then, transplanted in Italie, France and other regions of the continent; after sundry Nativities, if I may so speake, reserved (not without some divine providence) unto these daies, is now in this our Iland newly come to light; ready both to congratulate your Majesties first entrie upon the inheritance of these Kingdomes, and desirous also to enjoy the benefit of that happy Horoscope and fortunate Ascendent, under which it was borne;
even the favourable aspect of your gracious countenance: by vertue whereof, it may not onely be marked to long life, feeble otherwise of it selfe, but also yeeld pleasure with profit to the English nation.

Vouchsafe therefore, my deere Lord and dread Sovereaine, to accept that now at my hands, whole & entire, which in part Trajanus the best Romaine Emperour that ever was, received sometime from the first Authour and Stock-father himselfe: Protect the same in English habit, whom in French attire Amiot dedicated to the late most Christian King: and deigne unto her no lesse favour and grace, than her yoonger sister, to wit, the History or Parallele Lives, hath already obtained: which being transported out of France into England by that woorthy Knight Sir Thomas North our countryman, was patronized by our late Sovereigne Lady of famous memory Elizabet. And the rather, for that considering the prerogative of birth-right, and the same accompanied with more variety and depth of knowledge, I may be bold to pronounce as much in her commendation, as the Poet wrote of Iupiter in comparifon of his brother Neptune:

ἢ μὲν ἀμφοτέρων οὐκ ἴσθ' ἡ δ' ἴα μέγας,
αἰὲν ἀντὶ πατρὸς γένηται, ὁ δ' αἰεὶ ἴδμεν.

Homer.
Iliad. r.

These regards, albeit they were sufficient motives in themselves to induce me, for to attempt none other patronage than the Name of my Liege Lord so gracious; nor to submit my labours to the censure of any person, before a King so judicious: yet was I more animated to enterprise the same, by the former experience that I had of a Princes benignity in that behalfe: what time as I consecrated my English Translation of the Romane Historie written by Titus Livius, unto the immortall memory of the said Noble and renowned Queene. Now, seeing that with her Realmes and Dominions, the best parts and gifts that were in her, be likewise hereditarily descended upon your roiall person, and the same multiplied in greater measure, proportionable to the dignity of sex, the addition of scepters and diademes, and the weighty charge of so puissant and populous an Empire; it were in me a grosse absurdity, if not meere impiety, to make any doubt of that excellent vertue of all others, whereby Princes come neereſt unto the Nature of God, whose Majesty beere upon earth they represent. To say nothing, how the world hath taken knowledge already, as well by your vertuous life and politicke regiment hitherto, as also by the prudent and religious designements delivered in those sage and learned Compositions of

OF THE NOV RITVRE AND EDVCATION OF CHILDREN.

The Summarie.

H E very title of this Treatise discovereth sufficiently the intention of the author; and whosoever he was that reduced these Maxims and mixt works of his into one entire volume, was well advised, and had great reason to range this present Discourse in the first and forme place: For unlesse our minds be framed unto vertue from our infancie, impossible it is that we should performe any worthy act so long as we live. Now, albeit Plutarck (as a mere Pagan) hath both in this booke and also in others ensuing, where he treateth of vertues and vices, left out the chiefe and principall thing, to wit, The Law of God and his Truth, (wherein he was altogether ignorant) yet never thelesse, these excellent precepts by him delivered like raies which proceed from the light of nature remaining still in the spirit and soule of man, as well to leave sinners inexcusable, as to shew how happie they be, who are guided by the heavenly light of holy Scripture; are able to commence action against those, who make profession in word how they embrace the true and soveraigne Good, but in deed and effect do annihilate, as much as lieth in them, the power and efficacie thereof.

Moreover, in this Treatise he proveth first of all, That the generation of infants ought in no wise to be defamed with the blot either of adulterie or drunkenness: Then, he entreteth into a discourse of their education: and after he hath shewed, that Nature, Reason & Usage ought to concur in their instruction he teacheth how & by whom they should be nurtured brought up and taught, where he reprovet sharply the sloth, ignorance and avarice of some fathers. And the better to declare the excellencie of these benefis, namely, good instruction, knowledge and vertue, which is the studie of Philosophie doth promise and reach, he compareth the same with all the greatest goods of the world: and so consequently setteth downe what vices especially they are to shun and avoid, who would be capable of sincere and true literature.

But before he proceedeth further, he describeth and limiteth how far forth children well borne and of good parentage should be urged and forced by compulsion; deciphering briefly the praises of morall Philosophie: and concluding withall, That the man is blessed, who is both helpfull to his neighbour as it becometh; and also good unto himselfe. All these points above rehearsed, when he hath enriched and embelished with similitudes, examples, apophegmes, and such like ornaments, he propoundeth divers rules pertinent to the institution of young children: which done, he passeth from tender child-hood to youthfull age, shewing what government there ought to be of young men: farre from whom, he banisheth and chaseth flatterers especially: and for a small conclusion discourses of the kinde behavior of fathers, and the good example that they are to give unto their children.

THE EDUCATION OF CHILDREN.

Asinmuch as we are to consider what may be sayd as touching the education of children free borne and descended from gentle blood, how and by what discipline they may become honest and virtuous, we shall perhaps treat hereof the better, if we begin at their very generation and nativitie. First and formost therefore, I would advise those who desire to be the fathers of such children, as may live another day in honour and reputation among men, not to match themselves and meddle with light women, common courtesans I meane, or private concubines. For a reproch this is that followeth a man all the dayes of his life, and a shamefull stain which by no meanes can be fetched out, if haply he be not come of a good father or good mother: neither is there any one thing that presenteth it selfe more readily unto his adversaries, and sooner is in their mouth when they are disposed to checke, taunt and revile, than to twit him with such parentage. In which regard, wisely sayd the Poët Euripides:

*When as the ground is not well laid as first, for our nativity;
With parents fault, men will upbraid
both us, and our posterity.*

A goodly treasure then have they who are well and honestly borne, when in the confidence and assurance thereof, they may be bold to beare their heads aloft, and speake their minds frankly wherefoever they come: and verily they of all others are to make the greatest account of this blessing, who wish to have faire issue of their bodies lawfully begotten. Certes, a thing it is that ordinarily daunteth and casteth downe the heart of a man, when he is privie to the baseness of his birth, and knoweth some defect, blemish and imperfection by his parents. Most truly therefore, and to the purpose right fity spake the same Poët:

*The privitie to fathers vice
or mothers fault reprochable,
Will him debase who otherwise
is haucie, stout and commendable.*

Whereas contrariwise, they that are known to be the children of noble and worthy parents, beare themselves highly, and are full of stomacke and generositie. In which conceit and loftie spirit it is reported, that Diaphantus the sonne of Themistocles, was wont to say, and that in the hearing of many, That whatsoever pleased him; the same also the people of Athens thought well of: for, that which I would have done, quoth he, my mother likewise sayth Yea unto it: what my mothers minde stands to, Themistocles my father will not gainsay it: and looke what likes Themistocles, the Athenians all are well contented therewith. Where by the way, the magnanimitie, 40 and brave mind of the Lacedemonians is highly to be praised, who condemned their king Archidamus in a great fine of money, for that he could finde in his heart to espouse a wife of little stature, alledging therewith a good reason: Because, say they, his meaning is to get, not a breed of Kings, but Kinglins, or divers Kings, to reigne over us.

Well, upon this first advertisement concerning children, there dependeth another, which they who wrote before us of the like argument, forgot not to set downe; and what is that? namely, That they who for procreation of children will come neere unto women, ought to meddle with them, either upon empty stomacks, and before they have drunke any wine at all, or at leastwise, after they have taken their wine in measure, and soberly: for such will proove commonly wine-bibbers and drunkards, who were engendered when their fathers were drunken: according 50 to that which Diogenes sayd upon a time unto a youth whom he saw beside himselfe, and farre overseene with drinke: My ladde, quoth he, thy father gat thee when he was drunke. And thus much may suffice for the generation of children.

As touching their nourture and education, whereof now I am to discourse: That which we are wont generally to say of all Arts and Sciences, the same we may be bolde to pronounce of vertue,

vertue, to wit, that to the accomplishment thereof, and to make a man perfectly virtuous, three things ought to concur, Nature, Reason and Viage. By reason, I understand doctrine and precepts: by usage, exercise and practise. The first beginnings we have from nature: progresse and proceeding come by teaching and instruction: exercise and practise is performed by diligence: And all three together bring forth the height of perfection. If any one of these faile, it cannot otherwise be, but that vertue also should have her defect and be maimed: For nature without learning is blind: Doctrine wanting the gift of nature is defectuous; and exercise void of the other twaine, imperfect. And verily, it fareth in this case much like as in Husbandrie and tillage of the earth. For first and formest requisite it is, that the ground be good: Secondly, 10 that the Husbandman be skillfull; and in the third place that the seed be cleane and well chosen. Semblably, Nature resembleth the soile: the Master who teacheth, representeth the labouring Husbandman; and last of all, the rules, precepts, admonitions and examples are compared to the seede. All these good meanes (I dare with confidence avouch) met together, and inspired their power into the mindes of these woorthy personages, who throughout the world are so renowned, Pythagoras as I meane, Socrates, Plato, and all the rest who have attained to a memorable name and immortall glorie. Blessed then is that man and entirely beloved of the gods, whose hap it is by their favor and grace to be furnished with all three. Now if any one be of this opinion, that those who are not endued with the gift of naturall wit, and yet have the helpes of true instruction and diligent exercise to the attaining of vertue, cannot by this meanes recover 20 and repaire the foresaid defect: Know he, that he is much deceived, and to say more truly, quite out of the way: for as idleness and negligence doth marre and corrupt the goodnesse of nature: so, the industrie and diligence of good erudition supplieth the defect, and correcteth the default thereof. Idle and slothfull persons (we see) are not able to compasse the things that be easie: whereas contrariwise by studie and travell, the greatest difficulties are achieved. Moreover, of what efficacie, and execution, diligence and labour is, a man may easily know by sundrie effects that are daily observed. For we do evidently perceive that drops of water falling upon the hard rocke, doe carve the same hollow: yron and brasie we see to weare and consume onely by continuall handling: The felines in chariot wheelles which by labour are bended and curbed, will not returne and be reduced againe, do what you can to their former straightnesse: Like as it is impossible by any device to set straight the crooked staves that Stage-players 30 goe withall. And evident it is, that whatsoever against nature, is by force and labour changed and redressed, becometh much better and more sure, than those things that continue in their owne kinde. But, are these the things onely wherein appeareth the power of studie and diligence? No verily. For there are an infinite number of other experiments, which proove the same most cleerely. Is there a peece of ground naturally good? Let it lie neglected, it becometh wilde and barrain: Yea, and the more rich and fertile that it is of it selfe, the more waste and fruitlesse it proveth for want of tillage and husbandry. Contrariwise, you shall see another plot hard, rough, and more stonie than it should be: which by good ordering and the careful hand of the husbandman, soone bringeth forth faire and goodly fruit. Again, what trees are 40 there which will not twine, grow crooked and proove fruitlesse, if good heed be not taken unto them? Whereas, if due regard be had, and that carefulnes employed about them which becometh, they beare fruit, and yeeld the same ripe in due season. Is there any body so found and able, but by neglect, riot, delicacie, and an evill habit or custome it will grow dull, feeble and unloftie, yea and fall into a misliking and consumption? On the other side, what complexion is there so faint and weak, which is not brought to great strength and perfection in the end, by continual travell and ordinary exercises? Are there any horses in the world, which if they be well handled and broken while they are colts, will not proove gentle in the end and suffer themselves easily to be mounted and manned? Contrariwise, let them remaine untamed in their youth: strong-headed, stiffnecked and unruly will they be alwaies after, and never fit for service. And why 50 should we marvell at these and such like matters, considering that many of the most savage and cruell beasts that be, are made gentle and familiar, yea and brought to hand by labour and paines taken about them? Well said therefore that Thessalian whosever he was, who being demanded, which Thessalians of all others were most dull and softest of spirit, Answered thus, Even they that have given over warfare. But what need we to stand longer upon this point? For certaine it is, that our manners and conditions are qualities imprinted in us by tract and continuance continuance of time: and whosoever saith that * Morall vertues are gotten by custome, in my conceit speaketh not amiss but to very great purpose. And therefore with one example and no more produced by Lycargus as touching this matter, I will knit up and conclude my discourse thereof. Lycargus, him I meane who established the lawes of the Lacedæmonians, tooke two whelpes of one litter, and nursing both from the same fire and damme: Those he caused to be nourished and brought up diversly, and unlike one to the other; that as the one proved a greedie and ravenous curie and full of shrewd turnes: so the other was given to hunting and minded nothing but to quest and follow the game. Now upon a certaine day afterwards, when the Lacedæmonians were met together in a frequent assembly, he spake unto them in this manner, My Masters, citizens of Lacedæmon, Of what importance to engender vertue in the hart of man, custome, nourture, discipline and education is, I will presently shew unto you by an evident demonstration: and with that he brought forth in the sight of them all, those two whelpes, and set directly before them a great platter of sopps in broth, and therewith let loose also a live hare: but behold, one of them followed immediately after the hare, but the other ranne straight to flap in the platter aforesaid. The Lacedæmonians wist not what to make of this, nor to what purpose he shewed unto them these two dogs before said, untill he brake out into this speech, These two dogs (quoth he) had one damme and the same fire, but being bred and brought up diversly, See how the one is become a greedy cur, and the other a kinde hound. And thus much may serve as touching custome and diversitie of education.

It were meete now in the next place to treat of the feeding and nourishing of infants newly borne. I hold it therefore convenient, that mothers reare their babes, and suckle them with their owne breasts: For feede them they will with greater affection, with more care and diligence, as loving them inwardly, and (as the proverbe saith) from their tender nailes, whereas milch nources and fostermothers carie not so kinde a hart unto their nourcelings, but rather a fained and counterfet affection, as being mercenarie and loving them indeed for hire onely and reward. Furthermore, even nature her selfe is sufficient to proove, that mothers ought to suckle and nourish those whom they have borne and brought into the world: For to this end hath the given to every living creature that bringeth forth yong, the foode of milke: and in great wisdom the divine providence hath furnished a woman with two teats for this purpose, that if happily she should be delivered of two twinnes at once, she might have likewise two fountaines of milke to yeeld nourishment for them both. Moreover, by this meane more kinde and loving they will be unto their children: and verily not without great reason: For this fellowship in feeding together is a bond that knitteth, or rather a wrest that straineth and stretcheth benevolence to the utmost. The experience whereof we may see even in the very brute and wilde beasts, which hardly are parted from their companie, with whom they have bene nourished, but still they love and move after them. Mothers therefore (as I have said) ought especially to endeavour and do their best for to be nources of their owne children, if it be possible. But in case they cannot, by reason either of some bodily infirmitie and indisposition that way (for so it may fall out) or that they have a desire and do make haft to be with childe againe, and to have more children: then a carefull eie and good regard would be had, not to entertaine those for nources and governesses that come next to hand, but to make choise of the very best and most honest that they can come by, and namely for faire conditions and good behavior, to choose Greekish women before any other. For like as the members and limmes of little infants, so soone as ever they be borne, are of necessity to be formed and fashioned, that afterwards they may grow straight and not crooked: even so, at the very first their harts and manners ought to be framed and set in order: For this first age of childhood is moist and soft, apt to receive any impression: whiles the heart is tender every lesson may be soone infilled into it, and quickly will take hold, whereas hard things are not so easie to be wrought and made soft. And as signets or seales will quickly take a print upon soft wax; so the tender hearts of yong children take readily the impression of whatsoever is taught them. In which regard, Plato that heavenly and divine Philosopher, seemeth unto me to have given a wise admonition for nources, when he warned them not to tell foolish tales, nor to use vaine speeches inconsiderately in the hearing of yong infants, for feare least at the first their minds might apprehend folly and conceive corrupt opinions. Semblably the Poet Phocylides seemeth to deliver sage counsaile in this behalfe when he saith:

 Ought to be taught things good and sage.*

Neither is this precept in any wise to be forgotten or passed by, That other children also who are either to attend upon them, whiles they be nourced and brought up, or to beare them companie and be fedde together with them, be chosen such as above all things are well manned and of good conditions: Then, that they speake the Greeke tongue naturally, and pronounce the same most plainly and distinctly, for feare, least if they sort with such feeders as either in language be barbarous, or in behaviour lewd and ungracious, they catch infection from them, and be tainted with their vices. For such old lawes and proverbes as these, are not so rife with our good reason, If thou converse and cohabite with a lame creature, thou wilt soone learne to limpe and halt thy selfe.

Now when children be grown to that age, wherein they are to be committed unto the charge of Tutors, Schoolemasters and governors: then, parents ought to have an especial care of their state, namely, under whom they set them to be trained up: least for want of good providence and foresight, they betray them into the hands of some vile slaves, base barbarians, vaine and light-headed persons. For most absurd and ridiculous is the practise of many men in this point: who if they have any servants more vertuous or better disposed than others, some of them they appoint to husbandry and tillage of their ground; others they make Masters of their ships. They employ them (I say) either in merchandise to be their factours, or as stewards of their house to receive and pay all; or else to be banquers, and so they trust them with the exchanging and turning of their monies. But if they meete with one slave among the rest that useth to be cuphotten, given to gluttony & belly cheere, or otherwise is untoward for any good service, him they set over their children to bring them up: Whereas indeed a governour over yong should be wel given, & of a right good nature himselfe, such an one as Phænx was, who had the breeding and education of Achilles. The principal point therefore and most important of all that hitherto hath bene alledged is this, That choise men be sought out for to be teachers & masters of our children; who live in good name and without challenge, whose cariage and behaviour is blameless; & who for their knowledge & experience of the world are the best that may be found. For surely the source & roote of all goodnes and honesty, is the good education and training up of our children in their tender age. And like as good husbandmen and gardeners are wont to pitch props & stakes close unto their yong plants, to stay them up and keepe them straight: even so, discrete and wise teachers plant good precepts and wholesome instructions round about their yong scholars, to the end that thereby, their manners may bud forth commendably, and be framed to the rule of vertue. But contrariwise, you shall have some fathers now adies, that deserve no better than to be spit at in their very faces; who either upon ignorance, or for want of experience, before any triall made of those masters, who are to have the conduct and charge of their children, commit them hand over head to the tuition of lewd persons, and such as beare shew and make profession of that which they are not. Neither were this absurditie altogether so grosse and ridiculous, if so be they faulted herein of mere simplicitie & default of foreknowledge. But here is the heights of their folly and errour, that themselves knowing otherwhiles the insufficiency, yea and the naughtines of some such Masters, better than they doe who advertise them thereof; yet for all that, they commit their children unto them, partly being overcome by the flatterie of claw-backes, and partly willing to gratifie some friends upon their kinde and earnest entreatie. Wherein they do much like for all the world to him, who lying verie sicke in bodie, for to content and satisfie a friend, leaveth an expert and learned physician who was able to cure him, and entertaineth another blind leech, who for want of skill and experience quickly killeth him: or else unto one who being at sea, forgoeth an excellent pilot whom he knoweth to be very skilfull, and for the love of a friend maketh choise of another that is most insufficient: O Jupiter and all the gods in Heaven! Is it possible that a man bearing the name of a father, should make more account of a friends request, than of the good education of his owne children? Which considered, had not that ancient Philosopher Crates (to make you) just occasion to say oftentimes, that if possibly he might, he would willingly mount to the highest place of the citie, and there cry out aloud in this manner: What meane you my Masters, and whether mine you headlong, carking and caring all that ever you can, to gather goods and take riches together as you doe whales in the mean time you make little or no reckoning at all of your children, children, unto whom you are to leave all your wealth? To which exclamation of his, I may adde thus much moreover, and say, That such fathers are like unto him that hath great regard of his shoe, but taketh no heed unto his foot. And verily, a man shall see many of these fathers, who upon a covetous minde, and a cold affection toward their owne children, are grown to this passe, that for to spare their purse, and ease themselves of charge, chuse men of no worth to teach them: which is as much as to seeke a good market where they may buy ignorance cheapest. Certes Aristippus said verie well to this purpose, when upon a time he prettily mocked such a father who had neither wit nor understanding, and jibed pleasantly with him in this manner: For when he demanded of him how much he would take for the training up and teaching of his sonne? He answered, An hundred crownes: A hundred crownes! quoth the father: by 10 Hercules I sweare, you aske too much out of the way; For with a hundred crownes I could buy a good slave. True quoth Aristippus againe, Lay out this hundred crownes so, you may have twaine, your sonne for one, and him whom you buy for the other. And is not this a follie of all follies, that ourles should use their yong infants to take meate and feed themselves with the right hand, yea and rebuke them if haply they put forth their left: and not to forecaft and give order that they may learne civility, and heare sage & holefom instructions? But what befalleth afterward to these good fathers, when they have first nourished their children badly, & then taught them as lowly? May I will tell you, When these children of theirs are growne to mans estate, and will not abide to heare of living orderly, and as it becommeth honest men: but contrariwise fall headlong into outrageous courses, and give themselves wholly to sensuality and servile pleasures: Then such fathers all repent for their negligence past, in taking no better order for their education: but all too late considering no good ensueeth thereupon: but contrariwise, the lewd pranks which they commit daily, augment their griefe of heart and cause them to languish in sorrow. For some of them they see to keepe companie with flatterers, parasites, and smellscats, the lowdest, basest, and most cursed wretches of all other, who serve for nothing but to corrupt, spoile, and marre youth: Others, to captivate and spend themselves upon harlots, queanes and common strumpets, proud and sumptuous in expence; the entertainment of whom is infinitely costly. Many of them consume all in delicate fare, and feeding a daintie and fine tooth: Many of them fall to dice, and with mumming and masking hazard all they have. And divers of them againe entangle themselves in other vices more hardy and adventurous, courting faire dames, 30 and making love to other mens wives: for which purpose they walke disguised in the night, like the franticke priests of Bacchus, to commit adulteries, buying sometimes one onely nights pleasure with the price of their life: Whereas if such as these had conversed before with any Philosopher, they would never have taken such waies as this, and give themselves to like vanities: but rather they would have turned over a new lease and learned a lesson of Diogenes, who in words not very civill and seemely, howbeit to the point not untruly, gave this counsell and said, Go thy waies to the Stewes (I advise thee) and enter into some brothell house, where thou maist know how the pleasure that costeth little or nothing, differeth not from that which is bought full secretly.

To knit up therefore all in one summe I will conclude, and this my conclusion ought 40 of right to bee esteemed for an oracle, rather than a simple counsell and admonition; That the beginning, mids, and ende of all these matters, lieth onely in virtuous nourture and honest education, which I avouch are the very meanes that be operative and powerfull for the attaining both of vertue and true happinesse. As for all other things which we count good in this world, are in comparison hereof, mortall, transitorie, small, and not worth the seeking after with such care and studie. Nobilitie, I confesse to be a goodly thing; but it is the gift of our ancestors. Riches who doubteth that they be gay and pretious matters? Howbeit, lying in the power of fortune onely, who taketh the same many times from those that possesse them, and giveth them away to such as never looke for them. Moreover, much wealth is the very marke whereat they thoo who are common cut purses, privie & domestically thieves, Sycophants and 50 promoters, and that which is most, the wickedest persons in the world oftentimes mete therewith. Glorie and honor be things venerable, howbeit uncertaine and mutable. Beautie is lovely and verie much desired, but it continueth a small while: Health is worth much, and yet you see how soone it changeth. Strength of body who wisteth not? but quickly it is decayed and gone, either by sickenes or yeeres: in so much, as whosoever vaunteth and beareth himselfe in his his able bodie, is greatly deceived, and commeth farre short of his reckoning: For what is mans force, compared with that of other beasts, I meane Elephants, Bulls and Lions? It is learning and knowledge onely, which in us is divine, heavenly and immortall. For in mans nature two parts there are to be considered of all other most principall, to wit, understanding and speech. And of these, understanding is as it were the maister that commandeth: Speech, the servant that obeyeth. Now the foresaid understanding is not exposed to the injurie of fortune: no flanders raised by Sycophants can take it away: Sicknesse hath no power to corrupt and destroy it; neither doth it decay or perish by olde age: For it is the onely thing that being in yeeres, waxeth yong and fresh. Length of time which doth diminish and impair all things else, addeth still 10 more knowledge to our understanding, the elder that we are. So violence of warre which in manner of a streame casteth downe and carrieth all away with it, is not able to make havocke and spoyle of knowledge and learning: that onely is not in danger thereof. And in my conceit, Stripo the Megarian Philosopher gave a most woorthy and memorable answer unto K. Demetrius, who having forced, sacked and rased the citie of Megara to the very foundation, demanded of him what losses he sustained in that generall lacking? None at all (quoth he) For warre can make no spoile of vertue. To which answer of his, accordeth and foundeth well the Apophthegme of Socrates, who (as I take it) being asked of Gorgias, what opinion he had of the great King and Monarch of the Persians in those daies, whether he deemed him Happie or no? I wot not (quoth he) how he is furnished with vertue and learning: as if he judged, that true 20 felicitie consisted in these two things, and not in the transitorie gifts of fortune.

But as my counsell and advice unto parents is, to hold nothing in the world more deere and pretious, then to traine up their children in good letters and vertuous manners: so I say againe, that they ought to have an eie unto that literature and institution which is found, pure and uncorrupt: furthermore, to sequester and withdraw their children as farre as possibly they can, from the vanitie and foolish desire to be seene and heard in the frequent and publicke assemblies of the people. For commonly we finde, that to please a multitude, is to displease the wiser sort. And that I speake truth herein Euripides giveth good testimonie in these verses:

*No siled tooing I have nor eloquence,
To speake in place of frequent audience:
Among my feeses and those in number few,
I love to give advise and make no shew:
For those whose speech doth please a multitude,
With learned men are foolishly bought and rude.*

For mine owne part, I observe those men who endeavour to speake to the appetite and pleasure of the base and vulgar sort, that ordinarily they become loose and dissolute persons, abandoned to all sensuality. And verily not without great apparance of reason: For if to gratifie and content others, they have no regard of honesty: more likelyhood there is a great deale, that for to do a pleasure to themselves, and feede their owne humour and appetite, they will forget all honor and devoir; yea and sooner give the reines to their owne delights, than follow the 40 streight rules of temperance and sobrietie.

But now, what good thing is there moreover, that we are to teach our children? and whereto should we advise them for to give their minds? A goodly matter no doubt it is to do nothing rashly, nor to speake a word unadvisedly: But (as the old Proverbe saith) whatsoever is faire and goodly, the same also is hard and difficult. As for these orations which be made extempore and without premeditation, they goe away with great facilitie, and are verie rash and full of vanitie: And such commonly as so speake, know not well either where to begin or when to make an end. Also, over and above other absurdities and faults which they commit, who are accustomed in this wise to parle at adventure, and to let their tooing runne at randome, know not how to keepe any meane or measure of speech, but fall into a marvellous superfluitie and excessive of wordes: Whereas on the contrarie side, when a man thinketh before hand what hee 50 should say, he will never overshoot him so farre as to passe beyond the bonds of temperate and proportionable language. Periles, as we have beene given to understand, being oftentimes called upon & importuned by the people, and that exprelly by name, for to deliver his opinion as touching a matter in question, would note so much as rise from his place, but excused himselfe and said, I am not provided to speake. Semblably Demosthenes, one who greatly affected the the said Pericles, and followed his steps in policy and managing of State affaires, being called by the Athenians to sit in counsell with them, & requested to give his advise in certain points, refused and made the same answer, saying, I have not yet thought upon it, neither am I prepared. But peradventure some man will say, this is an headles tale and a devised report received by tradition from hand to hand, and not grounded upon any certaine testimonie. Listen then, what he saith himselfe in that oration which he made against Midias, wherein he setteth evidently before our eyes, the profit that commeth by premeditation: For in one place thereof, these be his words: My Matters of Athens, I confesse plainly, and cannot denie or dissemble, that I have taken as much paines in composing of this oration as possibly I could: For an idle wretch I had bene if having suffred, and suffering still such indignities as these, I would not confider and studie before hand, what I had to say in reason concerning these matters. Neither alledge I this, as one who condemned altogether the promptitude and readinesse of the tongue, and the gift of utterance extempore, but the ordinary custome and exercise thereof in everie final matter, and of no great importance. For otherwhiles it is tolerable; provided alwaies that we use it so, as we would take a purging medicine. And to speake more plainly, my meaning is, that I would not have young men before they bee grown to mans age, for to speake ought without good advise and consideration. But after they bee well grounded and have gathered sufficient roote which may yeelede pithie speech, then if occasion be offered, and that they bee called unto it, I thinke it convenient, they should bee allowed to speake freely. For even as they who have benee fettered a long time and worne yrons on their feete, when they are loosed from their givies, cannot goe well at the first, because they have continued such a while with clogs at their heeles, but ever and anone are ready to trip and stumble: so it fareth with those that of long time have benee too long tied (as it were) and restrained of their libertie of speech: For if haply there be presented some matter, whereto they are to speake on a sudden, they will retaine still the same manner and forme of stile, and speake no otherwise than they did before with premeditation. Mary, to suffer young boies to make subitanie and inconsiderate orations, is the next way to bring them to vaine babling, and causeth them to utter many words altogether impertinent to the matter. It is reported that upon a time a vaine and foolish painter came to Apelles, and shewed him a picture, saying withall, This Image I drew thus and thus soone. I wot well (quoth Apelles) at the first sight, although thou saidst never a word that it was quickly painted and in halfe. And I marvell rather that thou hast not painted many more such in the same time. But to retorne againe to my former discourse which I began withall, as touching speech, like as I would give counsell to beware of glorious and brave words, and to avoide that manner of haughtie voice which becometh tragedies, and is meete for Theaters: So I advise and admonish againe to flie as much that kinde of language which is too finall and over-lowly: For that the one which is so loude and aloft, exceedeth civillitie: and the other that is as much beneath, bewrayeth overmuch fearfulness. Moreover, as the bodie ought not onely to be found and in health, but also in good plight and well liking: so our speech should be not onely cleere from sickness as it were and malady, but also strong and able: For that a thing that is found and safe only, we do but barely praise: whereas that which is hardy and adventurous, we admire and wonder at. That which I have said, as touching the tongue and speech, the same opinion I have of the heart and the disposition thereof. For I would not have a youth to be overbold and audacious: neither do I like of him, if he be too timorous and fearful: For as the one turneth in the end to presumption and impudencie; so the other into servile cowardise. But here lieth all the maiestie and cunning, as well in this as in all things else, namely, to cut even in the mids, and to hold the golden meane. And since I am entred thus far into the discourse as touching the literature and erudition of youth, before I proceed any farther, I will deliver mine opinion thereof generally in these termes: Namely, That to be able to speake of one thing and no more, is first and foremost in my conceit no small signe of ignorance. Then, I suppose that the exercise and practise thereof, soone bringeth facietie. And againe, I hold it impossible to continue evermore in the same: For so to be ever in one song, breedeth tediousnes, and soone a man is weary of it: whereas varietie is alwaies delectable both in this, and also in all other objects as well of the eie as the care. And therefore it behooveth, that a childe well descended and free borne, be not sufficed to want either the sight or the hearing of all those arts and liberall sciences, which are linked as it were and comprehended within one circle, and thereupon thereupon called Encycelia. i. Circular. These would I have him to runne through every one superficially, for a taste onely of them all: for as much as to attaine unto the perfection thereof were impossible. Yet so, as his chiefe and principall studie be employed in Philosophie: which opinion of mine I may very well confirme by a proper similitude. For all one it is, as if a man would say, a commendable thing it were to faile along the coasts, and see many a cite: but expedient and profitable to make abode and dwell in the best: and much like to that pleasant and pretie conceited speech of Bion the Philosopher, who said, That even as the lovers and wooers of Lady Penelope, when they could not enjoy the Mistresse herselfe, went in hand with her waiting maidens, and companied with them: so, as are not able to attaine unto Philosophie, spend and consume themselves in the studie of other Arts, which in comparison of it are nothing worth. And therefore we ought to make this account, that Philosophie is the principall head (as it were) of all other learning and knowledge whatsoever. True it is, that for the maintenance and preservation of the body, men have devised two Arts, to wit, Physicke and bodily exercise: of which twaine, the one procureth health; the other addeth thereto a good habitude and strong constitution: but for the infirmities and maladies of the soule, there is no other physicke but onely Philosophie: For by the means of it and together with it, we may know what is good, what is badde, what is honest and dishonest, what is just, and generally what to choise and what to refuse, how we ought to beare our selves towards the gods, and towards our parents, what our demeanour should bee without our elders, what regard we are to have of lawes, what our cariage must be to strangers, to superiours: how we are to converse with our friends, In what sort we ought to demeanour our selves towards our children and wives, and finally, what behaviour it becometh us to shew unto our servants and familie: For as much as our dutie is to worship and adore the gods, to honour our parents, to reverence our ancients, to obey the lawes, to give place unto our superiours and betters, to love our friends, to use our wives chastly and with moderation: to be kinde and affectionate to our children, and not to be outrageous with our servants, nor to tyrannize over them. But the principall and chiefe of all is this, not to shew our selves over joious and merrie in prosperitie, nor yet exceeding heave and sad in adversitie: not in pleasures and delight dissolute, nor in anger furious, and transported or rather transformed into brutish beasts by choler. And these I esteeme to be the soveraigne fruits that are to be gathered and gotten by Philosophie. For to carrie a generous and noble heart in prosperitie, is the part of a brave minded man: to live without envie and malice, is the signe of a good and tractable nature: to overcome pleasures by the guidance of reason, is the act of wise and sage men: and to bridle and restraime choler, is a mastery that every one cannot skill of: But the height of perfection in my judgement those onely attaine unto, who are able to joine and intermingle the politicke government of weale publike with the profession and studie of Philosophie: For by this means (I suppose) they may enjoy two of the best things in the world, to wit, the profit of the common weale by managing State affaires: and their owne good, living so as they doe in tranquillitie and repose of mind, by the means of Philosophie. For whereas there be amongst men three sorts of life, namely, Active, Contemplative, and Voluptuous: This last named, being dissolute, loose, and thrall to pleasures, is brutish, beastly, base and vile: The contemplative wanting the active is unprofitable: and the active, not participating with the speculation of Philosophie, committeth many absurd enormities, and wanteth ornaments to grace and beautifie it. In which regard, men must endeavour and assay as much as lieth in them both to deale in government of the State, and also to give their mindes to the studie of Philosophie, so farre forth as they have time, and publike affaires will permit. Thus governed in times past noble Pericles: thus ruled Archias the Tarentine: thus Dion the Syracusan, and Epaminondas of Thebes swaied the State where they lived; and both of them aswell the one as the other conversed familiarly with Plato. As touching the Institution of children in good literature, needlesse (I suppose) it is to write any more. This onely will I adde unto therest that hath benee said, which I suppose to be expedient or rather necessarie: namely, that they make no small account of the workes and bookes of the ancient Sages and Philosophers, but diligently collect and gather them together: so as they do it after the manner of good husbandmen: For as they doe make provision of such tooles as pertaine to Agriculture and husbandrie, not onely to keepe them in their possession, but also to use them accordingly: so this reckoning ought to be made, that the instruments and furniture of knowledge and learning, bee good bookes, if they

they be read and perused: For from thence as from a fountaine they may be sure to maintaine the same.

And here we are to forget the diligence that is to be employed in the bodily exercise of children: but to remember that they bee sent into the schooles of those masters who make profession of such feats, there to be trained and exercised sufficiently, as well for the straight and decent growth, as for the abilitie and strength of their bodies: For the fast knitting and strong complexion of the bodie in children, is a good foundation to make them another day decent and personable old men. And like as in time of a calme & faire season, they that are at sea, ought to make provision of necessarie meanes to withstand foule weather and a tempest: even so, verie meete it is, that tender age be furnished with temperance, sobrietie and continencie, and even sometimes reserve and lay up such voyage provision, for the better sustenance of old age. Howbeit in such order ought this labour and travell of children to be dispensed, that their bodies be not exhaust and dried up, and so by that meanes they themselves be overwearing, and made either unmeet or unwilling to follow their booke afresh and take their learning: For as Plato said very well, Sleepe and lassitude be enemies to learning. But why do I stand hereupon so much, being in comparison so small a matter?

Proceed I will therefore and make haste to that which is of greatest importance, and passeeth all the rest that hath beene said before: For this I say, that youth ought to be trained to militarie feats, namely, in launcing darts and javelins, in drawing a bow and shooting arrows, in chafing also and hunting wilde beasts. Forasmuch as all the goods of those who are vanquished in fight, be exposed as a prey and bootie to the conquerours: neither are they fit for warfare and to beare armes, whose bodies having beene daintily brought up in the shade and within house, are corpulent, and of a soft and delicate constitution.

*The leane and dry, the raw bone soldier force,
Who strain'd hath beene in armes and warlike toile,
In field wholer ankes of enemies will pierce,
And in the lists all his concurrents foile.*

But what may some men say unto me? Sir, you have made promise to give us examples and precepts, concerning the education of all children free borne and of honest parentage: and now, me thinks you neglect the education of commoners and poore mens children, and deliver no instructions but such as are for gentlemen, and be suitable to the rich and wealthie onely. To which objection, it is no hard matter to make answer. For mine owne part, my desire especially is, that this instruction of mine might serve all: but in case there be some, who for want of meanes cannot make that use and profit which I could wish, let them lay the weight upon fortune, and not blame him who hath given them his advice and counsell in these points. And yet for poore men thus much will I say, Let them endeavour and straine themselves to the utmost of their power, to bring up their children in the best manner: and if they cannot reach unto that, yet must they aime thereat, and come as neere as their abilitie will give them leave.

I have beene willing to insert these points by the way, into this present argument, and to charge my discourse over and above therewith, that I might prosecute other precepts remaining behinde, which concerne the education of young men. Thus much therefore I say moreover, that children must be trained and brought to their duty in all lenity, by faire words, gentle exhortations, and milde remonstrance, and in no wise (pardon me) by stripes and blows: For this course of swinging and beating seemeth meete for bondslaves, rather than persons of free condition. And to say a truth, by this meanes they become dull and senselesse, may they have all studie and labour afterwards in hatred and horreur: partly for the smart and paine which they abide by such correction, and in part by the contumely and reproch that they sustaine thereby. Praise and dispraise be farre better and more profitable to children free borne, than all the whips, rods and boxes in the world: the one for to drive them forward to well doing, the other to draw them backe from doing ill: but both the one and the other are to be used in alternative course. One while they would be commended as another while blamed and rebuked: and namely, if at any time they be too jocund and insolent, they ought to be snibbed a little and taken downe, yea and put to some light shame: but soone after, raised up againe by giving them their due praises. And herein we must imitate good nurses, who when they have set their infants a crying, give them the breast for to still them againe. Howbeit, a measure would be kept, and great heed taken that they be not too highly commended, for feare least they grow proude and presume overmuch of themselves: For when they be praised exceedingly they waxe careless, dissolute and enervate: neither will they be willing afterwards to take more paines. Moreover, I have knowne certaine fathers, who through excessive love of their children have hated them afterwards. But what is my meaning by this speech? Surely I will declare my minde and make my words plaine anon by an evident example and demonstration. Some fathers (I say) there be, who upon a hot and hasty desire to have their children come soone forward, and to be the formost in every thing, put them to immoderate travell and excessive paines: in such sort, that they either sincke under the weight of the burden, and so fall into greivous maladies, or else finding themselves thus surcharged and overladen, they are not willing to learne that which is taught them. And it fareth with them as it doth with young herbes and plants in a garden, which so long as they be watered moderately, are nourished and thrive very well: but if they be overmuch drenched with water, they take harme thereby and are drowned: Even so we must allow unto children a breathing time betweene their continuall labours: considering and making this account, That all the life of man is divided into labor & rest: and for this cause Nature hath so ordained, that as there is a time to be awake, so we finde a time also to sleepe. One while there is warre, and another while peace: It is not alwaies winter and foule weather, but sommer likewise and a faire season. There be appointed not onely worke daies to toyle in, but also feastivall holidays to solace and disport our selves. In funne, rest and appoyse, is (as it were) the sauce unto our travaile. And this we may observe as well in senselesse and livelesse things, as in living and sensible creature. For we unbend our bowes, and let slacke the strings of Lutes, Harpes, and such muscicall instruments, to the end that we may bend and stretch the same againe. And in one word, as the bodie is preserved and maintained by repletion and evacuation successively, so the minde likewise by repose and travell in their turnes.

Furthermore, there be other fathers also woorthy of rebuke and blame, who after they have once betaken their children to Masters, Tutors and Governors, never deigne afterwards themselves, either to see or heare them, whereby they might know how they learne: wherein they do faile verie much in their dutie. For they ought in proper person to make triall how they profit, they should ever and anon (after some few daies passed betweene) see into their progresse and proceeding, and not to repose their hope and rest altogether upon the discretion and disposition of a mercenarie master. And verily this careful regard of the fathers, will worke also greater diligence in the masters themselves, seeing that by this meanes they are called to account, as it were to account and examine how much they plie their schollers, and how they profit under their hands. To this purpose may be well applied a pretty word spoken sometimes by a wife estuary of a stable, Nothing (quoth he) feedeth the steele so fat as doth the masters eie.

But above all things, the memorie of children ought daily to be exercised: for that it is as a man would say, the Treasury & Storehouse of all learning. Which was the cause that the ancient Poets have feigned, That Lady Memosyne, that is to say Memorie, was the mother of the Muses: Whereby they would seeme under an enigmaticall and darke speech to give us to understand, that nothing availeth so much either to breed, or to feed and nourish learning, as Memorie. And therefore great diligence would be used in the exercise thereof everie way: whether the children be by nature good of remembrance and retentive: or otherwise of a sickle memorie and given to oblivion. For the gift of nature in the one, by exercise we shall confirme and augment; and the imperfection or default in the other, by diligence supplie and correct: in such sort, that as they, shall become better than others; so these, shall prove better then themselves. For verie wisely to this purpose said the Poet Hesiodus:

*If little still to little thou do ad
a heape at length and mickle will be had.*

Over and besides, I would not have fathers to be ignorant of another point also, as touching this memorative part & faculty of the mind: namely, that it serveth much not onely to get learning and literature, but also is a meanes that carrieth not the least stroke in worldly affaires: For the remembrance of matters past, furnisheth men with examples sufficient to guide and direct them in their consultations of future things.

Furthermore, this care would be had of young children, that they be kept from filthy and unseemly speeches: For words (as Democritus saith) are the shadowes of deeds. Trained also they

they must be to be courteous, affable, & faire spoken, as well in intertainment of talke with every one, as in saluting and greeting whomsoever they meete: for there is nothing in the world so odious as to be coy and furlly of speech; to make it strange and to disdain for to speake with men. Again, yoong students shall make themselves more lovely and amiable to those with whom they converse, in case they be not so opinative and stiffe that they will not relent nor give place one jot in disputations, if they have once taken a partie against others. For a commendable and goodly matter it is for a man to know, not only how to overcome, but also to suffer himselfe otherwhiles to be overcome: especially in such things wherein the victorie bringeth hurt and dammage: For verily such a conquest may well and truly be called according to the common Proverbe, A Cadmian victorie, that is to say, which turneth to the detriment and losse of the winner. In confirmation whereof I may well alleage the testimony of the wise Poet Empidides, who in one of his tragedies hath these verses:

*When one of twaine that argue and dispute,
grooves into heat of words and will not rest:
I hold him much the wiser who is mute and staies his tongue, that he do not contest.*

Now come I to other points wherein youth is to be instructed, and those of no lesse importance, nay rather I may be bolde to say, of greater consequence than all those whereof I have discoursed hitherto: And what be they? Namely, that yoong men be not riotous, and given to superfluity of expence: That they holde their tongue: That they master their anger: and finally, That they keepe their hands pure & cleane. But let us consider these precepts particularlie, what ech of them in severall doeth import: and more easily may they be understood, if we illustrate the same by lively examples. To begin then first with the last: There have bene knowne great personages, who being once permitted to put forth their hands for to take bribes and money unjustly, lost all the honor which they had woen the rest of their life time: As for example, * Gylippus the Lacedæmonian, who having once opened those bagges or coffers of money by turning their bottomes upwards, and taken forth what pleased him, was shamefully banished out of Sparta, and lived obscurely in exile. As touching the gift of bridling choler, and not to be angrie at all, it is a singular vertue, and perfect wile men they are indeed who can so do: Such as Socrates was, who being greatly abused by an insolent, audacious and gracelesse youth, that spared him not, but had spurned & kicked him with his heeles, seeing those about him to be very angrie and out of patience, stamping and faring as though they would run after the partie, to be avenged of such an indignitie; How now my masters (quoth he) what if an asse had flung out, and given me a rap with his heeles, would you have had me to haue yerked out and kicked him againe? Howbeit, this ungracious impe went not clere away with impunity: for being rated for his insolence & leud demeanour, and reproched by every man with the termes of Wining asse, Kicking colt, and such like nick-names, he fell into such a fit of melancholie, that he strangled himselfe in a halter. Also when Aristophanes the Poet exhibited the Comedie called Cloudes, wherein he let sife and discharged upon Socrates all manner of slanders and contumelies that he could devise, inso much as one of them who were present at the very time when he railed thus 40 licentiously, demanded of him, and said, Art thou not nettled, o Socrates, to heare and see thy selfe thus blasoned and noted in publique place? Not a whit (quoth hee againe) for well I wot, that I am in a Theatre, where I make sport, and am laughed at, no otherwise than at some great feast: and glad I am that I can make the audience so merie. The like for all the world, is reported of Archytas, the Tarentine, and Plato: the one being returned home from the warre, wherein he was L. Generally, found his land forlet, neglected and untilld; whereupon he sent for his Bailife of husbandrie, who had the charge thereof: and when he was come before him, W ere I not exceeding angrie (quoth he) I would make thee feele my fingers, and give thee thy desert. And Plato being upon a time displeased with a servant of his, who had a licourous tooth, and had done some ungracious pranke, called unto him Spensippus his sisters sonne, and said, Goe 50 by your waies, take me this knave aside, and swing him well: for I my selfe am verie angrie. But some man perhaps will say unto me, These be hard matters to do and imitate. True it is, I wote well; howbeit, endeavour we must and strive with our selves what we can, according to the example of these worthy men, to cut off somewhat of our impatience, and to curbe our excessive anger: for we may not looke to be equall and comparable in any respect to them, either in experience

rience and skill or in vertue. Howbeit, let us neverthelesse, like the Priests and Torch-bearers (if I may so say) of the gods, ordeined to give light, and shew unto men the reliques of their wisdom and learning, no lesse than if they were verie gods, assay to follow them, and tread in their steps, endeavouring as such as lieth in us, to be furnished with their examples for our better instruction. As for the rule and government of the tongue (for of it, according to my promise, I am to discourse) if there be any man, who thinketh it to be no great matter, but a small and frivolous matter, he is verie wide and farre out of the right way. For a point it is of great wisdom, to know in time and place to keepe silence, and farre better by many degrees than any speech whatsoever. And for this cause (I suppose) it was, that our ancestors in times past instituted 10 those precise ceremonies of sacred mysteries, to the end that being used to holde our peace by that meanes, we might transerre that feare which we learned in the service of the gods, to the delicie and secrecie which we are to observe in mens affaires; and verily never was there man that repented for holding his tongue, but many a one hath often bestrewed himselfe for speaking. Again, that word which a man hath held in at one time, he may easilie utter at another well enough; but a word once passed out of the mouth, he cannot possibly recall it againe. I remember that I have heard of an infinite number of men, who by occasion of an intemperate tongue of their own, have fallen headlong into exceeding great calamities, among whom I will select one or two by way of example, to illustrate the theame that I have in hand, & overpasse the rest. Ptolomæus King of Aegypt, him I meane who was surnamed Philadelphus, espoused 20 his owne sister Arfinoë, and married her: at what time one Sotades came unto him and sayd, You put your aglet, sir, thorow the oilet that is not made for it: For this one word, he was cast into prison, where he remained a long time in miserie, and rotted in the end, suffering condigne punishment due for his lauish tongue and foolish words: and for that he thought to make other men laugh, himselfe wept for it a long time after. The like, and in a manner the same, both did and suffered another, named Theocritus the Sophister, save that the punishment which he abid was much more grievous. For when King Alexander the Great had by his letters missive given commandment that the Greekes should provide Robes of purple against his returne, because upon his coming home he minded to celebrate a solemne sacrifice unto the Gods, in token of thanksgiving for that he had achieved a victorie over the Barbarians: by reason 30 of which commandment the States and cities of Greece were enjoyned to contribute money by the poll, Then this Theocritus, I have ever to this day (quoth he) doubted what Homer meant by this word Purple death: but now I know full well that this is the Purple death which he speaketh of. By which words he incurred the high displeasure of King Alexander, and made him his heave friend ever after. The same Theocritus another time procured to himselfe the deadly hatred of Antigonus King of the Macedonians, by reproching him in way of mockerie with his deformity and defect, for that he had but one eie. For the King having advanced Eutropius his Master Cooke to a place of high calling and command, thought him a meete man to be sent unto Theocritus, as well to give account unto him, as also to take account of him reciprocally. Eutropius gave him to understand so much from the King, and about this businesse, repaired 40 often unto him. In the end, I know well (quoth Theocritus) thou wilt never have done untill thou have made a dish of meate of me, and serve me up raw to the table before this Cyclops to be eaten: twitting the King with his one eie, and Eutropius with his cookerie. But Eutropius came upon him againe presently and said: Thou shalt be then without a head first, For I will make thee pay for thy prating and foolish toong, and wiche that he went immediately to the King, and reported what he had said, who made no more adoe but sent his writ and caused his head to be smitten off.

Over and besides all these precepts before rehearsed, children ought to be inured from their very infancie in one thing which is most holy and becoming religious education, and that is, to speake the truth: For surely, lying is a base and servile vice, detestable and hateful among all 50 men, and not pardonable so much as to meane slaves, such as haue little or no good in them. Now as touching all that which I have delivered and advised hitherto which concerneth the honest behaviour, modestie and temperance of yoong children, I have delivered the same frankly, resolutely, and making no doubt thereof. Mary, for one point which now I am to touch and handle, I am not so well resolved, but much distracted in my mind, hanging to and fro as it were in æquall balance, and know not which way to incline, whether to the one side or to another: Inſomuch as I am in great perplexitie and feare: neither wote I whether I were better to go forward and utter it, or to turne backe and hold my peace. And yet I will take heart, and boldly declare what it is. The queſtion to be debated is this, Whether we ought to permit thoſe that love young boies, to converſe with them and haunt their companie, or contrariwiſe, keepe them away and debar them that they neither come neere nor have any ſpeech with them? For when I behold & conſider the aſperitie nature & feveritie of ſome fathers, who for feare that their ſonnes ſhould be abuſed, wil in no wiſe abide that thoſe who love them ſhould in any ſort keepe cōpanie, or talke with them, but thinke it intolerable, I am afraid either to bring up ſuch an order or to approve & maintaine the ſame. But when on the other ſide I propound before mine eyes the examples of Socrates, Plato, Xenophon, Aſchines, Cebes, and all the ſuit and ſort of thoſe woorthy men in times paſt, who allowed the maner of loving young boies, and by that meanes brought ſuch youthes to learne good ſciences, to ſkill of government & State matters, and to frame their maners to the rule and ſquare of vertue, I am turned quite and altogether of another mind, yea and inclined wholly to imitate and follow thoſe great perſonages, who have the teſtimonie of the Poet Euripides on their ſide, ſaying in one place after this maner,

*All loves do not theſeſh groſſly reſpect:
One love there is which doth the ſoule affect,
With juſtice beſtified and equitie,
With innocence likewiſe and chaſtite.*

Neither ought we to overpaſſe one ſaying of Plato, which he delivereth betweene mirth and good earnest in this wiſe, Good reaſon it is, quoth he, that they who have done woorthy ſervice and achieved great prowefſe and victory in a battaile, be privileged to kill whom it pleaſeth them among their captives. And for thoſe who deſire nothing but the bewty and freſh flour of the bodie, mine opinion is they ſhould be put backe & kept away: but ſuch in one word as love of the bewtie of the minde are to be choſen & admitted unto them. Alſo I hold, that ſuch kind love is to be avoided and forbidden, which they praſiſe in Thebes and Elis, as alſo that which in Candy they call Ravifhment: but that which is uſed in Athens and Lacedæmon, we ought to receive and allow, even in young and faire boies. Howbeit concerning this matter every man may for me opine what he thinketh good, and do as he ſeeeth cauſe and can finde in his heart.

Moreover, having ſufficiently treated of the good nourtur and modeſt behaviour of children, I purpoſe to proceed unto the age of young men: but firſt I will ſpeake my mind briefly once for all as touching one point. For many a time I have complained of thoſe who have brought up divers ill cuſtomes & this above the reſt, namely to provide for their children whiles they be very young and little, maſters, teachers and governors: but after they are grown once to ſome yeeres, they give them head and ſuffer them to be caried away with the violent heat of youth: whereas contrariwiſe it were meet and needfull, to have a more carefull eye unto them, and to hold a ſtreighter hand over them at that time, than during their infancie and childhood. For who knoweth not, that the faults of young children are but ſmall, light and eaſie to be amended, as for example, ſome throwneſſe and little diſobedience to their tutors and governors, or haply ſome negligence and default in not giving care to their teachers, and not doing as their Maſters appoint them: But contrariwiſe the offences that yonkers commit, are many times outrageous and heinous, as gouting and ſurſetting, robbing of their fathers, dice play in masks and mummeries, exceſſe in feaſting, banqueting, quaffing and carouſing, wanton love of young maidens, adulteries committed upon married wives, & thereby the overthrow of houſes and confuſion of families. In regard of which enormities, it behooved parents to reſſeſſe and bridle their wilde and untamed affections with great care and vigilance: For this flour of age having no forecaſt of thrift, but ſet altogether upon ſpending, and given to delights and pleaſures, wineth and fingeth out like a ſkirtiſh and frampold horſe, in ſuch ſort that it had need of a ſharpe bit and ſhort curb: And therefore they that endeavor not by all good meanes forcibly to hold in and reſſeſſe this age, but give young men libertie and ſuffer them to do after their own mind, plunge them ere they be aware into a licentious courſe of life and all maner of wickedneſſe. Wherefore good and wiſe fathers ought in this age eſpecially to be vigilant and watchfull over their ſonnes, they ought I ſay to keepe them downe, and inure them to wiſedome and verue, by teaching, by threatening, by intreatie and prayers, by adviſe and remonſtrances, by perſwaſion and counſell, by faire promiſes, by ſetting before their eyes the

examples of ſome who being abandoned to their pleaſures and all ſenſualitie, have fallen headlong into great calamities and woſull miſeries: & contrariwiſe, of others who by maſtering their luſts and conquering their delights, have wonne honor and glorious renowne. For ſurely theſe be the two Elements and foundations of vertue, Hope of reward, and Feare of puniſhment: For, as hope inciteth and ſetteth them forward to enterprize the beſt and moſt commendable acts, ſo feare plucketh them backe, that they dare not enter upon lewd and wicked pranks. In ſumme, Fathers ought with great care to divert their children from frequenting ill companie, for otherwiſe they ſhall be ſure to catch infection and carie away the contagion of their leandnes. This is that Pythagoras expreſſly forbiddeth in his Aenigmaticall precepts under covert and dark words, which becauſe they are of no ſmall efficacie to the attaining of vertue, I will briefly ſet downe by the way, and open their meaning. Taſte not (quoth he) of the black tailed fiſhes, Adelmanni, which is as much to ſay, as, Keepe not company with infamous perſons, & ſuch as for their naughtie life are noted (as it were) with a blacke coale. Paſſe not over a balance, That is, we ought to make the greateſt account of equitie and juſtice, and in no caſe to tranſgreſſe the ſame. Sit not upon the *meaſure Choenix, That is to ſay, we are to ſlie ſloth and idlenes, that we may forecaſt to make proviſion of things neceſſarie to this life. Give not every man thy right hand, which is all one with this, Make no contracts and bargaines indifferently with all perſons. VVear not a ring ſtreight upon thy finger. Live in freedom and libertie; neither intangle and clog thy life with troubles as with gives. Dignot nor rake into the fire with a ſword: whereby he giveth us a caveat, not to provoke farther a man that is angrie, for that is not meete and expedient; but rather to give place unto thoſe that are in heat of choller. Eat not thy heart, that is to ſay, offend not thine owne ſoule, nor hurt and conſume it with penſive cares. Abſtaine from beanes, i. Intermeddle not in the affaires of State and government: for that in olde time men were wont to paſſe their voices by beanes, & ſo proceeded to the election of Magiſtrates. Put not viands in a chamber-pot: whereby he ſignifieth, that we ſhould not commit good and civill words to a wicked minde; becauſe ſpeech is the nutriment of the underſtanding, which becommeth polluted by the leudneſſe of men. Returne not backe from the limits and confines when thou commeſt unto them, that is to ſay, If wee perceive death approaching, and that wee are come to the uttermoſt bounds of our life, we ought to beare our death patiently, and not be discouraged thereat.

But now is it time to returne againe to my matter which I propoſed before in the beginning, namely, as I have already ſaid, we are to withdraw our children from the ſocietie and companie of leud perſons, and flatterers eſpecially: for that which many a time and often I have ſaid to divers and ſundry fathers, I will now repeat once againe, namely, That there is not more miſchievous and peſtilent kinde of men, or who doe greater hurt to youth, and ſooner overthrow them, then theſe flatterers, who are the undoing both of fathers and ſonnes, cauſing the olde age of the one, and the youth of the other, wretched and miſerable, preſenting with their leud and wicked counſels an inevitable bait, to wit, Pleaſure, wherewith they are ſure to be caught. Fathers exhort their ſonnes that be wealthie, to ſobrietie; and theſe incite them to drunkenneſſe.
Fathers give them counſell to live chaſte and continent; theſe provoke them to luſt and looſeneſſe of life. Fathers bid them to ſave, ſpare, and be thriftie; theſe will them to ſpend, ſcatter, and be waſters. Fathers adviſe their children to labour and travell; theſe flatterers give them counſell to play or ſit ſtill and doe nothing; What? all our life, ſay they, is no more but a moment and minute of time, to ſpeake of: we muſt live therefore, and enjoy our owne, whiles wee have it: we muſt not live beſide our ſelves, and languish. What need you regard and care for the menaces of a father, an olde doting foolle carying death in his face, and having one foot in the grave, we ſhall ſee him one of theſe dayes turne up his heeles, and then will we ſoone have him forth, and cary him aloft bravely to his grave. You ſhall have one of theſe come, and bring unto a youth ſome common harlot out of the ſtinking ſtewes, having borne him in hand before, that the iſe ſome brave dame and citizens wife, for to furniſh whom, he muſt robbe his father, there is no remedie. Thus fathers, good men, in one houre are bereaved and ſpoiled of that which they had ſaved many a yeere for the maintenance of their olde age. To be ſhort, a wretched and curſed generation they be; hypocrites, pretending friendſhip, but they can not ſkill of plaine dealing and franke ſpeech. Rich men they claw, ſooth up and flatter: the poore they contemne and deſpiſe. It ſeemeth they have learned the Art of ſinging to the Harpe, for

to seduce young men: for when their young masters, who mainteine and feed them, begin to laugh, then they set up by and by a loud laughter, then they yawne & shew all their teeth; counterfeite cranks, fained and suppoled men; baltard members of mankind and this life; who comfort themselves, and live to the will and pleasure of rich men: and notwithstanding their fortune is to be free borne, and of franke condition; yet they chuse voluntarily to be slaves: who thinke they have great injurie done unto them, if they may not live in all fulnesse and superfluitie, to be kept delicately, and doe nothing that good is. And therefore all fathers that have any care of their childrens good education and wel-doing, ought of necessitie to chafe and drive away from them these gracelesse imps and shamelesse beasts: they shall doe well also to keepe from them such schoole-fellowes as be unhappie and given to doe throwd turnes: for such as they, are enough to corrupt and marre the best natures in the world.

All these rules and lessons which hitherto I have delivered, do concerne honestie, vertue and profit: but those that now remaine behinde, pertaine rather to humanity, and are more agreeable to mans nature. For in no case would I have fathers to be verie hard, sharpe and rigorous to their children: but I could rather wish and desire that they wink at some faults of a young man, yea and pardon the same when they espie them; remembering that they themselves were sometimes young. For like as Physicians mingling and tempering otherwhiles some sweete juice or liquid with bitter drugs and medicines, have devised that pleasure and delight should be the meanes and way to do their patients good: Even so, fathers ought to delay their eager reprehensions and cutting rebukes with kindnesse and clemencie: one while letting the bridle loose, and giving head a litle to the youthfull desires of their children: another while againe reigning them short and holding them in, as hard: but above all, with patience gently to beare with their faults. But if so be fathers cannot otherwise doe, but be soone angrie; then they must allsoone have done and be quickly pacified. For I had rather that a father should be halfe with his children, so he be appeased anon: then slow to anger, and as hard to be pleased againe. For when a father is so hard harted, that he will not be reconciled, but carieth still in minde the offence that is done, it is a great signe that he hateth his children. And I hold it good that fathers sometime take not knowledge of their childrens faults, and in this case make some use of hard hearing and dimme sight, which old age ordinarily bringeth with it, as if by reason of these infirmities, they neither saw somewhat when they see well youngeth; nor heard that which they heare plainly. We beare with the faults of friends; what strange matter is it then to tolerate the imperfections of our owne children? Many a time when our servants have overdrunk themselves, & surfeited therewith, we search not too narrowly into them, nor rebuke them sharply: therefore keepe thy sonne one while short, be franke another while, and give him money to spend freely. Thou hast bene highly offended, and angrie with him once, pardon him another time for it. Hath he practised secretly with any one of thy household servants, and beguiled thee? Dissemble the matter and bridle thine yre. Hath he bene at one of thy farmes, met with a good yoke of oxen & made money thereof? Commeth he in the morning to do his dutie and bid thee good morrow, belching fowre and smelling strongly of wine, which the day before he drunken at the taverne with companions like himselfe? seeme to know nothing. Senteth he of sweete perfumes and costly pomanders? Hold thy peace and say nothing. These are the means to tame and breake a wilde and coltish youth. True it is, that such as naturally be subject to wantonnesse or carnall lust, and will not be reclaimed from it, nor give care to those that rebuke them, ought to have wives of their owne and to be yoked in marriage: for surely this is the best and surest meanes to bridle those affections, and to keepe them in order. And when fathers are resolved upon this point, what wives are they to seeke for them? Surely those, that are neither in blood much more noble, nor in state farre wealthier than they: For an old said saw it is and a wife, Take a wife according to thy selfe. As for those that wed women farre higher in degree, or much wealthier than themselves, I cannot say they be husbands unto their wives, but rather slaves unto their wives goods.

I have yet a few short lessons to annexe unto those above rehearsed, which when I have set downe, I will conclude, and knit up these precepts of mine. Above all things fathers are to take heed, that they neither commit any grosse fault, nor omit any one part of their owne dutie: to the end they may be as lively examples to their owne children; who looking into their life as into a cleere mirrour, may by the precedents by them given, forbear to do or speake any thing that that is unseemely and dishonest: For such fathers who reprove their children for those parts which they play themselves, see no how under the name of their children they condemne their owne selves. But surely, all those generally who are ill liveres, have not the heart to rebuke so much as their owne servants; much lesse dare they finde fault with their children. And that which is worst of all, in living ill themselves, they teach and counsell their servants and children to do the same: For looke where old folke be shamelesse, there must young people of necessitie be most graceles and impudent. Endeavour therefore we ought for the reformation of our children, to do our selves all that our dutie requireth: and heerein to imitate that noble Ladie Eurydice, who being a Slavonian borne, and most barbarous, yet for the instruction of her owne children, she tooke paines to learne good letters when she was well steeped in yeeres. And how kinde a mother she was to her children, this Epigram which she her selfe made and dedicated to the Muses, doth sufficiently testifie and declare:

*This Cupid here of honest love a true Memoriall is,
Which whilom Dame Eurydice of Hierapolis
To Muses nine did dedicate: where by in soule and mind
Conceiv'd she was in later daies and brought forth fruit in kind.
For when her children were well grown: good ancient Lady shee,
And careful mother tooke the paines to learne the A.B.C.
And in good letters did so far proceed, that in the end
She taught them those sage lessons which they might comprehend.*

But now to conclude this Treatise, To be able to observe and keepe all these precepts and rules together which I have before set downe, is a thing happily that I may wish for, rather than give advice and exhort unto. Howbeit, to aff. & follow the greater part of them, although it require a rare felicitie and singular diligence; yet it is a thing that man by nature is capable of, and may attaine unto.

HOW A YOUNG MAN OUGHT TO HEARE POETS, AND HOW HE MAY TAKE PROFIT BY READING POEMES.

The Summarie.

Erasmuch as young Students are ordinarily allured as with a baite by reading of Poets in such sort, as willingly they employ their time therein, considering that Poësie hath I wot not what Sympathie with the first heats of this age: therefore by good right this present discourse is placed next unto the former. And albe it, to speake properly it pertaineth unto those onely who read ancient Poëts, as well Greeke as Latin, to take heede and beware how they take an impression of dangerous opinions, in regard either of religion or manners: yet a man may comprehend likewise under it all other profane authors, out of which a minde that is not corrupt may gather profit, so they be handled wisely and used with discretion. To which effect Plutarch delivereth in this treatise good precepts: And after he hath shewed generally, that in Poësie there is delight and danger withall: he refuteth briefly those who flatly condemne it: Then, as he proceedeth to advertise that this ground and foundation is to be laide, namely, that Poëts are liars; he describeth what their fictions be, how they ought to be considered, and what the scope and marke is whereat Poësie doth aime and shoot: Afterwards he adviseth, to weigh & ponder well the intention of Poëts, unto which they addresse & accomodate their verses: to beware of their repugnant ces and contradictions: and so the end that we be not so soon damned by any dangerous points which they deliver one after another, to oppose against them the opinions and counsels of other persons of better make. Which done, he addeth moreover and saith, That the sentences intermingled here and there in Poets, do reply sufficiently against the evil doctrine that they may seeme to teach elsewhere: also, in taking heed to the diverse significations of words to be rid and freed from great encumbrances and difficulties: discoursing moreover how a man may make use of their descriptions of vices and virtues: also, of the words and deeds of those personages whom they bring in: searching unto the reasons and causes of such speeches and discourses: thereunto to draw in the end a deeper sense and higher meaning, reaching even to Morall Philosophie, and the gentle framing of the minde unto the love of vertue. And for that there be some hard and difficult places, which like unto forked waies, may leave the mindes of the Readers doubtfull and in suspence: he sheweth that it is an easie matter to apply the same well, and that withall, a man may reforme those sentences ill placed, and accommodate them to many things. And in conclusion, framing this discourse to his principall intention, he treateth how the praises and dispraises which Poets attribute unto persons, are to be considered: and that we ought to conforme all that which we finde good in such authors by testimonies taken out of Philosophie, the onely scope whereunto young men must tend in reading of Poets.

READING AND HEARING of Poemes and Poets.

That which the Poet Philoxenus said of flesh, that the sweetest is that which is least flesh: of fish likewise that the most favorie is that which is least fish, let us, O Marcus Sedatus, leave to be decided and judged by those, who as Cato said, had their palats more quicke and sensible than their hearts. But, that young men take more pleasure in those Philosophicall discourses, which favour least of Philosophie, and seeme rather spoken in mirth than in earnest, and are more willing to give care thereto, and suffer themselves more easily to be led and directed thereby, is a thing to us notorious and evident. For we see, that in reading not onely Aesop fables and the fictions of Poets, but also the booke of Hercules entituled Abaris, and that of Ariston, named Lycas; wherein the opinions of Philosophers as touching the soule, are mingled with tales and feigned narrations devised for pleasure, they be ravished as one would say with great contentment and delight. And therefore such youtnes ought not onely to keepe their bodies sober and temperate in the pleasures of meate and drinke, but also much more to accustom their minds to a moderate delight in those things which they heare and read, using the same temperately as a pleasant and delectable sauce to give a better and more favorie taste to that which is healthfull, holsome and profitable therein. For neither those gates that be shut in a city do guard the same and secure it for being forced and won, if there be but one standing open to receive and let in the enemies: nor the temperance and continencie in the pleasures of other senses preserve a young man for being corrupted and perverted, if for want of forefront and heed taking he give himselfe to the pleasure onely of the care. But for that the hearing approacheth neerer to the proper feat of reason and understanding (which is the braine) so much the more hurt it doth unto him that receiveth delectation thereby, if it be neglected, and not better heed taken thereto. Now forasmuch happily, as it is neither possible nor profitable, to restraîne from the reading and hearing of Poemes, such young men as are of the age either of my sonne Sedatus, or of your Cleander, let us I praie you, have a carefull eye unto them, as standing more in need of a guide now to direct them in their readings, then they did in times past to stay and dade them when they learned to go. This is the reason, that I thought in dutie I was bound to send unto you in writing, that which not long since I discoursed of by mouth, as touching the writings of Poets: to the end that you may reade it your selfe, and if you find that the reasons therein delivered be of no lesse vertue & efficacie than the stones called Amethysts, which some take before and hang about their necks, to keepe them from drunkenness as they sit at bankets, drinking wine merily; you may impart and communicate the same to your sonne Cleander, to preoccupate and prevent his nature, which which being not dull and heavey in any thing, but every way quicke, lively and pregnant, is more apt and easie to be led by such allurements.

In Polytes head there is to be hid,

One thing that good is, and another as bad,

for that the flesh thereof is pleasant and favorie enough in taste to him that feedeth thereupon: but (as they say) it causeth troublesome dreames in the sleepe, and imprinteth in the fantasie strange and monstrous visions. Semblable, there is in Poetrie much delectation and pleasure, enough to entertaine and feed the understanding and spirit of a young man: yet nevertheless, hee shall meet with that there which will trouble and cary away his minde into errors, if his hearing be not well guided and conducted by sage direction. For verie well and fitly it may be said not onely of the land of Aegypt, but also of Poetrie;

Mixed drugs plentie, of well good as bad,

Medicines and posions are there to be had,

which it bringeth forth and yeeldeth to as many as converse therein. Likewise:

Therein sweet lone and wantonnesse,

with dalliance, you shall finde;

And sugred words, which do beguile

the best and wisest minde.

For that which is so decentfull and dangerous therein, toucheth not at all those that be witty, lesse fots, fooles, and grosse of conceit. Like as Simonides answered upon a time to one, who demanded of him, Why he did not beguile and circumvent the Thebaisians as well as all other Greeks; Because, quoth he, they are too fortith for me to deale withall, and so rude, that I can not skill of deceiving them. Gorgias also the Leontine was wont to say of a Tragedie, That it was a kinde of deceit, whereby he that deceived became more just than he who deceived not; and he that was deceived, wiser than another who was not deceived. What is then to be done? Shall we constrain our youth to goe aboard into the Brigantine or Barke of Epicurus, to faile away and flie from Poetrie, by plaistering and stopping their eares with hard and strong waxe, as Vlisses sometimes served those of Ithaca? or rather by environing and defending their judgement with some discourse of true reason, as with a defensive band about it, to keepe and guard them, that they be not caried away with the allurements of pleasure, unto that which might hurt them: Shall we reforme and preserve them?

For sure, Lycurgus, though he was

The valiant sonne of stout Dryas,

shewed himselfe not wise nor well in his wits, when he went throughout his whole realme and caused all the vines to be cut downe and destroyed, because he saw many of his subjects troubled in their braines and drunken with wine: whereas he should rather have brought the nymphes (which are the spring waters) neerer, and keepe in order that foolish, furious and outrageous god Bacchus as Plato saith, with another goddesse that was wise and sober. For the mingling of water with wine, delaith and taketh away the hurtfull force thereof: but killeth not withall the holsome vertue that it hath: Even so we ought not to cut off, nor abolish Poetrie, which is a part and member of the Muses and good literature: But when as the strange fables and Theatricall fictions therein, by reason of the exceeding pleasure and singular delight that they yeeld in reading them, do spread and swell unmeasurably, readie to enter forcibly into our conceits so farre as to imprint therein some corrupt opinions: then let us beware, put forth our hands before us, keepe them backe and staie their course. But where there is a Grace and Muse met together, that is to say, delight conjoined with some knowledge and learning: where I say, the attractive pleasure and sweetnesse of speech, is not without some fruit nor void of utilitie, there let us bring in withall the reason of Philosophie, and make a good medly of pleasure and profit together. For as the herbe Mandradoras growing neere unto a vine, doth by infusion transmit her medicinable vertue into the wine that commeth of it, and procureth in them that drinke afterwards thereof, a more milde desire and inclination to sleepe soundly: Even so, a Poeme receiving reasons and arguments out of Philosophie, and intermingling the same with fables and fictions, maketh the learning and knowledge therein contained to be right amiable unto young men, and soone to be conceived. Which being so, they that would be learned and Philosophers indeed, ought not to reject and condemne the works of Poetrie, but rather search for for Philosophie in the writings of Poets: or rather therein to practise Philosophie, by using to seeke profit in pleasure, and to love the same: otherwise, if they can finde no goodnesse therein, to be displeased and discontented, and to fall out therewith. And truly this is the very beginning of knowledge and learning: for according to the Poet Sophocles,

Lay well thy ground, what ever thou intend:

For a good beginning, makes an happy end.

First and foremost therefore, the young man whom we would induct and traine to the reading of Poësie, ought to have nothing in his heart so well imprinted, nor so readie at hand, as this common saying,

Poets all so say a sooth

Are Liers stout, and speake untruth.

And verily as Poets sometimes lie wilfully, so otherwiles they do it against their wils: wilfully and of purpose, for that being desirous to tickle and please the eares, a thing which most Readers desire and seeke after, they thinke that simple and plaine veritie is more auilful for that purpose then leasing: For truth recounting a thing as it was done, keepeth to it still, and albeir the issue and the end thereof haply be unpleasant, yet nevertheless she goeth not aside but reporteth it outright: whereas a tale or lie devised for delight, quickly diverteth out of the way, and soone turneth from a thing which greiveth, unto that which is more delightfome. For there is no song in rime and metre, no trope or figurative speech, no losie stile, no metaphor so fitly borrowed, no harmonie, no composition of words, how smoothly soever they run, that catcheth the like grace, and is either so attractive or retentive, as a fabulous narration well couched, artificially entrelaced, and aptly delivered. But as a picture drawn to the like, the colour is more effectuall to moove & affect our sense, then the simple puttraying and first draught, by reason of a certaine resemblance it hath to the personage of man or woman, which deceiveth our judgement: Even so, in Poëmes, a lie intermingled with some probabilitie and likelihood of a truth doth excite and stirre more, yea and please better by farre, than all the arte and studie that a man is able to employ either in composing excellent verses, or ending any polished prose, without entrelarding fables and fictions Poëticall. Whereupon it came to passe, that Socrates who all his life time made great profession to be a defender and maintainer of the truth, being minded upon a time to take in hand Poetrie, by occasion of certaine dreames and visions, appearing unto him in his sleepe: in the enterprise whereof finding himselfe to have no apprehension nor grace at all in devising lies, did unto verse certain fables of Aesop, supposing verily there could be no Poësie where there were no lies. Many sacrifices we know to have bene celebrated without piping and dauncing. But never was there known any Poetrie, but it was grounded upon some vaine fables & loud leasing. The verses of Empedocles and Parmenides, the booke of Nicander entituled Theriacal, where he treateth of the biting and stinging of venomous serpents, and of their remedies, The morall sentences of Theognis are writings which borrow of Poetrie their lositnesse of stile and measure of syllables, to beare them up mounted on high to avoid the bale foote pace (as it were) of prose. When as we read therefore in Poeticall compositions, any strange and absurd thing, as touching the Gods, demy-gods, or vertue, spoken by 40 some worthy personage of great renowne, he that beleeveth such a speeche and receiveth it as an undoubted truth, wandereth in error and is corrupted in opinion: but he that ever and anon remembreth and setteth before his eyes the charmes and illusions that Poetrie ordinarily useth in the invention of lying fables, and can esteemes blisse himselfe and say thus thereto,

*O queint device, & shee and craftie gin
more changeable than spotted Unices skin:*

Why yett'st thou and yett thy browes dost knit?

deceiving me, yett seem'st to reach me wit.

He I say, shall never take harme, nor admit into his understanding any evill impression, but reprehend and reprove himselfe when he feareth Neptune, and standeth in dread, least he shake cleave and open the earth, and so discover hell: he will rebuke also himselfe when he is offended and angrie with Apollo the principal * man of all the Greekes, of whom Thetu complaineth thus in the Poet Aeschylus, as touching Achilles her sonne.

Himselfe did sing and say at good of me:

himselfe also at wedding present was:

* Alyste.

Ta

Yet for all this, himselfe and none but he,

hath slaine and done to death my sonne Ajax.

He will likewise repress the teares of Achilles now departed, and of Agamemion being in hell, who in their desire to revive and for the love of this life, stretch forth their impotent and feeble hands. And if it chauce at any time that he be troubled with passions, and surprised with their enchantments and forcerie, he will not stick nor feare to say thus unto himselfe,

Make hast and speed, without delay,

Recover soone the light of day;

Beare well in minde what thou seest here:

And all report to thy bed seere.

Homer spake this in mirth and pleasantly, sitting indeed the discourse, wherein he describeth hell as being in regard of the fiction a tale fit for the eares of women and none els: These be the fables that Poets do feigne voluntarily. But more in number there are which they neither devise nor counterfeit, but as they are persuaded and do beleve themselves, so they would beare us in hand and infect us with the same untruthes, as namely when Homer writeth thus of Jupiter,

Two lasses then of long sleeping death, he did in balance put,

One for Achilles hardy knight, and one for Hector stout:

But when he p's'd it just in mid, behold, for Hector death

weigh'd downwar' unto hell beneath: Then Phoebus stout his breath.

To this fiction Aeschylus the Poet hath aptly fitted one entire Tragedie, which he intituled Psychostasia, that is to say, the weighing of Soules or ghosts in balance. Wherein he deviseth to stand at these scales of Jupiter, Thetu of the one side, and Aurora of the other, praying each of them for their sonnes as they fight. But there is not a man who seeth not clearly, that this it but a made tale and meere fable devised by Homer, either to content and delight the Reader, or to bring him into some great admiration and astonishment. Likewise in this place:

'Tis Jupiter that mooveth warre:

He is the cause that men do jarre.

As also this of another Poet:

When God above some house will overthrow,

He makes debate, twixt mortall men below.

These and such like speeches are delivered by Poets, according to the very conceit and beleife which they have, whereby the error and ignorance which themselves are in as touching the nature of the gods they derive and communicate unto us. Semblably, the strange wonders and marvels of Hell; The descriptions by them made which they depaint unto us by fearefull and terrible termes, representing unto us the fantasticall apprehensions and imaginations of burning and flaming rivers, of hideous places and horrible torments: there are not many men but wot well enough that therein be tales and lies good store: no otherwise than in meates and viands, you shall finde mixed otherwiles hurtfull poyson, or medicinable drugs. For neither Homer nor Pindarus, nor Sophocles, have written thus of Hell, beleiving certainly that there 40 were any such things there:

From whence the dormant rivers dead

of blacke and shady night,

Cast up huge mists and clouds full darke,

that overthrowe the light:

Likewise,

The Ocean coast they sailed still along,

*Fast by the cliffs of Leucas rocke among.*

As also,

Here boyling waves of gulfe so deepe do swell,

Where lies the way and downfall into hell.

And as many of them as bewailed and lamented for death as a most piteous and woful thing, or feared want of sepulture as a miserable and wretched case, uttered their plaints and griefes in these and such like words:

For sake me nor unburied so,

Nor unbewailed when you go.

Semblably,

Semblably,
And then the soule from body flew,
and as to hell she went,
She did her death her losse of strength and yout'full yeeres lament.

Likewise,
Doe not me kill before my time,
for why? to see this light
Is sweet: force me not under earth, where nothing is but night.

These are the voices I say of passionate persons, captivate before to error and false opinions. And therefore they touch us more neerely, and trouble us so much the rather, when they finde us likewise possessed of such passions and feebleness of spirit, from whence they proceed. In which regard we ought to be prepared betimes, and provided alwaies before hand to encounter and withstand such illusions, having this sentence readily evermore resounding in our eares as it were from a trunke or pipe, That Poetrie is fabulous, and maketh smal reckoning of Truth. As for the truth indeed of these things, it is exceeding hard to be conceived & comprehended even by those who travell in no other business, but to search out the knowledge and understanding of the thing, as they themselves do confesse. And for this purpose these verses of Empedocles would be alwaies readie at hand, who saith that the depth of such things as these

No eye of man is able to perceive:
No eare to heare, nor spirit to conceive.
Like as these also of Xenophanes.
Never was man nor ever will be,
Able to sound the veritie
Of those things which of God I write,
Or of the world I do endite.

And I assure you, The very words of Socrates in Plato imply no lesse, who protesteth and bindeth it with an oath, that he cannot attaine to the knowledge of these matters. And this will be a good motive to induce yong men to give lesse credit unto Poets, as touching their 30 certain knowledge in these points, wherein they perceive the Philosophers themselves to doubtfull and perplexed, yea and therewith so much troubled.

Also the better I shall we stay the mind of a yong man & cause him to be more warie, if at his first entrance into the reading of Poets, we describe Poetrie unto him giving him to understand that it is an art of Imitation, & a science correspondent every way to the feat of painting; and not onely must he be acquainted with the hearing of that vulgar speech so common in every mans mouth, that Poësie is a speaking picture, and picture a dumbe Poësie: but also we ought to teach him, that when we behold a Lizard or an Ape wel painted, or the face of Thersites lively drawn, we take pleasure therein & praise the same wonderfully; nor for any beautie in the one or in the other, but because they are so naturally counterfeited. For that which is foule of it selfe & ill favo- 40 red in the owne nature, cannot be made faire & seemly: but the skill of resembling a thing wel, be the same faire or be it foule, is alwaies commended: whereas contrariwise, he that takes in hand to portray an illfavoured bodie, and makes thereof a faire & beautifull image, shall exhibite a sight neither seemly nor decent. Some painters yott shall have to delight in painting of strange, foolish and absurd actions: as for example Timomachus represented in a table the picture of Medea, killing her owne children: Theon painted Orestes murdering his owne mother: Parrhasius described with his pensill, the counterfeit race and madnesse of Plisses, and Cherephanes portrayed the wanton dalliance, and dealing of men and women together unseemly. With which arguments and such like, a yong man is to be made acquainted, that he may learne thereby how the thing it selfe is not praise worthie, whereof he seeth the expresse resemblance, 50 but the art and cunning of the workeman who could so artificially draw the same to the life. Semblably, for asmuch as Poësie representeth many times by way of imitation, filthie actions, leaud affections, and vicious manners: it is the part of a yong man to know thus much, That the thing which is admired therein and found to be singular, he ought not either to receive as true, or proove as good, but to praise it so far forth onely as it is befitting the person, or approprate to the subject matter. For like as when we heare the grunting of a swine, the creaking of a cart wheele, the whistling noise of the winde, or the roaring of the sea, we take no pleasure therein, but are troubled and discontented: but contrariwise, if a merie fellow or jester can prettily counterfeit the same, as one Parmeno could grunt like a swine, and Theodoros creake like the said wheeles, we are delighted therewith. Also, as we shun a diseased person, and a Lazar full of filthy ulcers, as an unpleasant and hideous spectacle to beholde: but when we looke upon Philactetes portrayed by Aristophanes; and queene Isasta by Silanian: namely, how they be described to pine away, and ready to yeeld up the ghost, we receive no small contentment thereby: even so a yong man when he shall read what the ridiculous jester Thersites, or the amorous and 10 wanton spoiler of maiden, Sisyphus, or the beastly bawd Betrochus, is brought in by Poets to say or doe; let him be advertised and instructed to praise the art and sufficiency of the Poet, who knew how to paint the same so lively and naturally: but withall to blame, reject, and detest the acts and conditions which are thus represented. For there is a great difference betweene resembling a thing well, and a thing that is simply good: for when I say Well, I meane aptly, decently and properly: and so acts filthie and dishonest, are fit and becomming for lewd and dishonest persons. For the shoes of that lame creple Demonides, which he prayed to God might serve his feet that had stolen them from him, were in themselves mishapen and illfavoured; howbeit, proper and fit for him: As for this speech,

If lawes of right and equitie
In any case may broken be,
What man alive would not begin
To do all wrong, a crowne to win?

And this:

Put on the face, I thee advise,
Of him that is just and right wise:
But see no deeds thou do for let,
Whereby thou maist some profit get.

Also:

Unless I may my talent gaine
As cleve as gift, I am in paine.

Likewise:

How shall I live or take repose,
In case this talent I do lose?
Nay sleepe I will and feare no hell,
Nor torments there, but thinke all well:
What wrong I do, what plots I set,
My silver talent for to get.

Wicked words they be all, and most false; howbeit, becomming such as Eteocles and Ision were, and becomming well an olde Vicer. If therefore wee would advertise yong men, that 40 Poets write thus, nor as if they praised and allowed such speeches, but as they know full well that they be lewd and naughtie, so they do attribute them unto as wicked and godlesse persons, they should never take harme by any evill impressions from Poets: but contrariwise, the prejudicate opinion insinuated first, of such & such a man, will presently breed a suspicion both of word and deed to be bad, as spoken and done by a bad and vicious person. Such an example is that of Paris in Homer, who flying out of the battell, went presently to bed unto faire Helena. For seeing that the Poet reporteth of no man els, but only of this unchast adulterous Paris, that he lay with his wife in the day time: it is an evident prooffe that he reputed and judged such incontinencie to be reprochfull, and therefore made report thereof to his blame and shame both. In these ca- 50 ses also it would be well considered whether the Poet himselfe do nor give some plaine demor- strations implying thus much, that he misliketh such speeches, and is offended therewith, as Menander did in the Prologue of that Comedie, which he entituled Thais.

O ladies Mase now helpe me to endite
Of this so bolde and unshamefaced queene,
Yet beautifull: who also hath a spite
Perswaive, and with words can eare cleane

The

*The wrongs that she unto her lovers all Doth offer; whom she thrusteth out of dores,
And yet for gifts she still of them doth call,
And picks their purse, which is the cast of whores,
She none doth love, and yet she semblance makes
That she will, poore heart, for all their sakes.*

And verily in this kinde, Homer among all other Poets doth excell, and useth such advertisements with best discretion: for it is ordinarie with him both to premise some reprehension and blame of evill speeches, and also to recommend the good. And for an instance heereof, in this wise he giveth commendation of a good speech,

*And then anon, this speech right commendable
He spake, which was both sweet and profitable.*

Againe,
*Approching then, he stood unto him nere,
And staid him soone with words that gentle were.*

Semblably on the other side, reprooving bad and lewd speeches, he in a manner doth protest that he himselfe misliketh of them, and therewith denounceth likewise, and doth intimate unto the readers thus much in effect, That they should make no use thereof, nor take regard, otherwise than of wicked things and dangerous examples: as namely when he purposed to describe the rude and grosse termes that Agamemnon gave unto the Priest of Apollo, when he abused him unmercifully, he premised this before;

*This nothing pleased Atreus sonne, K. Agamemnon hight;
But him he badly did intreat, and use with all despite.*

By this word Badly, he meaneth rudely, proudly, disdainfully, without regard of dutie or decency. As for Achilles he attributeth unto him these rash and outrageous speeches,

*Thou drunken for and dogs face that thou art
Thou courage hast no more then fearfull Hart.*

But he inferred withall his owne judgement as touching those words in this manner,

*Achilles then for Peleus sonne, still boiling in his blood
Gave Agamemnon words againe unseemely and not good.*

For it is not like that any thing could be well and decently spoken proceeding from such anger and bitter choler, he observeth the same not in words only but also in deeds. For thus he saith,

*No sooner had he spoke the word, but presently he ment
To worthy Hector much disgrace, whose body up he hent,
He stript and spoiled it full soone, and then hard by the bed
Of sir Patrochus he it laid, and groveling there it sped.*

He useth also fitly to the purpose pretie reprehensions after things be done, delivering his owne sentence, as it were by way of a voice given, touching that which was either done or said a little before: As for example, after the narration of the adultery betweene Mars and Venus, he reporteth that the gods spake in this sort:

*Lewd Acts do never better speed; Lo how the slow and lame
Can overtake him him who for strength and swiftness hath the name!*

And in another place, upon the audacious presumption and proud vaunting of Hector, thus he saith,

*These words he spake in braverie and swelling pride of heart,
But Lady Iuno was displeas'd, and took them in ill part.*

Likewise as touching the arrow that Pandarus shot,

*No sooner Pallas said he word, but foolish minded man,
He was perswaded, and therewith straight waies to shoote began.*

And these be the sententious speeches, &c. opinions of Poets, by them expressly uttered, which any man may soone find & easily discern, if he will but take heed & give regard unto them. But yet over & besides these testimonies, they furnish us also with other instructions by their owne deeds. For thus it is reported of Euripides, that when up a time some reviled Ixion & reproched him by the termes of Godlesse, Wicked & Accursed: he answered, True indeed quoth he, and therefore I would not suffer him to be brought fro the Stage, before I had set him fast upon the wheele, wheele, & broken both his armes & legs. True it is that this kinde of Doctrine in Homer is after a sort mute & not delivered in plaine & expresse termes: but if a man will consider more neerely, even those fables & fictions in him, which are most blamed & found fault withall, there may be found therein a profitable instruction & covert speculation: And yet some there be who wret & writhe forcibly the said fables another way by their Allegories, (for so they call in these daies those speeches wherein one thing is spoken & another ment, whereas in times past they were termed Hyponae, for the hidden meaning couched under them) whereby they would make us beleieve that the fiction as touching the adulterie of Mars & Venus signifieth thus much, That when the Planet of Mars, is in conjunction with that of Venus in some Horoscopes and Nativities, such persons then borne shall bee enclined to adulteries: but if the Sun do then arise, passe, and overtake them, then such adulteries are in danger to be discovered and the parties to be taken in the very act. Now as touching Iuno how she embellished and adorneth herselfe before Jupiter, as also the fiction and forcene about the needle worke girdle and Tissue which she borrowed of Venus, they would have it to signifie a certaine purging and clearing of the aire, as it approacheth neere to the fire: as if the Poet himselfe gave not the interpretation and exposition of such doubts: For in the tale of the adulterie of Venus, he meaneth nothing els, but to reach them that gave care thereto, how wanton musick, lascivious songs, and speeches grounded upon evill arguments and conceining naughtie matters, corrupt our manners, induce us to a luxurious, loose and effeminate life, and cause men to be subject unto pleasures, delights, sensuality and lust, and given over to the love of women: as also

*To change oft soones their beds of costly price,
Their rich array, hote baimes and ech device.*

And therefore the same Homer bringeth in Vulffes, commanding the Musician who sung to the Harpe, in this wise

*Digresse good sir from such lewd songs, and ballads vaine as these,
Sing rather of the Trojan horse: you shall us therein please.*

Giving us thereby a good instruction, that Minstrels, Musicians and Poets should receive the matter and argument of their compositions from wise men, sober, sage and virtuous. And as touching that fable of Iuno, he sheweth how the love, favor, and acquaintance which women win of men by charmes, forceries and enchantments with fraud and deceit, is a thing not onely transitorie and of small continuance, unsure, and whereof a man hath soone enough and is quickly weary, but also that which many times turneth to hatred, anger and enmitie, so soone as the present pleasure is once past: For thus threatneth Jupiter and saith,

Thou shalt then know that wanton love and dalliance in bed, Whereby thou earst hast me deceived, shall serve thee in small sted.

For the shew and representation of wicked deeds, if there be propounded withall the shame and losse which befalleth unto them that have committed the same, doth no hurt at all, but rather much good unto the hearers. As for Philosophers verily, they use examples taken out of histories, to admonish and instruct the readers, even by such things as be at hand, and either are or have beene really so: but Poets do in deed the same, and in effect, howbeit they devise and invent matter of their owne heads, they feigne fables I say, fitting their purpose. Certes like as Melanhus laid, betweene bord and good earnest, that the citie of Athens stood upright on foote and was preserved by meanes of the division, discord and trouble which was among orators and Politicians; for that all the citizens leaned not altogether to a side, nor barelly upon one and the same wall, and so by reason of the variance which reigned among the States men, there was evermore some one counterpoise or other, weighing even against that which endangered the common weale: even so the contradictions that are found in the writings of Poets, which draw the assent and beleefe of the readers reciprocally to and fro, and leave matters ambiguous and doubtfull, are a cause that they be not of so great moment and weight, as to endanger or endanger much. When as therefore we meet with such repugnant places among them, which being laid neere together do imple evident contrarieties, we ought to encline to the safer side and favor the better part, As namely in these verses,

*The Gods in many things, my sonne,
Have men deceived and them undone.*

But contrariwise, what saith the sonne againe?

*Sir, that's soone said: mens fault's excuse,
Nothing more ready, than Gods fault excuse.*

Likewise in one place:

*In store of gold thou should'st have joy:
And count all knowledge but a toy.*

But elsewhere:

*Aburd it is in goods to flow,
And no good thing besides to know.*

Moreover when we read:

How then? should I die? For Gods cause die?

We must be ready with this

*What else? for love of God I judge
We ought no service for to grudge*

These and such like diversities of doubtful sentences, are soone assailed and dissolved, in case, as I have before said, we direct the judgement of young men to adhere unto the better part. But say, we light upon some wicked and ungodly speech, without any answer adjoyned thereto for to reffell the same presently: what then is to be done? Surely we must confute it, by opposing contrarie sentences of the same author in other places: neither are we to be angrie or offended with the Poët in this case; but rather thinke they be words either merily spoken, or only to represent the nature of some person, & with him only to be displeased. Moreover, against these fictions in Homer, when he reporteth how the gods fall together by the eares, and throw one another downe: or that they be wounded in some battell by the hands of mortall men: also that they beat variance and debate: you may if you will by and by oppose that which he himselfe speaketh in another place, and so beat him with his owne rod: saying thus unto him,

You know sir if you list, you Toll us better tales than this.

And verily you both utter better wordes, and thinke of better matters otherwise in these places:

*The Gods in heaven do live at ease:
They know no trouble nor disease.*

Also:

*Whereas the Gods in blisse and joy
Do ever live, without annoy.*

Likewise:

*The Gods themselves are void of care:
Sadnesse and sorrow mens lot they are.*

For these are the true and safe conceptions which we ought to have as touching the Gods: And for all other fabulous fictions and attributes given unto them, they have beene devised only to give contentment to the readers, or to move their affections. In like case whereas Enripides saith:

*Gods over men, having power and masterie,
Abuse and deceive them with wiles and sophistrie*

It were not amisse to alledge and inferre that which he writeth better and more truly in another place:

*If Gods do harme, or what doth not becomme,
No Gods in truth, we are them for to deceme.*

Also when Pindarus speaketh verie bitterly and eagerly in one place, tending altogether to revenge:

*All meanes and plots we may addeffe,
To worke and compass our foes disreffe,*

We may come upon him againe and answer thus: But you good Sir elsewhere affirme, That
The joy we gaine by fraud and trecherie, Turnes in the end to woe and miserie.

Moreover, when we heare Sophocles in this song:

Lucie alwaies full pleasant is and sweete,

Although

Although it come by false meanes and unmeere.

Reply we ought and say thus: We have heard you sing in another tune:

*Deceitfull lies and false language,
Bring forth no fruit, that will beare age.*

Furthermore to encounter these speeches which are delivered as touching riches:

*Powr-full in riches to win fort: steepe and high,
As well as places most plaine and accesseible,
Whereas those pleasures, which rich be and nigh
To hold and enjoy, for poore is impossible.*

*And why? a toong that smooth and filed is
Will cause a man soule and unpersonable,
Of no regard, whose parts be all unis
Fare for to seeme full wife and commendable.*

The Reader may alledge many opposite sentences of Sophocles, and these among the rest:

*I see no cause, but men in povertie,
May be advaunc'd to place of dignitie.*

Also:

*A man is not the worse for his povertie,
In case he have both wise dame and honestie.*

Likewise:

*What joy, what grace can come of worldly pelfe,
If first by busis a man to it attaine:
And then with restlesse cares torment himselfe,
And take bad courses the same to maintaine?*

And Menander verily in one place hath highly praised and extolled sensuall lust and concupiscence, whereby he set them forward who are of an hot nature, and of themselves prone to voluptuoulines, namely, in these and such like amatorious words:

*What creatures never do live and see
The sun light joy, that common treasure,
Are all, have beene, and ever shall be Subject and thral to fleshly pleasure.*

Howbeit, in another the same Poët hath turned us about, and forcibly drawn us unto honestie, repressing and bridling the insolent furie of a loose and luxurious life, saying in this wise:

*A filthy life, though pleasam for the while,
With shame at last, doth all delights defile.*

These sayings are in some sort contrarie to the former, but far better and more profitable every way. And therefore the setting together and consideration of such contradictorie sentences, will bring forth one of these two effects: for either it will draw young men to the better way, or at leastwise derogate the credit of the worse.

But if peradventure it come to passe that the Poëts themselves do not solve and solve those strange and absurd sayings, which they seeme to set abroad: it were not amisse to oppose against them, the contrarie sentences of other famous authors: and when wee have weighed and compared them in balance, to make proofe thereby which are the better. As for example, if haply Alexis the Poët hath prevailed with some by these verses of his:

*If men be wise above all they will chuse
By all meanes their pleasures to compass and use.
Whereof there be three most powrfull and wise,
Which wholly possesse and accomplish our life
To eat, to drinke, to follow venerie:
As for the rest, I hold accessarie.*

We must call to minde and remember, that the sage Socrates was of another opinion and spake the contrarie: for he was wont to say, that the wicked lived for to eat and drinke; but the vertuous did both eat and drinke, to live. Semblably, to meete with this verse of the Poët who ever it was that wrote thus:

To make thy part good with a person lewd

C 2

Fight with like lewdnes, and be thou as strewd.

Bidding us in some fort to accommodate and frame our selves like to the lewd and wicked: we may be readie with that notable Apophthegme of Diogenes, who being asked how a man might be revenged best of his enemy, answered thus, If (quoth he) thou shew thy selfe a good and honest man. The wisdom also of the said Diogenes we must set against the Poet Sophocles, who troubled the minds and consciences of many thousands, with distrust and dispaire, by writing these verses as touching the religion and confraternity in the Mysteries of Ceres:

*How happie men and thrice happy are they Whose fortune it is, the secrets to see
Of Mysteries so sacred: and straight way
Downe into hell, for to descend with glee:
For they alone in blisse shall live for ay:
The rest in bale, must suffer paine alway.*

How now, quoth Diogenes, when he heard such verses read: Saist thou so indeed? And shall Paracian the notorious theefe be in better state after this life when he is once departed, only because he was entred and professed in the orders of this confraternitie, than good Epimondas? As for Timothem, when upon a time in the audience of a full Theatre, he chaunted a Poeme which he had compiled in the honor of Diana, wherein he stiled her with the Attributes and Epithets, of Aeneas, Thyas, Phæbas and Zyffas, which signifie, Furious, Enraged, Possessed, and starke Mad: Cinnus presently cried presently aloud unto him, I would thou haddest a daughter of thine owne with such qualities. The like elegant answer Bion is reported to have made unto Theognis: For when Theognis came out with these verses,

*A man held downe with povertie can nothing do or say:
For why? his tongue wants libertie,
and somewhat doth it stay.*

Bion hearing them, How commeth it then to passe quoth he, that thou thy selfe being but a beggar keepst such a prating as thou doest, and with thy vaine babling and garrulitie troublest our eares?

Moreover we must not in any wise omit and let passe the occasions which are ministred out of the words and sentences either adjoining, or intermingled with those speeches, for to reforme and correct the same: But like as Physicians are of opinion, that notwithstanding the Greene Flies Cantharides be of themselves venenous and a deadly poison; yet their wings and feete are helpfull and holisome: yea and of vertue to frustrate and kill the malice of the said flies: even so in the Poemes and writings of Poets, if there be one Nowne or Verbe hanging to a sentence that we feare will do harme, which Nowne or Verbe may in some fort weaken the said hurtfull force, we are to take hold thereof, and to stand upon the signification of such words more at large, as some do in these verses,

*This honour ducto wretched men we keepe
Our haire to cut, and over them to weepe.*

40

As also in these,
*We men, Alas most miserable, live
In paine and griefe, this lot the gods do give.*

For the Poet doth not simply affirme that the gods have predestinate all men simply to live in woe & sorrow, but this he speaketh of foolish and witlesse folke, who being ordinarily lewd and naughty, and therefore miserable and wretched for their wickednes, he is wont to call δαρδαι & δυστυχ.

Another way there is besides, to turne the doubtfull and suspected sentences in poetical writings to the better sense, which otherwise might be construed in the worse part: namely, by interpreting words to the signification wherein they are usually taken: wherein it were better to exercise a yong man, than in the interpretations of obscure termes, which we call Glosses. And verily a point this is favouring of great learning, and full besides of delectation: as for example, To know how the word πρωταυτη in Poets signifieth, is as much to say, as ill death or a bad end; for that the Macedonians use to call death πρωταυτη. Likewise the Acolians do terme victorie which is achieved by long suffering, continuall perseverance and abiding, πρωταυτη. Also among the Dryopians, Dryopians, those be named Πρωται, who with other are called Damones. i. Saints or Heavnelic wights. Furthermore, it is not only expedient, but necessarie also, if we would receive good, and not harme, by the reading of Poets; to know certainly, how and in what signification they take the proper names of gods, as also the appellative words of good and evil things. Likewise what they mean by the vocables κατα. i. the foule; or μακα. i. fatall destinie. Namely, whether these termes be taken by them in one sence, or have many significations? The same is to be said of many other words besides: for example sake, this Nowne δωκε sometimes signifieth an edifice or dwelling house, as when Homer saith,

10 otherwhiles it betokeneth goods and substance: as in this piece of a verse.

ἰδὲ νῆα καὶ ἄνδρας. My house is eaten. i. My goods are wasted and consumed.

Also this word δωκε is taken in one place for life; as namely in these verses;

καὶ οὐρανὸν ἑκατόπυλον.

God Neptune with his haire so blacke,

enjoying him long life,

Despightfully his daies cut short,

and ended all the strife.

But in another for goods and riches: to wit,

δωκεν οὐρανὸν ἑκατόπυλον. Meane while do others spend my goods.

20 Semblably the Verbe δωκε, you shall finde put for to fret, be discontented and ill apaid: as when the Poet writeth thus;

ὅς τις αὖτ' ἴδ' ἀδύνατον ἀνέστηναι, τοῖσιν δ' αὖτις.

Which said, she seemed male-content,

And wounded so; away she went.

And yet it is used sometime, for to joy and vaunt: as namely in the same Poet;

ἡ δ' αὖτις ὅν' ἴδ' ἄνδρας τὸν ἀνέστηναι.

And do you brag and boast so much in deed,

30 Poore Ius that you beas in beggers weed.

In like sort the Verbe δωκε, signifieth either to moove or stirre with great violence: as in Euripides. Κίρην δ' αὖτ' ὅς τις ἀνέστηναι ἀνός.

A whale out of the Atlanticke sea, we might describe from Land

Most forcibly to swimme, and then to shut him selfe on Land.

or to sit downe and take repose: as for example, when Sophocles saith thus,

πρωταυτὶ δ' αὖτ' ὅς τις ἀνέστηναι ἀνός.

My friends what mean you in this wise so strangely for to sit,

With branches dight about your heads, which supplants doe beset?

40 Moreover, it is verie pretie and commendable, when a man meeteth with words of divers acceptions, to make use thereof accordingly, and to accommodate them to the present occasions and subject matters: like as the Grammarians teach us to doe in vocables that admit sundry senses; as for example,

πρωταυτὶ δ' αὖτ' ὅς τις ἀνέστηναι ἀνός.

You may well praise a little barke or barge,

But see with wares, a mightie hulke you charge.

Here the Verbe πρωταυτὶ, signifieth πρωταυτὶ. i. to praise: and yet now in this place (to praise) is as much to say, as to refuse and reject: Like as in our common and daily speech wee use to say, καλὸς ἔχει. i. 'Tis wel: or when we bid καλὸς ἔχει. i. Farewel it: meaning by these terms, that we like not of a thing, or will none of it, nor accept thereof. And hereupon it is that some say, Proserpina is called πρωταυτὶ, which is as much to say as a goddesse blamed and to be found fault with. This difference then, and distinction in the significations of words, is principally to be observed in matters that be more serious and of greater consequence, to wit, in the names of gods. To beginne therefore with them, let us advertise and teach yong men, that Poets in using the names of gods, sometimes meane thereby their very nature and essence: otherwhiles they attribute the homonymie of the same names, to the powers & vertues which the gods do give, and whether they be the authours. And here there presenteth himselfe unto me the Poet Archilochus, when in his praier he saith thus;

Καὶ δὲ δαίτι ἱππας, &c.

*O Vulcan king be gracious unto me,
And heare my praies, thus kneeling on my knee
Devoutly: Grant, I say, this my request,
As thou art wont, to whom thou lovest best.*

It is verie cleere and evident that he doth invoke the god Vulcan himselfe, and calleth him by his proper name. But when he bewaileth his sisters husband, who perished and was drowned in the sea, by which accident he wanted his due sepulture, he saith, that he could have borne this calamitie and misfortune the better,

*If that his head and lovely limmes
in pure white clot besetled,
As doth besee me a faire dead corps,
Vulcan consumed had.*

By which word Vulcan, he meaneth fire, and not the god himselfe. Again, when Euripides in his orh useth these words,

*By love I sweare and bloodie Mars him by,
Who beare great sway among the stars in sky.*

Certaine it is, that he speaketh of the verie gods Jupiter and Mars: But when Sophocles saith:

*Full blind is Mars faire Dames (I say) and nothing he doth see,
But like wilde bore he havoocke makes and works at miserie.*

You must understand that he speaketh of war: Like as in these verses of Homer:

*Whose blood along Scamanders streame, so deeply died in red,
That blacke againe it is therewith now Trenchant Mars hath shed.*

It is meant the edge of the sword and other weapons made of brasse and Steele: which being so, and considering that there be many other wordes of double and divers significations, we ought to learne and beare in mind, that the very names of Δις and Ζευς, which signifie Jupiter, in one place they attribute to the god himselfe, in another to Fortune, and oftentimes to Destiny and Fatall necessitie. For when they say

Ζεὺς μάλα τίς κεν οὐκ ἔστιν.

*O Jupiter who from Ida hill
Do st reigne as King and worke thy will.*

Also:

Ὁ Ζεὺς τίς τίς οὐκ ἔστιν οὐκ ἔστιν.

*O Jupiter who dare avow
That he can wiser be than thou?*

Plaine it is that they meane nothing else but the god Jupiter himselfe. But when they give the Denomination, Δις, to the causes whereupon all things depend, and do say in this wise:

*And many a stout and valiant knight who sought in pitched field,
Before due time there lost their loves and with all breath did yeeld.*

Δις δ' ἐπὶ τῶνδε βαδίζω.

i. This was the wit of mightie Iove

Who wrought all this from heaven above.

Surely we must understand by Iove Fatall destinie: For we must not imagine that the Poet thinketh God to devise and practise any evil against men: but he giveth us to understand by the way as touching the Fatall necessitie of all humane affaires, that Cities, Armies, and Generall Captaines are predestined to fortunate successe and victorie over their enemies, if they be wise and governe their affections well. But contrariwise, if they be passionate and fall into errors and misdemeanors, growing to quarrels and debates one against another, as these did, of whom the Poet spake, it cannot be avoided but they shall commit many outrages, breed troubles and confusion, and at the last come to an unhappy end:

For by Fatall necessity,

And

And Destinie inevitable:

Bad counsels of iniquitie

Bring forth fruits thereto answerable.

Now whereas the Poet Hesiodus bringeth in Prometheus, perswading his brother Epimetheus

To take no gifts in any wise

Which Jupiter from heaven hath sent:

But s hem alwaies for to despise

And end them backe as discontent.

He useth the name of Jupiter for the puissance of Fortune: for by the gifts of that god, meeth the goods of Fortune, to wit, Riches, Mariages, States and Dignities, and generally all outward blessings: the possession whereof is unprofitable unto those that know not how to use them well. Esteeming therefore no better of Epimetheus than of a lewd & foolish fellow, he supposeth that he ought to take heed, & beware of prosperitie whereby he was like to receive hurt and losse: yea and to come unto a mischief in the end. Semblably, when the same Poet saith:

Reproch no man while that you live

With povertie which gods do give.

He understandeth hereby the gift of the gods, a thing meere casuall and comming by Fortune: implying thus much, that those men are not to be blamed and accused, who by some misfortune are become poore: but rather, that povertie proceeding by occasion of sloth, idleness, ease, delicate wantonnesse, wastfull and foolish expences, is shame-woorthie and reprochable. For Poets and others being not acquainted with the word Fortune, which as yet was not in use, and knowing full well, that the power of this variable and inconstant cause, ranging disorderly as it did without any certaine purpose and determinate ende, was mightie, and could not possibly be avoided by any humane wit, reason and policie, they expressed the same by the names of the gods: much like as we in our daily speech and ordinary language, are wont commonly to give unto divers actions and affaires, to the conditions, naures and manners of sundry persons, to speeches and orations; yea and (beleeve me) to men themselves, the termes of Heavenly and Divine. Well, a very good and expedient meane this is whereby we are to reforme and correct many sentences and verses, which seeme at the first sight to carrie with them any absurditie and incongruity, as touching Jupiter: as namely these,

Two names within the entrie stand

Of Iove his house with lots both fall:

One hath successe and winning hand,

The other losses sorrow-full.

Also:

As judge aloft sat Jupiter without regard of oth

Or covenant: and shewed signes of mischief to them both.

Likewise:

And thus began the mischiefs all of Greekes and Trojans both,

For Jupiter his pleasure wrought, and with each side was wroth.

All this we must interpret either of Fatall destinie or of Fortune, potent causes both, which neither are comprehensible within our understanding, nor yet evitable within the compasse of our power. But where we read of any thing attributed unto Jupiter, which is conformable to reason, hath semblance of truth, and is becomming his person, there we are to thinke that the said name signifieth the god himselfe: as for example,

Sir Hector then advanc'd himselfe, and all the ranks beside

Of Greeks did brave, expecting who his challenge would abide.

Onely the sonne of Telamon, Ajax that worthy knight,

He did avoid: for Jupiter unto him had a sight.

Also:

Such great affaires of mortall men

Are manag'd ay by Jupiter:

But smaller matters now and then

To petty-gods he doth refer.

Furthermore, we ought to have a diligent eie to other words, which may be turned and transferred ferred to many things, and are taken in divers senses by Poets. Of which sort is the name of Agēthē. i. Vertue. For by reason that vertue not only causeth men to be wise, prudent, just, & honest both in word and deed: but also purchaseth ordinarily unto them, honour, glorie, authoritie and reputation in the world: therefore they give the name of Vertue unto renowne, power, and might: like as the Olive fruit, they call by the name Oliva. i. Olive tree, and the Beech-mast they terme also Agēthē as well as the Beech tree. Our yong man then, as he readeth in a Poet,

The gods before vertue have set Labour, travail, and painfull swee.

Or thus,

The Greeks by vertue then downe bare Their Squadron thicke and battell square.

Likewise,

*If die we must, most glorious is death,
For vertue, when we spend our vitall breath,*

presently ought to conceive thus much, That all is spoken of the best, most excellent, and diviniest habitude in us, which we understand to be the verie rectitude and rule of reason and judgement, the height and perfection of our reasonable humane nature, yea, and the disposition of the soule, accordant with it selfe. But when he readeth againe these other verses there,

*Vertue in men Love causeth for to grow
And fade: by him it doth both ebbe and flow.*

As also,

*Where worldly wealth and riches are,
Vertue and fame follow not farre.*

let him not by and by set him downe, and by occasion of these words have the rich in woonderfull great admiration, as if they could anon buy vertue for money, and with their wealth have it at command: let him not thinke, I say, that it lieth in the power of Fortune, either to augment or to diminish vertue: but rather deeme thus, and make this construction, that the Poet under the name Vertue, signifieth Worthip, Authoritie, Power, Prosperitie, or some such matter. For to the word Agēthē is sometimes taken by them in the native and proper signification, for a naughty and wicked disposition of the minde, as when Hesiodus writeth thus,

*Of wickednesse a man may evermore
Have sojron great and plenteous store.*

But otherwise it is used for some other evill calamitie or infortunite, as by Homer,

*Men quickly age and waxen olde,
In yagitions, with hunger and cold, &c.*

And much were he deceived, who should perfwade himselfe that Poets take beatitude and blessednesse, which in Greeke is called Eudaimonia, so precisely as Philosophers doe; who understand thereby, an absolute habitude, and entire possession of all good things, or rather an accomplished perfection of this life; holding on a prosperous course according to nature: for many times Poets abuse this word, calling a man blessed and happie, who is rich in world goods; and 40 giving the terme of felicitie and happinesse unto great power, fame and renowne. As for Homer, he useth verily these termes aright and properly in this verse,

*Although much wealth I do holde and enjoy,
Yet in my heart I take no blessed joy.*

So doth Menander when he writeth thus,

*Of goods I have and money great store,
And all men call me rich therefore.*

But yet how rich soe ever I seeme, Happie and blest none doth me deeme.

Euripides maketh great disorder and confusion, when he writeth in this sort;

*I would not have that blessed life
Wherein I finde much paine and griefe.*

Also in another place,

*Why do'st thou honor tyranny,
Happie injustice and villany?*

unlesse a man, as I said before, take these termes as spoken metaphorically or by the figure metonymie. i. the abuse of them; otherwise than in their proper sense. And thus much may serve as touching this point.

Now for this that remaineth behind, yong men would be put in remembrance and admonished not once but oftentimes, that Poetrie, having for her proper subject an argument to be expressed by imitation; howsoever she useth the ornaments & beautiful furniture of figurative speeches, in setting out and describing those matters and actions which are presented unto her, yet nevertheless she doth not forgo the resemblance and likelihood of truth. For that imitation indeed delighteth the Reader so long onely as it carrieth some shew of probability. And therefore that imitation which seemeth not altogether to square and depart from the rule of veritie, doth expresse the signes of vertues and vices both at once, entermingled one with another in actions. Such is the Poeme and composition written by Homer, which resteth not in the strange opinions and paradoxes of the Stoicks, who holde, That neither any evill at all can sort with vertue, ne yet one jot of goodnesse with vice: but he hath bidden farewell to such precise positions; namely, That a foolish and lewd person, in all his actions, when and wheresoever, doth offend and sinne: and semblably, the wise and vertuous man, at all times and in all places, can not chuse but do every thing well. These are the principles which the Stoicks schooles resound withall. Howbeit, in the affaires of this world, and in our dayly life and conversation, as Euripides saith,

*It cannot be in everie point,
That good and bad should be disjoint:
But in all actions we daily see,
One with another medled will be.*

But the Art of Poetrie setting apart the truth in deede, useth most of all varietie and sundry formes of phrases. For, the divers imitations are they, that give to fables that vertue to move affections & passions in the readers: these are they, that worke strange events in them, even contrarie to their opinion and expectation: upon which ensueth the greatest woonder, and astonishment, wherein lieth the chiefe grace, and from whence proceedeth the most delight and pleasure, whereas, contrariwise, that which is simple and uniforme, is not pathetical nor hath in 30 it any fiction. Hereupon it is that Poets bring not in the same persons alwaies winners, alwaies happy and doing wel: and that which more is, when they feigne that the gods themselves meddle in mens affaires, they describe them not without their passions, nor yet exempt from errors & faults, for feare, lest that part of their Poetrie which stirreth up the affection, & holdeth in suspense and admiration the mindes of men, should become idle and dull, for want of some danger and adversarie as it were to excite and quicken it: which being so, let us bring a yong man to the reading of Poets works, not fore-stalled and possessed before with such an opinion as touching those great and magnificall names of ancient worthies, as if they had bene wise and just men, or vertuous Princes in the highest degree of perfection, and as a man would saie, the very Canon rule, and paterne of all vertue, uprightness and integritie: Otherwise he should 40 receive great damage thereby, in case I say he were of this minde to approve and have in admiration all that they did or said as singular; and to be offended at nothing that he heareth from them: neither would he allow of him, who blameth and findeth fault with them when they either do or say such things as these.

*O father Love, o Phoebe bright, o Pallas maiden pure:
That you would all bring this about, and make us twaine secure,
That not one Trojane might escape, nor Greeke remaine aline
But we two knights: That we (I say) and none but we believe
May win the honor of this warre, and onely reape the joy
Of victory, to see the walls and stately towres of Troy,*

Also

*I heard the voice most piteous of Pryams daughter bright,
Cassandra faire a virgin chaste: whom me for to delight,
My wife dame Clytemnestra slew, by cruell reacherie,
Because of us she jelous was for sinne of lecherie.*

Likewise

Likewife

*With conebine of Father mine I've conſelme to lie,
The old mans curſe that I might have: perſwaded ſo did I.*

And in another place,

*O Iupiter whom men do further call,
thou art a Godmoſt miſchievous of all.*

Let not a young man in any wife be accuſtomed to praiſe ſuch ſpeeches: neither let him ſeek any colourable pretences to cloke and excuſe wicked and infamous acts: he muſt not be ſtudious and cunning in ſuch inventions, to ſhew therein his ſubtiltie and promptneſſe of wit. But rather he is to thinke thus, that Poſſie is the verie imitation of maners, conditions and lives, 10 yea and of men, ſuch as are not altogether perfect, pure and irreprehenſible, but in whom paſſions, falſe opinions and ignorance beare ſome ſway, yet ſo, as many times by the dexteritie and goodneſſe of nature they be reformed and diſpoſed to better waies. When a young man then is thus prepared, and his underſtanding ſo framed, that when things are well done and ſaid,
then is thus prepared, and his underſtanding ſo framed, that when things are well done and ſaid, well pleaſed with lewd deeds or words, but highly offended thereat, certes, ſuch inſtruction of his judgement will be a meanes that he ſhal both heare and read any Poemes without hurt and danger. But he that admireth al, & applieth himſelfe ſo, that he embraceth every thing, he I ſay, that commeth with a judgement devoted and enthrall'd to thoſe magnificent and heroicke names, like unto thoſe diſciples who counterfeited to be crump ſhouldred and bunched backe like their 20
maſter Plato, or would needs ſtur, ſtammer and maſſe as Ariſtotele did: ſurely ſuch a one will take no great heed, but ſoone apprehend and intertaine many evill things. Moreover this young beginner of ours ought not to be affected after a timorous and ſuperſtitious manner, as they are who being in a temple feare and dread every thing, and are readie to worſhip and adore whatſoever they ſee or heare: but boldly and confidently to pronounce and ſay as occaſi-on ſerveth, This is ill done, or not decently ſpoken: no leſſe than to give his acclamation and conſent to that which is well and ſeemely either ſaid or done. As for example, Achilles ſeeing the ſoldiors how they fell ſicke daily in the campe, and not well appaid that the war was thus drawn out in length, eſpecially to the hinderance of his owne honour, being a martiall man, of great prowefſe and renowe in the field, aſſembled a counſell of war and called the 30 Greeks together. But, (as he was a man otherwiſe well ſcene in the ſkill of Phyſick) perceiving by the ninth day paſt, (which commonly is criticall, and doth determine of maladies one way or other by courſe of nature) that it was no ordinary diſeaſe, nor proceeding from uſuall cauſes, ſtood up to make a ſpeech, not framing himſelfe to pleaſe and gratifie the common people, but to give counſell unto the king himſelfe in this manner.

I thinke we muſt when all is done, O Agamemnon Leege, Returne againe without effect to Greece, and leave our ſeige.

This was well and wiſely ſaid: theſe were modeſt and temperate words becomming his perſon:
But when the prophet or ſoothſaier ſaid, that he feared much the wrath and indignation of the mightieſt man and ſoveraigne commander of al the Greeks, he answered then never a wiſe or ſober word; for having ſworne a great oth, that no man ſhould be ſo hardy as to lay hand on the ſaid prophet ſo long as he remained alive, he added moreover and ſaid full unſeemely,

*No, if thou ſhouldeſt both meane and name
King Agamemnon, I vow the ſame.*

Shewing plainly by theſe words, what little account he made of his prince, and how he contem-ned ſoveraigne authoritie: nay he overpaſſed himſelfe more yet, and proceeded farther in heat of choler, to lay hand upon his ſword, yea and to draw it forth with a full purpoſe to kill the king: which was done of him neither well for his owne honour, nor wiſely for the good of the State. But repenting himſelfe immediately

*Into the ſkabbard then anon, he puts his daught'ry ſword:
Minerva gave him that adviſe, and he obey'd her word.*

Herein againe he did well and honeſtly: for having not the power to extinguiſh and quench his choler quite, yet he delaied it well and reſſeſſed it, yea and brought it under the obedience of reaſon, before it brake out into any exceſſive outrage, which had bene remedileſſe. Sem-blably Agamemnon himſelfe, for that which he did and ſaid in the aſſembly of Counſell, he was woorthy

woorthy to be ſcorned and laughed at. But in the matter concerning the Damoſell Chryſeis, he ſhewed more gravitie and princely Maſteſtie, than in like caſe Achilles did: for he, when the faire
Brizeis was taken from him and led away:

Sat weeping in great agonie Retir'd apart from companie.

But Agamemnon himſelfe in perſon conducting her as farre as to the ſhip, delivering up and ſending away to her owne father, the woman whom a little before he ſaid that he loved more deerely than his owne eſpouſed wife, did nothing unfitting himſelfe or like a paſſionate lover.
Again, Phoenix being curſed by his father and betaken to all the helliſh ſtends for lying with his concubine, breaketh out into theſe words,

*I minded once with ſword of mine my fathers blood to ſhead:
But that ſome god my rage reſt, and put it in my head:
How men would cry much blame on me, and namely Gracians all
With one voice me a parricide or Father killer call.*

Which verſes in Homer, Ariſtarchus was afraid to let ſtand; and therefore daſhed them out.
But verily, they ſerve in that place fitly for the purpoſe, namely, when Phoenix inſtructeth Achilles, what a violent paſſion anger is, and how there is no outrage but men will dare and do in the heat of choler, when they will not be guided with reaſon, or directed by the counſell of thoſe that would appeaſe them. For he bringeth in Neleus alſo, who was angrie with his citizens, howbeit afterwards pacified: In which example, as he wiſely blameth and reprooveth ſuch paſſions: ſo he praiſeth and commendeth as a good and expedient thing, not to be led and carried away therewith, but to reſiſt and conquer them; and to take up betime and repent. True it is, that hitherto in theſe places already cited, there is a manifeſt difference to be obſerved: but where there is ſome obſcurity as touching the true ſenſe and meaning of a ſentence, we muſt teach a young man to ſtay himſelfe there and pauſe upon the point, that he may be able to diſ-tinguiſh in this manner: If Nauſicaa upon the firſt ſight of Viſſes, a meere ſtranger, falling into the ſame paſſion of love with him, as Calypſo did, and ſeeking nothing but wanton pleaſure, as one living daintily, and being now ripe and readie for marriage, utter fooliſhly theſe and ſuch like words, and that before her waiting maids:

*O that it were my hap, ſo brave
A knight to wed who hath my hart:
O that he would with me vouchſafe for to remaine and not depart.*

Her boldneſſe and incontinencie is to be reprooved: but if by his ſpeech and talke, ſhe perceived that he was a man of wit and wiſe behaviour, and thereupon with'd in her heart to be his wedded wife, and to dwell with him rather than with one of her owne countrie, who could ſkill of nothing elſe but to daunce or be a mariner, I cannot blame her, but thinke her praiſe woorthy.
In like caſe, if when Penelope deviſeth and talketh courtcouſly with her woers, who ſued unto her for marriage, and thereupon they court her againe and beſtow upon her gay clothes, rich jewels and other goodly ornaments fit for a Lady, Viſſes her husband rejoice

*That ſhe was well content to take Their gifts, and did to them love make,
As though ſhe would be kinde againe,
And yet her ſhewes were all but vaine.*

If I ſay he joyed, in that his wife received their courteſies and tokens, and ſo made a gainie of them, ſurely he ſurpaſſeth Poliager the notorious bawd, playing his part in the Comedies, of whom there goeth this by-word:

*Bawde Poliager happie man hee,
That keepeſ as home in houſe a kee:
A heavenly goate whoſe influence,
Brings in riches with affluence.*

But if he did it to have them by that meanes under his hand, whiles they upon hope of obtayning their ſuit, little thought of him how he watched them a ſhrewd turne: then his joy and confident aſſurance was grounded well & upon good reaſon. Semblably in the counting that he made of thoſe goods which the Phaeacians had landed when they ſet him on ſhore; and having ſo

so done, spread saile and departed backe againe: if being thus left solitarie alone and finding him selfe forlorne, he doubted of his estate and what should become of him, and yet his mind was so fet upon his goods that he feared,

*Leaft part thereof they tooke away,
Whiles that on shore asleepe he lay,*

His avarice were lamentable, nay it were abominable, I assure you: But if as some do thinke and say, being not sure whether he were in the Isle Ithaca or no, he supposed that the safety of his goods and money, was a certaine prooffe and demonstration of the Phæacians loyaltye and fidelitie (for never would they have transported him into a strange land but for lucre; nor when they left him and departed would have forborne his goods) he used herein no foolish argument, 10 and his providence in so doing is commendable. Some there be who finde fault with this verie landing of him upon the shore, in case the Phæacians did it whiles he was asleepe in deed: and they say that it appeereth by a certaine Chronicle or Historie among the Tuscanes which they keepe by them, that Ulysses was given by nature to be verie drowsie; which was the cause, that to many he was not affable, and men oftentimes might hardly speake with him. Now if this was no sleepe in very truth, but that being both ashamed to send away the Phæacians who had conducted him over sea, without feasting them & giving them presents and rewards for their kindness: and also in feare least if they were seene there still upon the coast, whiles he entertained them so kindly, himselfe might be discovered by his enemies, he used this pretense of feigned sleepe to cover and hide the perplexitie wherein he was, or to thrust off this difficultie wherein he stood in this case, they allow and commend him for it. In giving therefore to yoong men such 20 advertisementes as these, we shall never suffer them to runne on still to the corruption of their manners, but rather imprint in them presently a fervent zeale and hartie desire to chuse better things, namely, if we proceed directly to praise this and to dispraise that. And this would be done especially in Tragedies, those I meane, wherein fine words and affected speeches be oftentimes framed to cloke dishonest and villanous deeds. For that which Sophocles saith in one place, is not alwaies true:

*If that it be a naughtie deed,
Of it good words cannot proceed.*

For even himselfe is wont many times to palliate wicked conditions, yea, and naughtie acts 30 with pleasant speeches and familiar apparant reasons, which carie a probabilitye of sufficient excuse. And even so plaith Euripides his companion, who shewed himselfe upon the same stage: for see you not, how he bringeth in Phædra to begin with her husband Theseus, First, laying all the blame on him; as if forsooth the wrongs and abules that he offered unto her, were the cause that she was enamoured upon Hippolytus: The like audacious and bold speech he putteth in Helena mouth against queene Hecuba, in that Tragedie which is entituled Troades, objecting unto her, and saying, That she was rather to be punished, for bearing such a sonne as Alexander Paris, who committed the adulterie with her. A yoong man then, ought not to accustom himselfe to thinke any such inventions as these to be pretie, gallant and wittie, ne yet laugh at such 40 subtle and fine devices; but to abhorre and detest as much, or rather more, wanton and filthie words, than loose and dishonest deeds.

Moreover, it would be expedient, in all speeches to search the cause whereupon they do proceed; after the example of Cato when he was a litle boy: For, do he would whatsoever his Master or Tutor bad; but ever and anon hee would be inquisitive and questioning with him the reason of his commandements. And yet we are not to beleve and obey Poets, as we ought either Schoole-masters or Law-givers, unless the matter by them propoosed have reason for the ground: and grounded then it shalbe thought upon reason, if it be good and honest: for if it be wicked, it ought to seeme foolish and vaine. But many of these men there be, who are verie 50 sharpe and curious in searching and demanding what Hesiodus should meane in this verse,

*Whiles men are drinking, doe not set
The flagon over the wine goblet.*

as also what sense may be made of these verses in Homer:

*Another chariot who mounted it,
When from his owne he is alight,
Must not bin speare and invellin mit,*

But

But trust thereto, and therewith fight.

but other sentences, wis, of greater importance and danger, they admit soone, and give credit thereto, without further enquiry & examination: as for example, at these verses they sticke not,

*The privitie to fathers vice
Or mothers fault reprochable,
Will him debase, who ot herwise,
Is hardie, stout, and commendable.*

no more than they doe at this,

*Upon a man, if fortune frowne,
His heart therewith must be cast downe.*

10 And yet such sayings as these, come nere unto us, and touch the quicke, troubling our maner and behaviour in this life, imprinting in us perverse judgements, base and unmanly opinions, unless we acquaint our selves to contradict ech of them in every point, after this maner. And wherefore ought he to beare an abject minde, who is crossed with adverte fortune? why rather should not he make head againe, and wrestle with her, bearing himselfe so much the more aloft, and never endure to be troden downe and depressed by her? what reason is there, that my heart should be done; for that my father was vicious and foolish, in case I be a wife and honest man my selfe? Is there greater cause that the ignorance and imperfection of my father should keepe me downe and discourage me, that I dare not looke up; than mine owne knowledge and valour 20 make me take heart and put my selfe forth? He that will thus encounter, withstand, and not give way to every speech, turning side, as it were, to every puffe of wind, but rather esteeme that sentence of Heraculum to be well and truly spoken,

*A foolish and witlesse man is he,
With every word who stricken will be.*

Such a one, I say, shalbe able to put by and repell many sayings of Poets, that are neither true nor profitable. And thus much as touching those observations which may serve a yoong mans turne, that he may reade and heare Poets safe without any danger.

But forasmuch as it falleth out, that as in Vines many times, the grapes lie hidden among the leaves and branches, and cannot be seene by reason that they are covered and shadowed there- 30 with: so also in poeticall verses, under fables and fictions there be covertly couched many profitable and hollowe lessons, which a yoong man cannot eiepie by himselfe, and therefore he misseeth that commoditie and fruit which is to be reaped out thereof. Howbeit, we must not suffer this, nor let him turne away, and give over: he ought not (I say) to wander aside, but sticke close and fast to those matters especially, which leade unto vertue, and make any thing for the forming or reforming of maners. In which regard, I shall not do amisse, if I treat also of this matter briefly; making, as it were, a first draught onely, and touching summarily the principall points; leaving long discourses, by way of narration, confirmation, and a multitude of examples, to those that write of purpose for more shew and ostentation. First and for most therefore, when a yoong man knoweth thoroughly the persons of men and women, their natures also and 40 maners both good and bad, let him then regard and consider well the sayings and doings which the Poet doth attribute aptly unto either of them. As for example, Achilles saith unto Agamemnon these words, although he speaketh them in choler,

*For never shall I honour have,
Nor equall recompense to you,
When populous Troy, that city brave,
The Greeks shall force, as they do vow.*

But Thersites reviling the selfe same Agamemnon, useth these termes;

*Much brasse vessels thou hast now in many a goodly tent,
Of captive women eke like those, in beauty excellent,
In thy pavilion: whom we Greeks, as to our Soveraigne,
Do give, so soone as any towne by martiall force we gaine.*

50 Again Achilles in another place hath this humble speech,
*If Iupiter will be so good, as to fulfill our joy,
And grant that we one day may win the stately city Troy.*

But Thersites commeth out with this proud word,

D

Whom

*Whom either I, or in my stead,
Some Greeke shall bound as captive lead.*

Semblably in another place, when in the review of the armie, Agamemnon passing along the bands, rebuked and taunted Diomedes, he answered not againe, nor gave him one crosse word:

*For why he feared in modestie
The checks of his dread Majestie.*

But Sthenelus, of whom no man made any reckoning, was so bolde as to reply and say,
*Sir Agamemnon Atreus sonne, for beare thus for to lie,
You can, if that you list, with me report a truelh: for why?
Pronounce I dare, and it avow, we better warriors be
In these dayes than our fathers were, by many a degree.*

The difference which is in these personages, if it be well marked, will teach a yong man thus much: That to be modest, temperate, void of pride, and humble, is a most civill and excellent vertue: and contrariwise it will advertise him to take heed of pride and overweening; to beware also of boasting and vaunting much of himselfe, as a detestable vice. And heere in this place, expedient it is and profitable to observe the action of Agamemnon: He passed by Sthenelus, and would not stay to speake unto him: As for Phyllis, who found himselfe grieved, him he neglected not, but shaped him an answer: For as Homer writeth,

*No sooner he perceived him offended for to be,
But presently he spake againe, and thus replied be.*

For, as it is a base and servile thing, and not becomming the majestic of a Prince to answer everie one, and by way of Apologie to justify a thing done or said: so to despise and disdain all men, is meere pride and extreame follie. As for Diomedes, he did passing well to hold his peace during the time of the battell, when he was rebuked and reviled by the king, but after the fight was ended, he spake his minde freely and boldly in this wise;

*You are the first of all the Greekes, who in reprochfull wise
Have charged me for my false heart, and fearfull cowardise.*

Good also it is, to see the difference betweene a wise man in deed and a vaine soothsayer, who loved to be seene, and to heare himselfe speake among the multitude. For Calebas without all respect of chusing his time and a fit opportunitie, bashed not in publike place, and before all the people, to challenge king Agamemnon, imputing directly unto him, and to no other, the cause of the pestilence which reigned in the campe. But Nestor, contrariwise, intending to make a motion as touching the reconciliation and pacifying of Achilles, and to speake directlie unto that point, because hee would not seeme to blame and accuse the king in the audience of the people; namely, that he had passed himselfe in choler, and done amisse, adviset him in this manner, saying:

*To supper bid the ancient peeres: this doth your person fit:
And when they are together met, in order as they sit,
Let them opine, Heare their advise, and looke who speaketh best,
His counsell take I reede, and then therein see that you rest.*

And after supper, he sent forth the Embassadors accordingly. This was the onely way to correct a fault, and amend that was amisse: whereas the other had bene a very injurious accusation, and a contumelious reprooche to his no small disgrace. Furthermore, there would be noted and considered the diversitie that is in sundry nations, and that after this maner: The Trojans give the charge in battell to their enemies with great shouts, out-cries, and exceeding violence: whereas the Greekes

*The onset give with all silence,
To lenders having reverence.*

For soldiours to dread and feare their captaines and commanders, at what time as they be ready to joyned battaile with the enimie, is a signe both of valour and also of obedience and military Discipline. Which is the reason that Plato would inure us to be afraid of rebukes, reprooches and filthy acts, more than of any travels and dangers. Cato likewise was wont to say, That he loved those better who blushed and looked red, than the pale faced. As for promises, there is a proper worke also in them, whereby a man may discern whether they be wise or foolish. For Dolon promisseth in this maner

7 he

The campe of Greekes I enter will and passe on still outright Untill so Agamemnons ship, I come there for to fight.

Contrariwise Diomedes promisseth nothing of himselfe, onely this he saith: That he should feare the lesse, if he were sent with some other to beare him companie. Whereby you may see that Prudence, Discretion and Forecast be civile vertues becomming the Greekes; but audacious rashnes is naught, and fit for Barbarians. The one therefore we must embrace and imitate, the other reject and cast behinde us. Moreover it were a speculation not unprofitable to make the affections that befell unto the Trojans and to Hector at what time as he was ready to enter into combat and single fight with Ajax. Aeschylus being upon a time in place to behold the combats at the Isthmian games, it fell out so that one of the champions was hurt and wounded in the very face, whereupon the people that looked on, set up a great crie and shouted aloud: See, quoth he, what use and exercise is! the Beholders crie out, but the man himselfe that is hurt, saith never a word. In like maner, when Homer the Poet saith, that Ajax was no sooner seene in his bright compleat harness, and armed at all pieces, but the Greekes rejoiced: whereas

The Trojans all for feare did quake, and tremble every joint Hector himselfe did feeble his heart to beate even at this point.

who would not wonder to see this difference? The partie himselfe who was in danger, felt his hart only to leape, as if he had bene (I assure you) to wrestle for the best game, or to run a race for the prize: but they that saw him, trembled and shaked all their bodie over, for feare of the perill wherein their prince was, and for kind affection that they bare unto him. It is woorth the noting also what odds and difference there is betweene the most resolute or valiant Capitaine, and the greatest coward: For it is said of Thersites that

Achilles of all that were in the Host And also Vlysses he hated most.

whereas Ajax as he alwaies loved Achilles, so he giveth an honorable testimonie thereof, when he speaketh unto Hector in this wise,

*In single fight with me alone what woorthy knight we have
In Grecian host, thou maist not see besides Achilles brave:
Achilles be, the Paragon of Prowesse whom we count
Whose Lions hart undaunted yet all others doth surmount.*

This is a singular commendation of Achilles particularly: but that which followeth afterwards, is aptly spoken to the praise of all in generall:

Wot well that many of us there be in Campe that dare and can Make head, and maintaine fight with thee in combas man to man.

Marke, how he praifeth not himselfe, to be the man alone or the most valourous of all other, but is content to be raunged with many more as sufficient men to make their part good against him. Thus much may serve as touching the diversitie of persons, unlesse we will adde this: 40 moreover, That of Trojans we read there were many taken prisoners alive by their enemies, but of the Greekes not one: as also that divers of them became humble suppliants to their enemies and fell downe at their feet: namely Adrastus, the sonnes of Antimachus and Lycan: yea and Hector himselfe besought Achilles to vouchsafe him buriall: whereas, there was not one of them that did the like: As if thus much were implied thereby, that it is the maner of Barbarians in fight, to make supplication, to submit, to kneele and lie prostrate before the enimie: but of Grecians, either to win the victorie by maine fight, or to die for it.

Moreover, like as in pasturage and feeding, the Bee seeth upon flowres: the goate searcheth after greene leaves and brouseth yong buds: the Swine searcheth for roots, and other beasts for the seed & fruit: Even so in reading Poemes, one gathereth the flowre of the History: 50 another cleaveth to the elegancie of phrase and furniture of words, as Aristophanes was wont to say of Euripides,

*Histoing so round doth please my mind,
In stile so smooth, content I finde.*

Others there be who affect morall sentences aptly fitted to the reformation of maners. Those therefore with whom now we have to deale, and to whom we direct our speech, we are to admo-

nith, that it were a shame and unwoorthy thing, if either he who setteth his minde upon fables should marke well the witty narrations, and singular fine inventions therein: or he that delighteth in eloquence should note diligently the pure and elegant phrase, the artificiall rhetoric also, as he readeth: whiles he, that would seeme to affect honor, to studie honestie, and to take Poets in hand not for delight, pleasure and pastime, but for the insight of learning, and for the treasure of knowledge, readeth and heareth carelessly and without fruits, those sentences which are penned and delivered by them to the recommendation of fortitude, temperance and justice: For as concerning valor and vertue you shall finde these verses,

*What is befall'n for Diomedes,
that we forget to fight?
How is it that our harts be done?
where is our Martiall might?
Come neere, sit and close unto my side,
great shame it were for us,
if Hector now should board our ships and force our navie thine.*

For to see a most wise and prudent capitaine who was in danger to perish; and to be overwhelmed together with the whole armie, not to be afraid of death, but to feare reproch and shamefull disgrace, the same no doubt will cause a young man to be woonderfully affectionate to vertue and prowess.

For wisdom and justice these verses serve:

*Minerva then tooke great delight
To see the man wise and upright.*

Such a sentence as this, will give occasion to a young scholler thus to reason and discourse: The Poet here hath devised, that the goddesse joyed not in a rich man, in one that was faire, well favoured and personable, or mighty in bodily strength: but in him that was prudent and just withall. And in another place where the same goddesse saith, that she will not neglect nor forsake Vlisses and leave him destitute:

*For toong he hath and wit at will:
He is both wise and full of skill:*

The Poet sheweth plainly; That there is nothing in us but vertue onely, that is divine and beloved of the gods: if this be true that Like will to like, and Naturally everie thing delighteth in the Semblable. Now forasmuch as it seemeth to be a great matter and rare perfection, as in truth it is no lesse, to be able to master and bridle anger: certes a greater vertue it is and a gift more singular to prevent and wisely to forecast, that we fall not into choler, nor suffer our selves to be surpris'd therewith: And therefore the readers of Poets ought to be advertis'd in these points, not coldly but in good earnest: as namely, how Achilles, a man by nature nothing mecke, milde and patient, giveth warning unto Priamus to be quiet, and not to provoke him, in these wordes:

*Take heed old father I thee reed,
how thou my cholere move:
I minded am thy sonne to reeld:
For why? from Love above
A messenger hath warn'd me so:
Beware Gray-beard, I say,
Least that my tent will not thee seeve,
but forthwith I thee slay:
Although in humble wise thou come,
with suppliants habit dight,
And so I do transgresse Loves will and breake the lawes of right.*

Who also after he had washed the corps of Hector, and wound it within Funerall clothes, bestowed the same with his owne hands in the chariot, before that Priamus his father should see it, so unisul'd as it was,

For feare lest when he saw *his sonne, so mangled and beraid

In griefe of heart, as a father he,
should not himselfe be staid:
But with but words Achilles move
in him to sheath his sword:
With out regard of Iupiter, his bests,
his will and word.*

For when a man is apt and prone to anger, as being of nature hot, rough and choleticke, to know himselfe so given, and therewith to prevent, decline and avoid all occasions of yre, and by the guidance of reason to hold of, in such sort, that even as it were against his will he shall not fall into any passionate fits, is a point of great wisdom and singular providence. After the same manner ought he that is given to wine, to be armed against drunkenness: he also that is by nature amorous, should thus withstand wanton love: Like as Agessilam, who would not abide to be killed of a beautifull young boy comming toward him: and Cyrus, who durst not so much as set his eie upon faire Pamhea. Whereas contrariwise, those that be ill nourished and badly brought up, seeke all meanes and occasions to kindle and enflame their foolish affections, mistaking matter thereto, as fewell unto fire: casting themselves headlong and that wilfully into those vices, whereunto they are most prone and ready to fall by nature. But Phisist not onely brided and repressed his owne choler when he was chafed, but also perceiving by some words of Telemachus his sonne, that he was angrie and hatefully bent against lewd persons, he laboured to appease and mitigate his moode: he dealt with him before hand, willing and commanding him to be quiet, to forbear and have patience.

*My sonne, if that by word or deed
In mine owne house they me abuse,
Bite in thine anger, I thee reed,
Seest thou indure, and patience use:
Nay if they draw me by the foot,
And out of doores me drag awone,
Or their sharpe arrowes as me shooor,
See all, say nought, what ever is done.*

For like as men use not to bridle their horses when they be running in a race, but before they begin their course; even so they that hardly can digest indignities, and upon occasion offered are quickly angrie, ought first to be preoccupied with reason: and being thus prepared beforehand, to bring them to the combat.

Over and besides, a young man must not negligently passe over the bare words as hee readeth. And yet I speake not this, as though I would have him play upon them, as Cleambes did, who making semblance to interpret and expound words, would otherwhiles cavill and make sport. For where as we reade in Homer,

Σὺ δὲ μάστιγι δίδου μὲν ἄνδρῳ. & Σὺ δὲ ἀνὰ δαδὸν αἶε.

He would have us to reade these two last words in one, by way of epith, thus, Σὺ δὲ ἀνὰ δαδὸν αἶε, as if forsooth, the aire which by exhalation is elevated, and doth rise from the earth, should therefore be called ἀνὰ δαδὸν αἶε. Chrysippus likewise many times comes in with his bald reasons, without all grace: and this he doeth not in jest and meriment, but he would seeme to devise reasons subtilly; and so fortheth divers words impertinently: as namely, when he wresteth these words, Εὐρίπιδος Κερίδαν, to this sense, as if εὐρίπιδος should signifie one that was eager and quick in disputation or argument, surpassing others in force of eloquence. It were better for us to leave the nice subtilties of words and syllables unto Grammarians for to be scanned, and to consider more neerely other observations, which, as they yeeld greater profit, so they cary with them more probability and likelihood of truth: and namely to picke some good out of these verses;

*Most crasse unto my minde it is,
For taught I am proesse in wia.*

*Alfo,
Full well he knew, to every wight
To shew himselfe a courteous knight.*

For hereby he declareth evidently, that valour and fortitude is gotten by teaching; as also, he is of opinion, That to be milde, affable and kinde to every man, is a gracious vertue, proceeding from science and reason: whereupon he exhorteth us, not to be carelesse of our selves, but to learne good and honest things, by giving care unto our teachers: for that cowardise, follie, and perverse incivillitie, be the defects of learning, and are meete ignorance indeed. Hæceto accordeth very well, that which the same Poet Homer saith of Iupiter and Neptune:

Beholde one father both they had,

and country one them bread:

But Iupiter was former borne,
and had the vnder head.

He declareth hereby that wisdom is a most divine and princely qualitie; wherein he placeth the soveraigne and highest excellencie of Iupiter, as exceeding all other good parts to accompany that soveraigne and heavenly vertue. We are likewise to acquaint a young man to heare; and that with no heave and dull care, but attentively and with a vigilant minde; these other verses;

Right wise he is, and wot you well,
A lie for no good will he tell.

Also,

Antiochus, reputed ay for wise, you are to blame
My steeds to hurt mine honour eke thus for to staine with shame.

Likewise,

You, a woorthie knight, to speake so foolishly!
I would have said you had, in wit, past all men verily.

These sentences import thus much; That wise men will never speake untruths: neither will they in battell behave themselves as cowards, and use deceit in fight, ne yet charge unjust imputations upon others without reason. Also when the Poet saith, that he through his folly suffered himselfe to be induced & perfwaded to breake the truce and league, he sheweth plainly, That he thinketh a wise man will in no wise commit unrighteousnesse. The like may of a young man be taught, as touching continencie and chastitie, especially, if he consider well these verses.

K. Proetus wife, Dame Antea, him lov'd and wooed soone
For to embrace her secretly, and lie with her alone:
But never would he yeeld there to, Belleryphon was wife,
And in his heart he never let such thoughts for to arise.

As also these,

Dame Clytemnestro first was chaste, and wanton tricks rejected
All while she was by reason led, and wisdoms love directed.

In these places we see, that the Poet attributeth the cause of continencie and pudicitie unto wisdom. Furtherward in those exhortations whereby capitaines use to encourage their soldiers to fight, when the Poet exhortes inferreth these and such like speeches,

Ey, fy for shame ô Lycians,
you are now light of foote,
To runne away thus as you do,
in it it will not boote.

Also:

A conflict sharpe is toward, Sirs,
wherefore let every one Set shame and just revenge in fight,
else all, I doubt, is gone.

By which words the Poet seemeth to ascribe fortitude unto shamefastnesse and modestie: For that, those who are bashfull and ashamed to commit filthinesse, are able likewise not onely to overcome voluptuous pleasures; but also to undergoe all dangerous adventures. By occasion whereof Timotheus also in his Poeme entituled Persea was mooved not unaptly to encourage the Greekes to fight, saying thus:

Have none shame in reverence
and honour her, I you advise.
She helpeth Protesse, and from hence

the victorie doth off arise.

Achylus also reputeth it a point of wisdom, not to be vaine-glorious nor desirous to be seene of the multitude, ne yet to be lifted up with the pusses of popular praise, when he describeth Amphiaraus in this wise:

He seeketh not to seeme the very best,
But for to be the best in word and deed:
He sowed bath within his woorthie breast,
In furrow deepe, all good and vertuous seed,
Which yeeld both lease & fruit in season due;
I meane sage counsel joind with honor true.

For the part it is of a wise man and of good conceit, to stand upon his owne botome, that is to say, to rest in himselfe, and to thinke highly of his owne resolutions and courtes as the verie best. Thus you see how all good things being reduced unto prudence, there is no kinde of vertue but it commeth to a man afterwards, and is acquired by learning and discipline.

Moreover, like as Bees have this propertie by nature to finde and sucke the mildest and best honie, out of the sharpest and most eager flowers; yea and from among the roughest and most prickly thornes: even so children and young men if they be well nourished and orderly inured in the reading of Poemes, will learne after a sort to draw alwaies some holefome and profitable doctrine or other, even out of those places which moove suspicion of lewd and absurd sense. At the first sight, Agamemnon may seeme suspected of avarice and bribetrie, in that he exempted from warfate, that rich * man in regard of the faire mare Aetha he gave unto him as a gift and gratuite: Eubrytus,

That unto Troy that stately towne,
he might not with him go
To serve in armes: but stay at home,
and rest there far from wo:
Where he might live in solace much,
enjoying all his owne:
For Iupiter in measure great
had wealth on him bestowed.

Howbeit, as Aristotle saith, he did very well in preferring a good mare before a man no better than he was: For I assure you a coward & hartlesse man, flowing in abundance of riches, wallowing in pleasures and delight, and thereby made effeminate, is not in price comparable either to a dog or an asse. Semblably, it may seeme that Thetis did exceeding badly to incite her sonne to pleasures, and to put him in minde of the fleshly delights of Penny: But even there, the continencie of Achilles is woorthie to be considered: who notwithstanding that he had beene enamoured of Brieteis, and saw that she was returned againe unto him, yea and knew that he had not long to live, but that his end was neere; yet neither made he haste to enjoy his pleasures while he might, nor as many men use to do, bewailed the death of his friend, sitting idly the while, doing nothing at all and neglecting the duties of his calling: but as in sorrow and griefe of heart he forbore his delights and pleasures, so in action and conduct of his regiment, he shewed himselfe a martiall and valorous man. In like manner Achilochus is not commended for this, that being to mourne and lament for the losse of his brother in law who married his sister, and was perished in the sea, he would seeme to conquer his sorrow with drinking wine & making good cheere: yet neverthelesse he allegeth a cause of his doing so, which carrieth some appearance of reason in these words:

For neither can my plaints and teares restore his life and heale:
Nor yet my mirth and pleasant sports will harme him ever a deale.

And if he were of this minde, and had reason to thinke, that in following his delights, meriments, pastimes and bankets, he could not empaire the state of his brother departed; how should our present condition be the worse and our affaires go backward, by the studie and practise of Philosophie, by managing the government of publike weale, by frequenting the common hall and courts of pleas, by going downe to the Academie and schooles of learning, or by following Agriculture and husbandrie?

And therefore the corrections of some poeticall verses by changing certaine words which practise practicke Cleanthes and Antisthenes were wont to use are not amisse. For one of them upon a time when the Athenians in full Theatre tooke offense and made a great strife at this verse:

Τὸ δ' αἰσχρὸν εἰ καὶ νόμιμον ἡγοῦσθαι δοκῇ.

What filthy thing can be that breedeth shame?

Ynlesse they thinke it so, that use the same?

quieted all the trouble presently by changing it and pronouncing another in this wise, αἰσχρὸν τὸ γ' αἰσχρὸν, καὶ νόμιμον καὶ νόμιμον.

A filthy thing, is soule and filthy still:

Thinke it, or thinke it not, That doth not skill.

As for Cleanthes when he read these verses as touching riches:

οὐκ αἰσὺν τὸ δούλειον οὐκ αἰσὺν τὸν πλοῦτον.

the meaner is not shamed:

Among good friends for to bestow, and spend upon your selfe

Your sickly body to preserve; thus use your worldly pelfe.

He altered them in this manner, and wrote thus:

οὐκ αἰσὺν τὸ δούλειον, οὐκ αἰσὺν τὸν πλοῦτον.

the richer is not shamed.

That you may it so harlots give, and pamper much your selfe:

A crasse body overthrow, abusing worldly pelfe.

Semblably Zeno reading these verses of Sophocles, ὅστις δὲ ἀνδρὶ πλεονέχῳ ἐν κοινότητι,

καὶν ἐστὶ δίκαιος καὶ δαδύρετος ποδῶν.

Who once in court of Tyrant serve, become

His slaves anon, though free they thinke he come.

turned the same and wrote this againe, ὅς ἐστι δίκαιος, καὶ δαδύρετος ποδῶν.

His slave you he cannot bee,

If he at first cometh hither free.

But you must not understand that he meaneth here by a free man, one, that is timorous, but fearelesse, magnanimous, & whose heart is not easie to be danted. What should hinder us then, 30 but that we also by such suggestions and corrections as these may reclaine and withdraw young men from the worse to the better. Whereas therefore we shall meete with these verses,

καὶ δ' οἱ καὶ τὸ γυναικῶν ἀνδραγαθίαν, ὅτι

νόστιμον μέλιμα ἐστὶ τὸ βέλτερον πόνον.

The thing that men are for to wish and most desire is this,

That when they shooe at their delights, the arrow may not mis.

Not so, but rather thus,

νόστιμον μέλιμα ἐστὶ τὸ ἀνδραγαθίαν πόνον.

That when they aime at their profit

The arrow may be sure to hit.

For to reach into those things which a man ought not to desire, yea and to obtaine and have the same is pitifull and lamentable, and in no wise to be wished for. Likewise, when we read in Alcemer thus,

Thy part of weale and woe thou must to Agamemnon have,

For Athens did not thee beget, alwaies to win or save.

We verily are thus to say rather,

Thou art to joy, and never for to grieve,

But in a meane estate delight to live.

For Athens did not Agamemnon get

The world as will to have, and finde no let.

Againe, when we meet with this verse,

Ἀλὰς ὅταν μὴ σὺ μὴ σὺν ἀνδράσι,

is this from gods above,

That they should see what thing is good,

and is not use nor love?

Sent

Sent from gods above? nay rather, it is a brutish, unreasonable, yea, a wofull and lamentable thing, that a man seeing that which is better, should for all that be caried away and transported to the worse, by reason of intemperance, slouth, and effeminate softnesse of the minde.

Also, if we light upon this sentence,

Behaviour 'tis and good carriage,

That do perswade, and not language.

Not so iwis, but maners and words together are perswasive: or rather the maners by meanes of speech, like as the horse is ruled by the bit and bridle, and as the Pilot guideth the ship by the rudder or helme. For surely vertue is furnished with no instrument or meanes so gracious with men and so familiar, as speech is.

Moreover, where you encounter these verses;

For wanton love, how stands his minde?

To male more or to female kinde?

Answer.

Both hands are right, with him, where beauty is,

Neither of twaine to him can come amis.

Nay rather thus he should have answered:

Where vertue is seated, and continence,

Both hands are like, there is no difference.

And to speake truly and more plainly, in equall balance poised he is indeed, inclining neither the one way nor the other: Whereas contrariwise, he that with pleasure and beautie swaith to and fro, is altogether left handed, inconstant, and incontinent.

Read you at any time this verse?

Ὅστις τὸ δίκαιον οὐκ ἀποδοῖ βέλτιον.

Religion true, and right godlinesse

Make wise men too fearefull alwaies, more or lesse.

In no wise admit thereof, but say thus:

Ὅστις τὸ δίκαιον οὐκ ἀποδοῖ βέλτιον.

Religion true, and right godlinesse,

Make wise men bolde, and hardy, more or lesse.

For in trueth, feare and despaire, by the meanes of religion, ariseth in the hearts of none but of fooles, unthankfull and senselesse persons, who have in suspection and do dread that divine power which is the first cause of all good things, as hurtfull unto them. Thus much concerning correction of sentences.

There is besides an amplification of that which we read, whereby a sentence may be stretched farther than the bare wordes import. And thus Chrysippus hath rightly taught us how to transfer and apply that which was spoken of one onely thing, to many of the like kinde, and so to make a profitable use thereof: for after this manner when Hesiodus saith,

An ox or cow a man shall never loose,

If neighbour his be not malicious.

He meaneth by ox or cow, his dog likewise and asse, yea, and all things else that may perish. Semblably, whereas Euripides saith thus,

A slave indeed, whom may we justly call?

Even him, of death who thinketh not all.

We must understand that he meant and spake, aswell of labour, affliction and sicknesse, as of death. And verily, as physicians finding the vertue and operations of a medicine applyed and fitted to one maladie, by the knowledge thereof can skill how to accommodate the same to all others of the like nature, and use it accordingly; even so, when we meete with a sentence that is common, and whereof the profit may serve to many purposes, we ought not to oversee and neglect the manifold use thereof, and leave it as appropriate to one onely matter: but to handle the same so, that it may be applied to all of like fort: and herein we must inure and exercise young men, to see and know readily this communion, and with a quicke conceit to transfere that which they finde apt and proper in many, and by examples to be practised and made prompt therein, so as they be able to marke at the first hearing the semblable: To the ende that when they come to read in Menander this verse,

*A happy man we may him call,
Who hath much wealth, and wit withall.*

They may verie well thinke that in naming wealth, he meant and included Honor, authoritie and eloquence. Also, that the imputation which Vlysses charged upon Achilles, sitting idly in the Iland Seyros, among the yooing maidens and damofels, in these words,

*You sir, whose father was a knight,
The best that ever drew
His sword, of all the Greekes in fight
and many a captaine slew:
Sir you here carding like a wench
and spinning wooll on rocke, Thereby the glorious light to quench
of your most noble stocke?*

may be applyd unto any loose liver and voluptuous wanton, unto a covetous and wretched miser, unto an idle luskie, an untaught or ignorant lozell. As for example, in lieu of this verse in the foresaid imputation,

Gaius deus natus in laeta regis

*What, what, good sir? are you become a spinster now for need,
Whose father was of all the Greekes a knight of doughtiest deed.*

A man may read and not unfitly thus,

*Can you carouse so lustily and so the pot so round,
Whose father knew to shake a speare and stoutly stand his ground?
Or after this manner,*

*Your courage serves to hazard all at casting of three dies
Your fathers heart was tried in war and martiall jeopardies.*

Either thus,

opponens deus, &c.

*You cunning are to play at quites the game,
Whereas your fire, by promise was much same.*

Or in this wise,

remans deus, &c.

*Are you become indeed a Tavernour,
Whose father was a worthy governour?*

Or lastly thus,

remans deus, &c.

*In hundred ten, you can full well call for at such a day,
Your father tens and hundreds knew, to range in battell ray.*

And in one word, so well as you are descended there is no goodnes nor great thing in you worthy the noble parentage. Moreover, where you happen upon these verses,

*What tell you me of Pluto and his chievance,
For such a god as he with all his puissance.
I worship not: since that the lewdest reach
In all the world, to wealth may quickly reach:*

A man may say as much of glory, of outward beauty, of the rich mantels of a captaine generall, of a Bishops mitre, and the sacred coronet of a priest, which we see the wickedest wretches in the world may attaine unto. Again, whereas the words of another verse import thus much only:

*That children gotten of cowardise,
Be foule and those whom men despise.*

The same verily do imply also, that Intemperance, Superstition, Envie, and all other vices and maladies of the minde, bring forth no better offspring. Now whereas Homer saide excellent well in one place:

*Paris a coward thou art for sooth,
For all thy face so faire and smooth.*

And

And in another,

*Sir Hector in the prime of age,
With lovely looks and faire visage.*

(For by these termes and epithits, he sheweth coverly that a man deserveth blame and reproch, who is endued with no better grace and gift than beaurtie) we may well and fitly apply this reprehension to such like things: namely, to plucke downe their peacocks plumes, who vaunt and glorifie themselves for matters of no moment and value: teaching yooing men thereby, that such praises as these, be no better than contumelies and reproches: As for example, when a man is saluted in this manner: O most excellent for riches, for keeping a bountifull table, for many servitours: right excellent for singular good teames of draught oxen, caples and moles, for stables of steeds and greashorses: yea or thus moreover to the rest: O surpassing orator and of woonderfull eloquence: for to speake a truth, a man is to aime at excellencie and preferencie before others in good and honest things, that in the chiefe and principall he may be the highest and formost: as also in great matters, the greatest: for the reputation that groweth from smal and base things is dishonorable, illiberal, vile, & of no worth. And verily this example last alleaged, putteth us straightwaies in minde, to consider better the reprehensions and praises which offer themselves especially in the Poemes of Homer: For certes, they give us expressly to understand one notable instruction, to wit, Not highly to esteeme the gifts either of body or of fortune. For first and formest (in those titles which they give one to another in reciprocall greetings) when they meet and shake hands, the manner is not to salute by the name of Beautiful, Rich or Strong, but they use such commendations as these,

Vlysses o most noble knight, from Iupiter first descended, Laertes sonne, for wisdom, and much wit, yet most commended.

Also

O Hector some of Priamus king, Equall to love in wisdom and cunning.

Likewise,

Achilles o of Pelcus the most redoubted sonne, Chiefe glory of the worthy Greekes, their light and shining sunne.

And againe,

*Patroclus o sonne of Menætius,
Most lovely in my hart and gracious.*

Semblably when they are disposed to revile and taunt, they twit not one another with any defects and imperfections of the bodie, but touch them expressly with the vices of the mind, after this manner,

Thou drunken sot, as shamelesse as the dogs that use to barke Thou coward base as hartlesse as the stags that run in parke.

And thus,

Thou wrangling Ajax of Barrotters chiefe Dividing nought but evill and mischief.

Semblably,

*Idomeneus in fruffling prompt,
What mean'st thou thus to prate?*

*This babling little thee becomes,
Such clattering men do hate.*

As also,

*O Ajax fie for shame: how farre out of the way
Speake you, so bold and malapart? you brag too much I say.*

To conclude, Vlysses revileth not Thersites, with these termes: Thou halting and lame squire, so thou bald pate thou coptank, thou that art camell backt, or crump shouldred: but rather reprocheth him with his vaine babling and undiscreet language. But rather on the contrarie side, the mother of Vulcane when she speaketh unto her sonne lovingly and in great kindnesse of hart, beginneth first with his lamenesse in this manner

*Come hither my sonne, come to me, come sweet hart
My poore limping creeple, come crokelegd as thou art.*

By

By this it may appeare plainly that Homer devideth those, who thinke it a shame to be halt, blind, or otherwise impotent. He is of opinion, that nothing is blame worthy which is not dishonest: nor any thing dishonest and shamefull, which came not by our owne selves, but proceeded from fortune. And therefore these two great and singular commodities, they are sure to finde, who be exercised in reading and hearing of Poets: the one tending to moderation and modestie: in that they learne to reproch no man odiously, bitterly and foolishly with his fortune: the other unto magnanimitie; for that they be taught themselves to make use of their owne fortune: not to be cast downe and troubled, for any aduerse calamitie that may happen; but meekly and patiently to abide the frumpes, scoffes, reprochfull termes that are given them, yea, and the laughers that arise thereupon. And verily evermore this sentence of Phlemon 10 ought to be ready at hand and resound in their eares:

*Nothing there is more pleasant and muscell
Then him to abide who doth thee mis-call.*

Howbeit, if any of these mockers, deserve to be rebuked and taunted againe, vantage would be taken of the vices and imperfections of their minde, and those are to be objected against them; for so Adrastus in a tragedie when Alcmaon provoked with these words,

*Alc. A sister thou hast (I tell thee true)
Who in husbands blood her hands did embrue.*

*Adr. But thou thy selfe, (I must tell plaine)
Thy mother that bare thee, hast cruelly slaine.*

For like as they who whip and scourge garments, touch not the bodie at all: even so they that upbraid a man with infortunitie, or reproch him for some default or blemish in his parentage, doe like vaine fooles beat those things that are without, but never come neere the quicke, nor touch the soule, ney yet any thing which truly deserveth correction, blame or biting.

Over and beside, as wee shewed and taught before, how to impeach and derogate the credite of those leaud sentences and dangerous speeches, which otherwhiles wee meet with in Poeticall books namely, by opposing against the same, the good and grave sawes of worthy persons, renowned as well for their learning as politicke government: even so, if we finde any civill, honest, and profitable matter in Poetrie, we ought (as it were) to nourish, confirme and strengthen the same, by demonstrations and testimonies Philosophicall: and evermore to remember that we ascribe the first invention of such sentences to sage Philosophers: For a iust, requisite and commodious thing it is, that their credite should be in that maner fortified and authorized: namely, when the Poems which are pronounced upon the Stage in a Theatre, or sung to the harp, or taught unto children in schooles, do accord with the sententious counsels of Pythagoras, the instructions of Plato, and the precepts of Chilon: when I say the rules of Bias, shall tend to the same end and effect as do those lessons that children are to read and learne. And therefore we are to teach and instruct them thus much, not slightly and by the way, but earnestly and of purpose, that these places of Poets

*Faire daughter mine, thou wert not borne
To manage wars and armes to dread:
Minde thou love sports, and thinke no scorne
To joine young folke in marriage bed.*

Likewise;

*For Iupiter displeased is with thee,
If that in fight thou unmatched bee.*

nothing at all differ from this notable sentence, Τὸν οὐκ ἔστιν ἰσχυρὸν ἄνθρωπον. I. Know thy selfe: but carie the verie same sense and meaning.

Also these verses

*Like fooles, they do not know, inu;
That halfe than whole much better is:*

Likewise,

*Evill counsels hurt no man so much,
As him that author is of such.*

are all one in effect with the opinions and discourses of Plato in his dialogue Gorgias, and in his books of Common weale; to wit, that more dangerous it is to doe wrong that to suffer injurie; and

and more damage cometh by giving than by receiving an abuse.

Also to this verse of Aeschylus

*Be of good cheere: Excessive paine
Can not endure nor long remaine:
When wofull bale is at the highest,
Then blessed boot (be sure) is nighest.*

we must say, that they be the very same with that divulged sentence so often repeated by Epicurus, and so highly admired by his followers, namely, That as great paines are not durable, so long griefs are tolerable. And as the former member of this sentence was evidently exprest by Aeschylus, so the other is a consequent thereof, and implied therein. For if a griefe that is fore and vehement, endureth not; surely that which continueth, can not be violent or intolerable. Semblably this sentence of Theophrastus the Poet in verse

*Thou seest how Love all other gods
For this doth farre excell,
Because that lies he doth abhorre,
and pride of heart expell.
He is not wont to laugh and scorne,
so frumpe he doth disdaine:
He onely can not skill of lusts and pleasures which be vaine.*

is varied by Plato in prose, when he saith that the divine power is seated farre from pleasure and paine. As for these verses of Barchylides,

*We holde it true, and ever will maintaine
That glory sound and vertue doth endure.
Great wealth and store we take to be but vaine,
And may befall to vile men and impure.*

As also these of Euripides to the like sense;

*Sage temperance I holde, we ought to honour most in heart;
For with good ment it doth remaine,
and never will depart.*

As also these,

*When honour and worldly wealth you have,
To furnish your selves with vertue, take care,
Without her, if riches you get and have,
Though blessed you seeme, unhappy you are.*

Containe they not an evident prooffe and demonstration of that which the Philosophers teach as touching riches and externall goods; which without vertue profit not those at all who are possessed of them? And verily thus to reduce, and fitly to accommodate the sentences of Poets unto the precepts and principles delivered by Philosophers, will foone disfigure Poetrie from fables, and plucke from it the maske wherewith it is disguised; it will give, I say, unto them an effectuall power, that being profitably spoken, they may be thought serious and perswasive: yea, and besides, will make an overture and way unto the minde of a young ladde, that it may encline the rather to Philosophicall reasons and discourses: namely, when he having gotten some smatch and taste already thereof, and being not voide altogether of hearing good things, he shall not come altogether without judgement; replenished onely with foolish conceits and opinions which he hath evermore heard from his mothers and nurses mouth, yea, and otherwhiles (believe me) from his father, tutor and schoole-master: who will not sticke in his hearing to repute for blessed and happie, yea, and with great reverence to give the worship to those who are rich: but as for death, paine and labour, to stand in feare and horror thereof: and contrariwise, to make no reckoning and account of vertue, but to despise the same, and thinke it as good as nothing, without earthly riches and authoritie. Certes, when young men shall come thus rawly and untrained, to heare the divisions, reasons & arguments of Philosophers, flat contrary to such opinions, they will at first be much astonished, troubled & disquieted in their minds: and no more able to admit of the same, and to reduce such doctrine, than they, who having a long time bene pent in, and kept in darke, can abide the glittering raies of the Sun shine: unless they were acquainted before by little & little with some false and bastard light, not altogether so lively and cleere, as it: And even so, I say, yooing men must be accustomed beforehand, yea, and from the very first day, to the light of the trueth, entermingled somewhat with fables among, that they may the better endure the full light and fight of the cleere trueth, without any paine and offence at all. For when they have either heard or read before in Poemes these sentences:

*Lament we ought for infants at their birth,
Entering a world of cares that they shall have:
Whereas the dead we should wish joy and mirth
Accompanie, and bring them so to grave.*

*Also,
Of worldly things we need no more but twaine,
For bread to eat the earth doth yeeld us graine:
And for to quench our thirst, the river cleere
Affords us drinke, the water faire and sheere.*

*Likewise,
O tyrannie so low'd, and in request
With barbarous, but butfull to the rest.*

*Lastly,
The highest pitch of mans felicitie,
To feele the least part of adversity.*

Lette troubled they are & grieved in spirit, when they shall heare in the Philosophers schooles, That we are to make no account of death as a thing touching us: That the Riches of nature are definite & limited: That felicitie and soveraigne happines of man, lieth not in great fumes of money, ne yet in the pride of managing State affaires, nor in dignities and great authority, but in a quiet life free from paine and sorrow: in moderating all passions, and in a disposition of the minde kept within the compasse of Nature. To conclude, in regard hereof, as also for other reasons before alleaged, A yooing man had neede to be well guided and directed in reading of Poets, to the end that he may be sent to the studie of Philosophie not foretalled with sinister fumes; but rather sufficiently instructed before and prepared, yea and made friendly and familiar thereto by the means of Poetrie.

OF HEARING.

The Summarie.

BY goodright, this present discourse was ranged next unto the former twaine. For seeing we are not borne into this world learned; but before we can speake our selves sensibly or anything to reason, we ought to have heard men who are able to deliver their minds with judgement, to the end that by their aide and helpe we may be better framed and fitted to the way of vertue: requisite it is that after the imbibition of good nurture in childhood, and some libertie and licence given to travel in the writings of Poets, according to the rules above declared. Yooing men that are students should advance forward, and mount up into higher schooles. Now for that in the time when this Author Plutarch lived, besides many good bookes, there were a great number of professors in the liberal Sciences, and namely in the histories, in which Barbarisme crept afterwards: he proposeth and setteth downe those precepts now which they are to follow and observe, that goe to heare publike lectures, orations and disputations, thereby to know how to behave themselves there; which training haply may reach to all that which we had heare spoken elsewhere; and is materiall to make us more learned and better mannered. In the first place therefore he sheweth that at what time as we grow to yeeres of discretion, we should have a feeling of our ignorance, to the end that we may be desirous to learne, and afterwards heare willingly. For to encrease our affection, he toucheth those dangers into which they fall, who will needs be teachers, before they be taught taught themselves: adjoyning hereto those vices and inconveniences, which a yooing man is to take heed of, in hearing and above all others, to beware of envie: as also on the other side what he ought to studie. Now for that impossible it is, that teachers should be perfect and fully accomplished in all things, he proceedeth to declare with what minde and spirit we should take knowledge, and consider of their imperfections: giving us hall an advertisement how to avoid another extremitie, to wit, an excessive admiration of him that speaketh; namely, to leave the principall substance of doctrine: the which will be so much more accepted, in case it be commended and adorned with eloquence. He counselleth afterwards to treat of those problems and questions which may be propounded in companies and meetings: also of the pleasure that we ought to take when we are told the truth: in such sort, that as we are not to envy them for their excellencie, who speake any thing to raise and set us aloft: so on the contrary side we ought to carie with us thither, a spirit favourable, gracious, well prepared, hating flatterie, loving reprehensions, patient, void of that rusticall bashfulness which we see in over blunt and dull natures, neither presumptuous nor yet discouraged, but keeping a good measure and meane betwene vaine curiositie and that supine sloth and idleness, which is in the most part of those that be hearers. To conclude, he would have him that hath diligently heard a certaine time, and with discretion, to exercise himselfe in devising and inventing some thing of his owne, in such sort that he may put the same forth, so, as the outward part may discover well what goodnes there lieth inclosed within.

OF HEARING.

THis little treatise (my friend Alexander) which being gathered and compiled by starts, as my leisure would serve As touching the manner of Hearing, I lately put in writing, and send here unto you, To the end that you being delivered now from the subjection of Masters, who were wont to command you, and having put on your vile robe and grown to mans estate, may know how to heare him that giveth you good counsell. For this licentious easement and deliverie from all government, which some yooing men for default of good nurture and education do untruly terme Libertie, seeth over them more rough Lords and harder Masters by farre, than were those teachers, tutors and governours, under whom they were awed in their childhood, to wit, their owne irregular lusts and unordinate appetites, which now be (as it were) dischained & let loose. For like as a woman (to use the words of Hero dotus) no sooner doth of her smocke or inner vesture, but therewithall the calsteth off all shamefastnes and modestie; even so, some yooing men there be, who together with the garments of infancie and childhood, lay by all grace, shame and feare: so that being once divested of that habit and apparell which became them so well, and gave them a modest and sober countenance, they are straightwaies full of stubbornesse and disobedience. As for your selfe, who have oftentimes heard, that To follow God, and to obey Reason is all one, you ought to thinke, that the wiser sort and such as have wit indeed, repute not the passage and change from childhood to mans estate, an absolute deliverance and freedome from commandment and subjection, but an exchange onely of the commander: for that their life in stead either of a mercenarie hirling or some master bought with a peece of money, who was wont to governe it in their nonage and minoritie, taketh then a divine and heavenly guide to conduct it, even Reason: unto which they that yeeld themselves obeisant, are to be reputed onely free and at libertie. For they alone live as they would, who have learned to will that which they should: whereas if our actions and affections both be disordinate and not ruled by reason, the libertie of our free-will is small, slender and feeble, yea and intermingled for the most part with much repentance. Like as therefore among new Burgovises (who lately are enrolled Free Denizens to enjoy the Franchises and priviledges of some citie) they that were meere aliens before and strangers new come from far and remote parts, finde themselves grieved at the first with many things that are done, yea and complaine thereof: but such as had bene inhabitants there sometime before they were made citizens, who partly by education were inured, and partly by custome and converting, familiarly acquainted with the lawes and customes of the place, never thinke much, but can brooke well enough, and undergo with patience all charges and impossibilities laid upon them; So it behooveth that a yooing man should a long time have bene bred up and (as it were) halfe nourished in Philosophie, accustomed (I say) he ought to have bene from the begining with intermingling all that he learneth or heareth in his tender yeeres, with Philosophicall reasons, that being thus made tractable, gentle and familiar before hand, he might now betake himselfe wholly and in good earnest to Philosophie: which alone is able to array and adorne young men with those robes and ornaments, of reason which are manlike indeed and everie way perfect. Moreover, I suppose you will be well pleased and content, to give care unto that which Theophrastus hath written of hearing; which of all the five senses given us by nature, presenteth both the most and also the greatest passions unto the minde. For there is no object of the eye, nothing that we taste or touch that causeth such extasies, so violent troubles or sudden frights, as those which enter and pearce into the soule, by the meanes of some noises, sounds and voices, incident to our hearing. And albeit this sense lie thus open and exposed to passions, yet is it more fit to admit reason than such affections: for many places there be and parts of the bodie that make way and give entrance unto vices for to passe unto the soule: but the only handle (as I may so say) wherewith vertue may take holde of young men are their eares: provided alwaies, that they were kept cleane and neat at the first from all flatterie, and defended against corrupt and leawd speeches, that they touch them not.

Good reason therefore had Xenocrates, to give order that children should have certaine auri-cles or bolsters devised to hang about their eares for their defence, rather than fencers and sword-plaiers: for that these are in danger onely to have their eares spoiled with knocks or cuts by weapons: but the other, to have their manners corrupted and marred with naughtie speeches. Neither was it any part of Xenocrates his meaning, to deprive them altogether of hearing, and to commend deafnesse: but to admonish and exhort them, so long to forbear the hearing of evil words, and to take heed, untill other good sayings, entertained and nourished there, in long continuance of time by Philosophie, had seized the place, and were well settled in that part which is most easie to be moved and perswaded by speech: where being once lodged, they might as good sentinels and guards preserve and defend the same. Bias verily, that ancient Sage, being commanded by king Amasis, to send unto him the best and woorthiest piece of a beast killed for sacrifice, plucked forth the tongue onely, and sent it him; giving him thus much thereby to understand, That speech is the cause both of most good, and also of greatest harme. Many there be also, who ordinarily when they kisse little children, both touch their eares withall, and also bid them do the like: insinuating thus much covertly, by way of mirth and sport, That they are to love those who profit them and doe them good by their eares. For this is certaine and evident, that a young man deprived and debarr'd of hearing, being able to taste and conceive reason, will not onely become barren altogether of fruit, and put out not to much as any buds and flowers at all, which may give some hope of vertue: but also contrariwise, will soone turne to vice, and send forth of his corrupt minde many wilde and savage shoots, like as a ground neglected and untill'd, beareth nothing but briars, brambles and hurtfull weeds. For the motions and inclinations unto pleasures, and the sinister conceits and suspicions of paines and travels (which are no strangers to us iwis, entring in directly from without forth by themselves, or els let in by evill suggestions, but inbred with us, and the naturall sources of infinite vices and maladies) if a man suffer to run on end with the raines at large, whither by nature they would go, and not cut them off by sage remonstrances, or divert them another way, and thereby reforme the default of nature; surely there were not upon the face of the earth any wilde beast, but would be more tame and gentle than man. Forasmuch as therefore the sense of hearing bringeth unto young men so great profit, and no lesse perill with it, I suppose it were well done, if a man would effoones both devise with himselfe, and also discourse with others, as touching the order and maner of hearing. Forasmuch as we doe see most men in this point to offend and erre, in that they exercise themselves in speaking before they were used to heare: supposing that good speech requireth a kinde of discipline, meditation and practise ere it be learned: as for hearing, though men use it without any art, it makes no matter how, yet they may receive profit thereby as they thinke. And verily, albeit at Tennis play they that practise the feat thereof, learne to take the ball as it cometh, and also to strike and send it from them againe, both at once. Yet in the use of speech it is otherwise: for to receive it well, goeth before the utterance and deliverie thereof: like as conception and retention of the seed, doeth precede birth of the infant. It is said, That the egges laid by fowles, called Wind-egges, as they proceed of imperfect and false conceptions, so they are the rudiments and beginnings of such fruits, as never will quicken and have life; even so, The speeches that young men let fall, such I meane, as never knew how to heare, nor were wont to receive profit by hearing, are nothing els indeed but very winde: and as the Poet saith,

*Words vaine, obscure, and foolish every one,
Which under clouds soone vanish and be gone.*

Certes if they would powre out any liquor out of one vessell into another, they are wont to encline and turne downe the mouth of the one, so as the said liquor may passe into the receptorie without shedding any part thereof, least in stead of an infusion indeed there be an effusion onely and spilling of the same: and yet these men cannot learne to be attentive and give good eare unto others, so as nothing do escape them, which is well and profitably delivered. But here is the greatest folly and most ridiculous, that if they meet with one, who can relate the order of a feast or great dinner, discourse from point to point of a solemne shew or pompe, tell a tale of some dreame, or make report of a quarrell and blemishment betwene him and another, theyarken with great silence, bid him say on, and will not misse every circumstance: Let another man draw them apart, to teach them some good and profitable lesson, to exhort them to their dutie, to admonish and tell them of a fault, to reprove them wherein they did amisse, or to appeale their moode when they be in choler, they can not abide and endure him: for either the will set in hand to argue and refute him by arguments contending and contesting against that which hath bene said, (if they be able so to doe:) or if they finde themselves too wake, they slinke away, and run thither, where they may heare some other vaine and foolish discourses, desirous to fill their eares (like naughtie and rotten vessells) with any thing rather then that, which is good and necessarie. They that would keepe and order horses well, teach them to have a good mouth, to reigne light, and to obey the bit: even so, they that bring up children as they ought, make them obsequent and obsequant to reason, by teaching them to heare much and speake little. For Spirithus praising Epaminondas upon a time, gave out thus much of him, That he could hardly meet with another man who knew more than hee, and spake lesse. And it is commonly said, that nature herselfe hath given to each us but one tongue and two eares, because we ought to heare more than we speake. Now as Silence and Taciturnitie is everie where and at all times a singular and sure ornament of a young man; so especially, if when hee heareth another man to speake, he interrupt and trouble him not, nor baie and barke (as it were) at every word: but although he do not very well like of his speech, yet hath patience and forbearth, giving him leave to make an end: and when he hath finished his speech, setteth not upon him presently, nor beginneth out of hand to confute him, but suffereth him to pause a while, and as Aschines saith, giveth him some time to breath and bethinke himselfe to see, if haply he thinke it good to adde any more to that which hath bene delivered already, or change somewhat, or els retract and unsay something: Whereas, they that by and by cut a man off, with contradictions, and neither heare, nor are well heard themselves, but are ever replying upon other, whiles they speake, observe no decorum nor grace at all, but shew a very undecent and unseemely behavior. But he that is accustomed to heare patiently, and with a modest and sober countenance, better conceiveth and retaineth the good things uttered, and withall hath more leisure to marke, observe and discern that which is either unprofitable or false: He sheweth himselfe besides, to be a lover of the truth, and is not taken for a litigious quarreller, a rash wrangler, or a bitter brawler. And therefore, some there be, who not unaptly say, That we ought no lesse, but rather more, to void out of the minds of young men that presumption and foolish opinion which they have of their owne selves, than to rid and exclude the winde and aire out of leather bagges or bladders wherewith they are puffed and blown up, if we meane to infuse and put any good thing into them: for otherwise, if they be still full of that swelling winde of arrogancie and overweening of themselves, they will never receive and admit any goodnesse.

Moreover, envie accompanied with a malignant and ill will is good in no action whatsoever: where it is present: but as it is an impediment and hinderance to all honest causes; so it is the worst counsellor and assistant that he can have who would be an auditor, making all those things that be profitable and for his benefit, to seeme odious, unpleasant, harsh to the eare and hardly admitted; for that the nature of envious persons is, to take more pleasure in any thing else than in that which is well spoken. And verily, whosoever repineth and is vexed at the heart, to see others rich, beautifull or in authoritie, is onely envious: for grieved he is at the welfare of others: but he that taketh discontentment in hearing a wise and sententious speech, is offended with the good of his owne selfe: for like as the light is a benefit to them that see; even so is speech unto the hearers if they will embrace and entertaine the same: As for those kinds of offen-

vie which arise in regard of other things, there be some naughtie passions and vicious conditions of the minde besides, that breed and ingender them: but that manner of envie which is conceived against them that speake excellently well, springeth from a certaine & important desire of vaine glorie, and unjust ambition, which will not suffer him that is so indisposed to give care and attend unto the words spoken, but troubleth, disquieteth, and distracteth the minde and understanding: both to consider at one instant his owne state and sufficiency, whether it be inferior to the conceit and eloquence of the speaker: and also to regard and looke upon the countenance of other hearers, whether they take contentment and are in admiration of him that maketh the speech: yea and withall, if happily he be praised, the same minde is woonderfully galled and amazed, angrie and ready to fall out with all that be present, in case they approve his speech with applause. Herewith it letteth slip also and rejecteth the matter and good sayings that were delivered already; for that the remembrance thereof is unfaverie and unpleasant: and still he is disquieted and woteth not what to do, hearing out the rest with feare and trembling, lest haply they should be better than the former, never so desirous that the speakers should hasten to an end and have done, as when they discourse and speake best. Now when the Sermon is ended, and the auditors dissolved: what doth this envious spirit then? not ruminat, be you sure, nor consider of the reasons and matter delivered; but he stirreth the affections and opinions straightwaies, and gathereth voices (as it were in a scrutiny) of the audience. If he meet with any that give out good words to the praise of the Preacher, them hee avoideth and fleeth from, as if he were in a furious fit of madness: hapneth he upon such as finde fault, and be ready to misconstrue and pervert the words that were spoken, to the worst sense: these are they whom hee loveth a life, to them he runneth, and with them hee forteth and keepeth companie: But say that he finde none of that disposition, so as he can not wrest any words to a wrong construction, then he falleth to make comparisons, and to set against him, others younger than he; who of the same theme have discoursed better, with more plausible utterance and greater force of eloquence: he never ceaseth nor giveth over corrupting, misinterpreting, and disgracing the whole speech, untill he have made the same altogether unprofitable and without any edification at all to his owne selfe. It behooveth therefore, that he who desireth to heare, take truce (for the time) with ambition; to the end that hee may give care with patience and mildnesse unto him that maketh an oration or sermon, and cary himselfe no otherwise than if he were admitted to some sacred and festival banker, or an invited guest to the first fruits of a solemne sacrifice; praising his eloquence when he hath spoken well and sufficiently to the point in any matter, accepting favourably, and in best part, his good will, to deliver and communicate to others, such things as he knew, and to persuade his hearers with those reasons and motives which had induced and perswaded himselfe. Neither must our auditors make this reckoning and conclusion, That whatsoever hath bene singularly well delivered by the speaker, ought to be ascribed to chance and fortune, as if he had let fall his words at adventure: but impute the same to his diligence, labour and art: yea, and he ought to imitate the same with a kinde of zeale and admiration. But whereas he hath faulted and done amisse, it is the part of an hearer to bend his minde, and consider well and circumspectly, what might the cause and occasion be of such error: For like as (according to Xenophon) good householders know how to make profit and use, as well of their enemies as their friends; even so they that be vigilant and attentive hearers, take good, not onely by them that speake well, but by those also that misse and faile of their purpose: for barren, triviall and stale invention; improper, vaine and insignificant words; forced and foolish figures; abrupt, fond, and unseemly breakings forth with joy to some praise, and such like imperfections or defects, which often times befall unto them that speake in publique place; are sooner espied by us that are hearers, than observed by themselves who are the speakers. And therefore we are to transcribe the inquisition and correction of any such fault, from them to our selves, by examining whether we also may not fault likewise, before we be aware? For there is nothing in the world more easie, than for a man to blame and reprehend his neighbour: but such a reprehension verily is vaine and unprofitable, unless it have a reference to correct and amend the like errors in himselfe. In which regard every one ought to be ready in this case, according to the advertisement of Plato, to say unto himselfe, Am not I also such an one? or doe not I the semblable otherwhiles? For even as we see our owne eyes shining within the ball or apple of our neighbours eyes, so we ought by the forme & manner of other mens orations to take the pattern and representation of our owne; to the end that we be not too forward and bolde in despising others, but may more carefully take heed to our selves when wee likewise come to speake. To this this purpose also it would doe very well, to make a kinde of conference and comparison in this manner: Namely, to retire our selves apart which we have heard one make an oration, and to take in hand some points which wee thinke had not bene well and sufficiently handled, and then to assay either to supply that which was defective in some, or to correct what was amisse in others: or els to varie the same matter in other words, or at leastwise to discourse altogether thereof, with new reasons and arguments; like as Plato himselfe did upon the oration of Lysias. For, I assure you; no hard matter it is, but very easie to contradict the oration and reason by another pronounced; may to set a better by it, that is a piece of worke right hard and difficult. Much like, as when a certaine Macedonian heard that Philip king of Macedon had demolished and rased the city Byzantium. Hah! he so quoth he, But he is not able to set up such another. Now when as we shall see that intreating of the same subject and argument, there is no great difference betweene our owne doings and other mens before us, and that we have not farre excelled them; we shall be reclaimed much from the contempt of others, and quickly repressle and stay our owne presumptuous pride and selfelove, seeing it thus checked by this triall and comparison. And verily, to admire other mens doings, as it is a thing adverse and opposite to despising, so it is a signe of a milder nature, and more inclined to indifferencie and equitie. But even herein also there would be no lesse heed taken (if not more) than in the contempt before said: for as they which are so presumptuous, bolde, and given so much to dispraise and despise others, receive lesse good and smaller profit by hearing; so the simple and shamelesse sort, addicted overmuch to others, and having them in admiration, are more subject to take harme and hurt thereby: verifying this sentence of Heraclitus.

Let him be hearer, or let him be done

As for the praises therefore, of him that speaketh, we ought favorable and of course without great affection to passe them out of our mouths: in giving credite unto their reasons and arguments we are to be more wary and circumspect: and as touching the phrase, utterance, and action of those that exert life to make speeches, we must both see and heare the same with a single hart and a kind affection: As for the utility and truth of those matters which are delivered, we should examine and weigh the same exactly & with more severitie of judgement. Thus we who be hearers shall avoid the suspitions of evil will and hatred, & they againe that are speakers shall do us no harme: For oftentimes it falleth out that upon a speciall faultline and good liking unto those that preach unto us, we take lesse heed to our selves and by our credulitie admit & embrace from their lips many false & erroneous opinions. The Macedonian rulers & Lords of the Councell of estate, upon a time liking wel of the good advice and opinion of a person who was an ill liver, caused the same to be delivered openly by another of approved life and good reputation: wherein they did very wisely & as prudent politicians, to accustom the people for to affect the behavior and honest carriage of their counsellors, rather than to respect their words onely. But in Philosophie it is otherwise: For we must lay aside the reputation of the man who hath in publique place spoken his minde; and examine the matter apart by it selfe: For that, like as in warre (we say) there be many false glances: so also in an auditors there passe as many vanities: The goodly grey beard and hoarie head of the speaker, his solemne gesture and composing of his countenance, his grave and browes, his glorious words in behalfe of himselfe: but above all, the acclamations, the applause and clapping of hands, the cheeping and shouting of the standers by, and those that are present in place, are enough otherwhiles to trouble and astonish the spirits of a young hearer, who is not well acquainted with such matters, and carie him away perforce as it were with a streame: Over and besides, there is in the very stile and speech it selfe a secret power able to beguile and deceive a young novice; namely, if it runne round away smoothly and pleasantly, and if withall there be a certaine affected gravitie, and artificiall port and loftinesse, to set out and grace the matter. And even as they that play upon the pipe, be it cornet, recorder or flue, fault many times in musicke, and are not perceived by the hearers: so a brave and elegant tongue, a doughty and gallant oration, dazzleth the wits of the hearer, so as he can not judge soundly of the matter in hand. Melantius being demanded upon a time, what he thought of a Tragadie of Diogenes: I could not see it (quoth he) for so many words wherewith it was choaked up. But the Orations & declamations for the most part of these Sophisters, who make shew of their eloquence, horribly have their sentences covered (as it were) with vailles and curtains of words, but that which more is, they themselves do dulce their voice by the meanes of (I wot not what devised notes, soft sounds, exquisite and musical accents accents in their pronuntiation, so as they ravish the wits of the hearers, and transport them beside themselves: leading and carrying them which way they list: and thus for a certaine little vaine pleasure that they give, receive againe applause and glorie much more vaine: Inasmuch, as that befalleth properly unto them which by report Dionysius answered upon a time: who seemed to promise unto a famous minstrell for his excellent play in an open Theatre, to reward him with great gifts, gave him in the end just nothing, but said he had recompensed him sufficiently already: For looke (quoth he) how much pleasure I have received from thee by thy long and minstrelly, so much contentment and joy thou hast had from me by hoping for some great reward. And verily such recompense as this have those Sophisters and great Orators at their hearers hands: For admired they are so long as they sit in their chaire, and give delight unto their auditors: No sooner is their speech ended, but gone is the pleasure of the one, and the glorie of the other. Thus the Auditors spend their time, and the speakers employ their whole life in vaine. For this cause, it behooveth a young hearer to separate and set aside the ranke superfluitie of words and to seeke after the fruit it selfe: and heerein not to imitate women, that plait and make garlands of flowers, but to follow the Bees: For those women laying for, and choosing faire flowers and odoriferous herbes, with plat and compose them so, as they make thereof a peece of worke (I must needs say) pleasant to the senses; but fruitlesse altogether, and not lasting above one day: whereas the Bees flying oftentimes over & over the meadows full of Violets, Roses and Crowtoes, light at length upon Thyme, an herbe of a most strong scent, and quick taste and there settle,

*Intending then great paines to take
The yellow honie for to make,*

and when they have gathered from them some profitable juice or liquor to serve their turne, they flie away unto their proper worke and business: Semblably ought an auditor who is studious of skill and knowledge, and hath his minde and understanding free from passions, to let passe, affected, flourishing and superfluous words; yea, and such matters also as be fit for the Stage and Theatre, reputing them to be food meet for drone Bees (I meane Sophisters) and nothing good for honie: and ratieth with diligence and attentive heed to found the very depth and profound intention of the speaker, for to draw that which is good & profitable: remembering effusions, that he is not come thither as to a Theatre, either to see sports & pastimes, or to heare musick and Poeticall fables, but into a schoole & auditors, for to learne how to amend and reforme his life by the rule of reason. And therefore he must enter into his owne heart and examine himselfe when he is alone, how he was mooved and affected with the Lecture or Sermon that he heard; consider (I say) and reason he ought with himselfe whether he find any turbulent passions of his minde thereby dulced and appeased; whether any griefe or heavinesse that trouble him be mitigated and allwaged; whether his courage and confidence of heart be more resolute and better confirmed; and in one word, whether he feele any instinct unto vertue and honestie, to be more kindled and enflamed. When we rise out of the Barbars chaire, we thinke it meete presently to consult with a mirrour or looking glasse; we stroke our head to see whether he hath polled and nodd it well; we consider and peruse our beard and every haire whether we have the right cut, & be trimmed as we ought: a shame it were then, to depart from a schole or a lecture, and not immediately to retire apart and view our mindewell; whether it have laide away any foolish thought that troubled it: whether it be cased of superfluous and wandering thoughts, that clogged it: and be thereby more lightsome and pleasant. For neither a Baine and Strich, as Ariston saith, nor a sermon doth any good, if the one do not scoure the skin, and the other cleanse the heart.

A young man therefore is to take joy and delight if he have made profit by a lecture, or be better edified by hearing a sermon. And yet I write not this, as if this pleasure should be the finall end that he propoeth to himselfe when he goeth to such a lecture or sermon, neither would I have him thinke that he should depart out of the Philosophers schoole; with a merie note singing jocosely, or with a fresh and cheerefull countenance: ne yet to use meanes to be perfumed with sweete odors and ointments, whereas he hath more need of Embrications, Fomentations and Cataplasmes: but to take it well and be thankfull, if haply by some sharpe words and cutting speeches, any man hath cleansed and purified his heart full of cloudie mists and palpable darkenes, like as men drive Bee-hives and rid away Bees with smoke. For albeit, he that preacheth unto others ought not to be altogether careless and negligent in his stile, but that it may carrie with it some pleasure, delectation and grace, as well as probabilitie and reason: yea

young man when he cometh to heare should not stand so much thereupon, but have least regard thereto, especially at the first: marrie afterwards (I will not say) but he may well enough have an eie unto it also. For like as those that drinke, after they have once quenched their thirst, have leisure to peruse the cups & turne them about every way, to view and consider the worke engraven or imprinted upon them: even so, when a young student or auditor is well replenished and furnished with doctrine, after he hath breathed and paused a while, may be permitted to consider farther of the speech, namely, what elegant and copious phrases it hath. As for him, who at the verie beginning attendeth not nor cleaveth unto the matter and substance, but hureth after the language onely, desiring that it should be pure Atticke, fine and smooth: I can liken such a one to him, who being empoisoned will not drinke any Antidote or counterpoison, unless the pot or cup wherein it is, be made of the Colian earth in Attica: or who in the cold of winter will not weare a garment, except it were made of the wooll that came from the Attike sheepes backe; but had rather sit still idle doing nothing and stirring not, with some thin mantell and overworne gaberline cast over him, such as be the orations of Lysias his penning. The errors committed in this kinde, have bene the cause why there is found so little wit and understanding, and contrariwise so much tongue and bibble-babble, such vaine chattering about words in young men throughout the Schooles: who never observe the life, the deeds, the carriage and demeanor in State government of a Philosopher, but give all praise and commendation to his fine termes and elegant words, onely setting out his eloquence, action and readie deliverie of his oration, but will not in any wise learne or enquire whether the matter so uttered be profitable or unprofitable, necessarie or vaine and superfluous.

Next to these precepts, how we should heare a Philosopher to discourse at large and with a continued speech, there followeth in good consequence a rule and advertisement as touching short questions and problemes. A man that cometh as a bidden guest unto a great supper, ought to be content with that which is set before him upon the table, and neither to call for any viands else, nor to finde fault with those that are present: He also that is invited to a Philosophicall feast or banquet (as I may say) of discourses, in case they be matters and questions certaine and chosen long before for to be handled, ought to do nothing else but heare with patience and silence him that speaketh: for they that distract and hale him away to other theames, interposing interrogations and demands, or otherwise moove doubts or make oppositions as he speaketh, are troublesome and unfortunat hearers, such as be unfociable and accord not with an auditors; who besides that they receive no profit themselves, disturbe both the speaker and the speech also. But in case the partie that standeth ad oppositum, doe of himselfe will and pray his auditors to aske him questions and to propoof what they will, then they ought to propound such demands as be either necessarie or profitable. Pliffes verily in Homer was mocked by the wooers of his wife, because

*He calld for shieves of bread to eat,
And not for swords or cantrons near.*

For it was reputed a signe of magnanimity to demand, as well as to give things of great price and value. Much more then might a man deride and laugh at the auditor, who will moove unto a Master or Doctour of the Chaire; trifling, frivolous and fruitlesse questions, as otherwhiles some of these young men do: who taking pleasure to vaunt themselves, and to shew what great schollers they are in Logicke or the Mathematickes, are wont to put forth questions as touching the sections of things indefinite: also, what be littrell motions or Diametricall? Vnto whom a man may verie well answer as Philotimus the Phisitian did unto one that had a supuration in his chift, and by reason of an inward ulcer of his lungs was in a consumption, who comming to him for counsell, desired that he would give him a medicine for a little whit-flow growing about the roote of his naile: but Philotimus perceiving by his colour and shortnes of winde in what case he was; My good friend (quoth he) you have no such need of a cure for your whit-flow, you may hold your peace well enough at this time for any danger there: Even so, it may be said unto one of these young men; There is no time now to thinke or dispute upon such questions, but rather by what meanes you may be freed from presumptuous overweening of yourselfe, from pride and arrogance, from wanton love and foolish toies: that you may be settled in a sound state of life, devoid of vanitie. Moreover, this young man is to have a good eie and regard unto the sufficiency of the speaker, whether it be by naturall inclination, or gotten by experience and practise, and accordingly to frame and direct his questions in those points wherein he is most excellent: and in no wise to force him who is well read and studious.

died in Morall Philosophie, to answer unto Physical or Mathematicall questions: or him that is better scene in Natural Philosophy to draw unto Logick, for to give his judgment of Hypothetical propositions & to resolve them: or to move the knots & make solution of false Syllogisms, Elenches sophisticall and such fallacies. For like as one that would goe about to cleave wood with a key, or unlocke a doore with an axe, seemeth not so much to doe hurt unto those instruments, as to deprive himselfe of the proper use and commoditie as well of the one as the other; Even so, they that require of a Speaker that which he is not apt unto by nature, or wherein he is not well practised, & will not reape, gather & take that which willingly commeth from him, and wherewith he is able to furnish them, are not only hurt therein, but incur the name and blame of a pievish, froward and malicious nature. Furthermore this heed would be taken, not to overlay him with many questions, nor oftentimes to urge him therewith. For this bewraith one, that in some sort loveth to heare himselfe speake and would be scene: whereas, when another doth propose a question to give attentive care, and that with mildnes and patience, is a signe of a studious person, and one that knoweth well how to behave himselfe in companie, and can abide that others should learne as well as he: unlesse perhaps some private and particular occurrent do urge the contrarie, or some passion do hinder, which had neede to be itaied and repressed, or else some maladie and imperfection which requirith remedie. For peradventure as Heracles saith, it were not good for one to hide and conceale his owne ignorance, but to let it appeere and be knowne, and so to cure it. But say, that some fit of choler, some assault of scrupulous superstition, or some violent quarell and jarre with one household and kinsfolke, or some furious passion proceeding from wanton lust,

*Which doth the secret heart springs move,
That earst were never stir'd with love,*

trouble our understanding, and put it out of tune, we ought not for the avoiding of a reproofe, to flie for refuge to other matters, and interrupt the discourse begun, but be desirous to heare of such things, even in open places of exercises; and after the exercise or lecture done, to take the Philosophers or Readers aside, and confesse with them, to be further informed: not as many doe, who are well enough contented to heare Philosophers speake of others, and have them therefore in great admiration: but if it chance that a Philosopher leave other men, and turne his speech to them apart, to tell them freely and boldly what he thinketh, admonishing and putting them in minde of such things as do concerne them, then they are in a chafe, then they say he speakes besides the text and more then needs. For of this opinion are these men, That wee are to heare Philosophers in Schooles for pastime, as plaiers of Tragedies in a Theatre upon the Stage: As for other matters out of the Schoole, they holde them no better men than themselves: and to say a trueth, good reason have they so to deeme of Sophisters, who are no sooner out of their chaires, or come downe from off the pulpit, and when their books, and pettie introductions are laid out of their hands, but in other serious actions and parts of this life to be dis-courted of, a man shall finde them as raw as other, and nothing better skilled than the vulgar sort. But to come unto those Philosophers indeed, who worthily are so to be called and esteemed, ignorant are such persons above rehearsed, that their words (be they spoken in earnest or in game) their becks, their nods, their countenance, whether it be composed to smiling or to frowning, but principally their words directed privately to every one a part, be all significant, and cary some fruit commodious to those that with patience will give them leave to speake, and are willing and used to hearken unto them.

As concerning the praises which we are to attribute unto them for their eloquence and well speaking, there would in this dutie some wise caution & meane be used: for that in this case, neither overmuch nor too little is commendable & honest. And verily that scholar, who seemeth not to be moved or touched with any thing that he heareth, is a heave and unsupportable auditor, full of a secret presumptuous opinion of himselfe, conceited inwardly of his owne sufficiency, of an inbred selfe-love and aptnesse to speake much of his owne doings, shewing evidently that he thinketh he can speake better than that which hath bene delivered: In regard whereof, he never stirs brow any way decently, he uttereth not a word to testifie that he heareth willingly and with contentment: but by a certaine forced silence, affected gravitie, and counterfeited countenance, would purchase and winne unto himselfe the reputation of a staid man, of a profound and deepe clerke: and is as sparie of his praises, as of his purse and money in it, imagining that they bid him losse, who would have him part with any one jot thereof; as if he robbed himselfe of so much as he imparted to another. For many there be who misconstrue & interpret in ill sense one sentence of Pythagoras, when he saith, That he had gotten this fruit by the studie of Philosophie, namely, to have nothing in admiration. And these men are of this opinion, that because they are not to admire, praise, and honor others, therefore they must despise and dispraise them, and by the disdain and contempt of others they thinke themselves to seeme grave and venerable. For reason Philosophicall, although it rejecteth that wonder and admiration which proceedeth of doubt or ignorance, for that it knoweth the cause of everie thing, and is able to discourse thereof; yet for all that it condemneth not courtisie, magnanimitie and humanitie. For certes unto such as truly and certainly are good, a right great honor it is to honour those that are worthie of honor: also for a man to adorne another is an excellent ornament proceeding from a superabundance (as it were) of glorie and honor which is in himselfe, voide of all envie and malice. Whereas those that be niggards in praising of another, seeme to be poore & bare themselves that way, & bewray how hungrie they be after their owne praises. Now on the contrarie side, he who without all judgement & discretion at everie word and syllable (in a manner) is ready to rise up & give acclamation, offendeth as much another way, being a man of levitie and inconstancie, oftentimes displeaseth even them that be the speakers, but alwaies is offensive and troublefome to other assistants about him: causing them to rise up effsoons & lift up themselves against their wils, drawing them perforce to do as they see him do, and even for verie shame and modestie, to set up some cries and acclamations with him for companie. Now after that he hath reaped no fruit nor edification by the oration that he hath heard, for that he had so troubled and disquieted the auditors by his unseasonable praises, he returneth from thence with one of these three additions to his stile: namely, either a Mocke, a Platterer, or a Blockhead, who understood not what was said. A judge I must needs say, when he sitteth upon the seat of Iustice to heare and determine causes, ought to give care unto both parties without hatred or favour, voide of all affection, and respectively onely to right and equitie. But in the auditories where learned men are met together, there is neither law nor oath hindereth us, but that we may heare him with favour and benevolence, who doth speake and discourse unto us. And even our ancients in old time were wont to place and set Mercurie in their temples neere unto the Graces, giving us thereby to know that above all things, a speech publickly delivered, requirith a gracious and friendly audience: for they never thought that the speaker would be such an outcast, or so farre short and insufficient; but if he were not able either to say somewhat of his owne invention praise worthy, or to report from ancients that which is memorable, or to deliver the subject matter of his speech together with his drift and intention, so as it deserved applaude: yet at leastwise, his eloquution and disposition of everie part might be commendable: for according to the old proverb,

*With Calbrap-thistles rough and keen,
With prickly Reit-harrow,
Close Scions faire and white are seen
With soft walflores to grow.*

For if some to shew their wit, have taken upon them the praise of vomiting, others of fever, and some of a pot or caudron, and yet have not failed of favor and approbation: how can it otherwise be, but that the oration compassed by a grave personage, who in some sort is reputed, or at leastwise called a Philosopher, should minister unto benevolent, gracious and courteous Auditors some respite and opportunitie of time for to praise and commend the same? Al those that are in the flower and prime of their age, saith Plato, one way or other, do affect and move him that is enamoured on them: inso much as if they be white of colour, he calleth them the children of the gods: if blacke of hew, he termes them manly and magnanimous: be one hawke-nosed, such he nameth Roiall and of a kingly race: is he camoise or flat nosed, him he will have to be gentle, pleasant and gracious: and to conclude, looketh one pale & yellow, then to cover and mollifie in some sort that ill colour, he useth to call him Hony-face: and every one of these defects, he loveth and embraceth as severall beauties: For in love is no lacke, and of this nature it is to clasp and cleave to every thing that it can reach or meet withall, in manner of Ivy; much more then will he that is a studious scholar & a diligent hearer, find alwaies one thing or other, for which he may seeme worthily to praise any one that mounteth up into the chaire for to declaime or discourse. For even Plato himselfe, who in the oration of Lyfias commended not the invention; and as for the disposition thereof, utterly found fault therewith as disorderly and confused: yet he praised his stile and eloquution, & gave this attribute unto it, that every word was perspicuous and lightfome, and withall ran round, as if they all had bene artificiallie wrought wrought with the Turners instrument. A man that were so disposed, may seeme in reason to reprove in Archylous the argument and subject matter: in Parmenides the composition of his verses: in Phocylides, the meane and homely matter: the loquacity of Euripides; and the inequality or uneven stile of Sophocles: After which sort, you shall have among Oratours and Rhetoricians, one who cannot expresse the naturall disposition of a man, another who hath no power in resembling passions & affections, and another againe who faileth in gracie and yet each one of them commendable enough for some particular and especiall gift, either to moove or to delight. In which regard, the hearers also, may find sufficient matter & pleasure enough to gratifie and content if they list, those that speake and make orations to them. For some of them is sufficient although we do not testifie our good liking of them by lively and open voice, to give them a favourable regard of the eie, to shew them a milde and gentle visage, a cheerefull looke, an amiable disposition of the countenance, without any signe of sadnes and heaviness. And verily, these things are grown now to be so common and ordinary, that we can afford them even to those who speake but so fo and to no purpose at all; inso much, as every auditive can skill thereof: But to sit still modestly in his place without any token of disdain; to beare the body upright, leaning neither one way nor other; to fixe the eie wistly upon him that speaketh; to shew a forward gesture, as if one gave great attention and marked every word seriously; to set and dispose the countenance plaine, pure and simple, without any signification at all, not onely of contempt or discontentment, but also of all other cares and thoughts whatsoever, be evident tokens of approbation, and tend all thereto. For, as in every thing els, beaute and fauour is composed and framed (as it were) of many numbers meeting and concurring in one, and all together at the same time, and that by a certaine symmetricke, consonance and harmonie: but that which is foule and ill fauoured, is bred immediately by the least thing in the world, that either is wanting, or added and put to absurdly, otherwise than it should; even so we may notably observe in this action of hearing, not onely the knitting and bending of the browes, or the heaue cheere of the visage, a crooked aspect and wandring cast of the eye, a writhing away or turning about of the bodie, an undecient change of the thighes crosse one over another: but a very nod of the head, or winke of the eye alone, the whispering or rounding one of another in the eare, a bare smile, gapings, and drowfie yawnings, as if a man were ready to drop asleepe: finally, the hanging downe of the head, and whatsoever gestures of that sort, wee are countable for as fault woorthy, and they would be carefully taken heed of. Howbeit, there be some of this opinion, that the speaker indeed ought to looke unto himselfe and his behaviour when hee is aloft; but the hearers beneath need not. They would (I say) have him who is to make a speech in publicke place, to come well prepared, and with diligent praemeditation of that which he ought to say; but as for the hearers, they have no more to doe but to take their places, without any forethinking of the matter, without any care and regard at all of duetie and demeanour after they be set, as if they were come to a very supper, and nothing els, there to take their repast or ease themselves, whiles others take paine and travell. And yet a guest that goeth to suppe with another, hath something to doe and observe when he sits at the table, if hee would be thought civill and manerly: how much more then, in all reason, is an auditour bound so to do, who is to heare another speake. For he is partaker with him of his speech, yea, and by right, a coadjutor of him: he ought not then, to examine rigourously his faults escaped; hee is not to sift narrowly, and weigh in severe ballance each word of his, and every gesture; whiles hee himselfe (exempt from censure and controllment, and without feare of being espied and searched into) committeth many enormities, unseemly parts, and incongruities in hearing. For like as at Tennis play, he that receiveth the ball, ought in the stirring and motion of his bodie to accommodate himselfe handsonely and in order to his fellow that smit it; even so betweene the speaker and the hearer, if both of them observe their duetie and decency, there would be a mutual and reciprocal proportion. Now in yielding praises unto the Reader or Speaker, we must not inconsiderately, use all manner of termes and acclamations without discretion: For Epicurus himselfe is not well liked, but odious, when he saith, That upon the reading of any letters missive from his friends unto him, they that were about him did set up excessive outcries and applauses, with troublesome clapping of their hands. And verily those who bring in now adaves into the auditive uncooth and strange noises by way of acclamation; they also who have brought up these termes: O heavenly and divine speech; The voice of God & not of man, uttered by his mouth; and, Who is able to come neere unto him? as though it were not sufficient, simply thus to say; O well said, Wisely spoken, or, Truly delivered; which were the testimonies and signes of

praise which Plato, Socrates, and Hyperides used in old time) such men, I say, doe highly offend, and passe the bounds of decency exceeding much: nay, they doe traduce and abuse the speakers themselves, as though they did hunt after, and lay for such excessive and proud commendations. Those also be odious and unpleasant, who as if they were in some judiciall Court, depose and give formal testimony as touching the honour of the speakers, and binde the same with an oath: neither be they in lesse fault, who without regard of the qualitie of persons, doe accommodate unto them their titles of praise beside all decorum: As for example, when they be ready to crie aloud unto a Philosopher, O quicke and witty saying! and unto an olde man, O what a brave and jolly speech is this! transferring and applying unto Philosophers those words and termes that ordinarily are used or attributed to plaicers, or such as exercise and shew themselves in scholasticall declamations: and to a serious and sober oration, giving a praise more becoming a light and wanton courtisan: which is as much, as if upon the head of a victorious champion, they should set a garland of lillies or roses, and not of the lawrell or wilde olive tree. Euripides verily, the Poet, when one overheard him as he prompted and ended unto the actors or persons in the Chorus, a certaine song set to muscical harmonie, and therewith laughed heartilie whiles he instructed them in fingering the same; If thou wert not (quoth hee) some blockish and senselesse dolt, thou wouldest never laugh when I sing a heavy mixt-Lyidian tune, or a note to a dumpe or dolefull dittie. Semblably, a grave Philosopher, and a man exercised in managing State affaires, might very well in mine advice, cut off, and repress the delicate insolvency of some auditour, over wantonly disposed to mirth and jolity, by saying thus unto him; Thou seemest unto me a brainfick fellow, & untaught for otherwise whiles I am teaching, preaching, and reproofing vices, discourfing and reading of policie and the administration of Common weale, of the nature of the gods, or the duetie of a Magistrate, thou wouldest neither daunce thus and sing as thou doest. For consider with me in truth, what a disorder is this. That when a Philosopher is in the Schoole at his lecture reading, they within should keepe a crying and howling, and make such noises, as they that be without can not tell whether it be some piper, harper, or dauncer that they thus do praise, such a confused brute they make within. Moreover, we ought not to heare the reprehensions, rebukes, and corrections of Philosophers, recklessly without sense of griefe and displeasure, nor yet unmanly: for they that can so well abide to be reprooved or blamed by a Philosopher, and make nothing adoe at it, inso much as when they be found fault withall, they fall a laughing, or can finde in their hearts to praise those that do reprehend them, much like unto those flattering Parasites, who are content to extoll and commend their good masters that give them their meat and drinke, notwithstanding they be reviled and taunted by them: these fellows (I say) of all others, be most rash, audacious and bolde, shewing thereby their shamelesse impudencie, which is no good nor true argument of courage and fortitude. As for a pretie scoffe pleasantly delivered, and in mirth, without any wrong meant, or touch of credit, if a man know how to take it well, and be not moved thereby to choler and displeasure, but laugh it out, it doth argue no base minde, nor want of wit and understanding, but is a liberall and gentleman-like qualitie, favouring much of the ingenious maner of the Lacedaemonians.

But to heare a sharpe checke that toucheth the very quicke, and a reprehension to reforme manners, delivered in cutting and tart words, much like unto an egar and biting medicine, and therewith not to be cast downe, and shrinke together for feare, nor to run all into a sweat, or be ready to reele and stagger with a diziness in the head, for very shame that hath set the heart on fire, but to seeme inflexible and nothing thereat moved, smiling in some sort, and drily scoffing after a dissembling maner, is a notable signe of a most dissolute and illiberall nature, past all grace, and that batheth for nothing, being so long wonted and inured to euill doing; in such sort, as the heart and conscience is hardened and overgrown with a certaine brawne and thicke skinne, which will not receive the marke or wale of any lash, be it never so sinfull. And as there be many such, so you shall meet with other youtnes of another nature meere contrary unto them; who if they happen but once to be checked and to heare ill, are soone gone, and will not turne againe, but quit the Philosophic schooles for ever. These being endued by nature with the good rudiments and beginnings of vertue tending unto felicity another day, to wit, Shamefastnesse and Abashtment, loose the benefit thereof, in that by reason of their overmuch delicacy and effeminate minds, they can not abide reproofs, nor with generousie endure correctious, but turne away their itching eares, to heare rather the pleasant and smooth tales of some flatterers or sophisters, which yeld them no fruit nor profit at all in the end. For as hee, who after incision made, or the fear of dismembring performed by the Chyrurgian, runneth away from him, and will

will not tary to have his wound bound up or feared, withstandeth all the paine of the cure, but misseeth the good that might ensue thereof: even so he, who unto that speech of the Philosophier which hath wounded and launced his follie and untowardnesse, will not give leasure to heale the same up, and bring it to a perfect & confirmed skin againe, goeth his waies with the painfull bit and dolorous sting, but wanteth all the helpe and benefit of Philosophie. For not onely the hurt that Telephus received, as Euripides saith,

*By skales of rust bosh ease and remedie found,
Fild from the speare that first did make the wound.*

but also the pricke inflicted upon a towardly yooing man by Philosophie, is healed by the same words that did the hurt. And therefore when hee findeth himselfe checked and blamed, feelle he must and suffer some smart, abide (I say) he ought to be bitten, but not to be crushed and confounded therewith, not to be discouraged and dismaide for ever. Thus he is to thinke of himselfe being now inducted in Philosophie, as if he were a novice newly instituted and professed in some religious orders and sacred myteries: namely, that after he hath patiently endured a while the first expiatorie purifications and troubles, he may hope at the end thereof to see and finde some sweete and goodly fruit of consolation, after this present disquietnesse and agonie. Say also, that he were wrongfully and without cause thus snubbed and rebuked by the Philosophier, yet he shall do well to have patience and sit out the end. And after the speech finished, he may adresse an Apologie unto him and iustifie himselfe, praying him to reserve this libertie of speech and vehemency of reproofe which he now used, for to repress and redresse some other fault, which he shall indeed have committed. Moreover, like as in Grammar, the learning to spel letters and to reade: in Musicke also to play upon the Lute or Harpe; yea and in bodily exercise, the feat of wrestling and other activities, at the beginning be painefull, cumbersome, and exceeding hard, but after that one be well entred and have made some progresse therein, by little and little continuall use and custome (much after the manner of conversing and acquaintance among men) maketh maiestrie, engendreth further knowledge, and then everie thing that was strange and difficult before, prooveth familiar and easie ynowh both to say and doe. Even so, it fareth in Philosophie, whereth the first there seemeth no doubt to be some strangenesse, obscuritie, and I wot not what barrennesse, as well in the termes and words, as in the matters therein contained: Howbeit, for all that a yooing man must not for want of heart be astonied at the first entrance into it, nor yet for faintnesse be discouraged and give over: but make proofe and triall of every thing, persevere and continue in diligence, desirous ever to passe on still and proceed further, and as it were, to draw well before, waiting and attending the time which may make the knowledge thereof familiar by use and custome, the onely meanes which causeth everie thing that is of itselfe good and honest, to be also sweete and pleasant in the ende. And verily this familiaritie will come on apace, bringing with it a great cleernesse and light of learning: it doth ingenerate also an ardent love and affection to vertue, without which love, a man were most wretched or timorous, if he should apply himselfe to follow another course of life, having once given over for want of heart the studie of Philosophie. But peradventure it may fall out so, that young men not well experienced, may find at the beginning such difficulties in some matters that hardly or unneth at all they shall be able to comprehend them. Howbeit, they are themselves partly the cause that they doe incur this obscuritie and ignorance: who being of divers and contrarie natures, yet fall into one and the selfesame inconvenience. For some upon a certaine respectful reverence which they bare unto their Reader and Doctour, or because they would seeme to spare him, are afraid to aske questions, and to be confirmed and resolved in doubts arising from the doctrine which he delivereth: and so give signes by nodding their heads that they approve all, as if they understood everie thing verie well. Others againe by reason of a certaine importune ambition and vaine emulation of others, for to shew the quicknesse and promptitude of their wit, and their readie capacite, giving out that they fully understand that which they never conceived, by that meanes attaine to nothing. And thus it cometh to passe, that those bashfull ones, who for modestie and shamesfastnes are silent and dare not aske that wherof they are ignorant, after they be departed out of the auditorie, are in heavinesse and doubtfull perplexitie, untill at last they be driven of necessitie with greater shame to trouble those who have once already delivered their doctrine, to runne (I say) unto them backe againe and moove questions anew. And as for these ambitious, bold and presumptuous persons they be forced to palliat, cover and disguise their ignorance and blindnes which abideth with them for ever. Therefore casting behinde us and rejecting all such stupiditie and vanitie;

vanitie; let us take paines and endeavour howsoever we do, to learne and thoroughly to comprehend, all profitable discourses that shall be taught unto us: and for to effect this, let us be content gently to beare the scoffes and derisions of others, that thinke themselves quicker of conceit than our selves: according to the example of Cleanthes and Xenocrates, who being for what more grosse and dull of capacite than others their school-fellowes, ran not therefore away from schoole, nor were any whit discouraged, but the first that scoffed and made sport with themselves, saying they were like unto narrow mouthed vessels and brazen tables, for that they hardly conceived any thing that was taught them, but they retained and kept the same faste and surely when they had it once: for not onely as Phocylides saith,

Who seeks in the end for goodnes: and for praise,

but also to suffer himselfe to be mocked oftentimes and to endure much reproch, to abide broad jests and skurrie scoffes: expelling ignorance with all his might and maine: yea, and conquering the same.

Moreover, we must be carefull to avoide one fault more, which many commit on the contrarie side; who for that they be somewhat slow of apprehension and idle withall, are verie troublesome unto their teachers, and importune them overmuch: when they be apart by themselves, they will not take any paines nor labour to understand that which they have heard; but they put their masters to new travell, who reade unto them: asking and enquiring of them ever and anon concerning one and the same thing, resembling herein yooing callow birds which are not yet feathered and fledg'd, but alwaies gaping toward the bill of the damme, and so by their good wils would have nothing given them, but that which hath beene chewed and prepared already. Now there be others yet, who desirous beyond all reason to be counted quick of wit and attentive hearers, weare their masters even as they are reading unto the, with much prittle prattle, interrupting them everie foot in their lectures, demanding of them one thing or other that is needlesse and impertinent, calling for proofs and demonstrations of things where no need is:

Thus they much paines for little sake,

And of short way long journeyes make.

According as Sophocles said, making much worke, not onely for themselves, but also for others: For staying their teacher thus as they doe everie foote with their vaine and superfluous questions, as if they were walking together upon the way, they hinder the course of the lecture, being so often interrupted and broken off. These fellows then according to the saying of Hierom, in this doing are much like to cowardly & dastardly curie dogs, which, when they be at home within house, will bite the hides and skines of wilde beasts, and lie rugging at their shagged haire: but they dare not touch them abroad in the field. Furthermore, I would give those others, who are but soft spirited and slow withall, this counsell that retaining the principall points of everie matter, they supplie the rest apart by themselves, exercising their memorie, and as it were leading it by the hand to all that dependeth thereon: to the end that when they have conceived in their spirit the words of others, as it were the elementarie beginning and the verie seede, they might nourish and augment the same: For that the minde and understanding of man is not of the nature of a vessel that requireth to be filled up: but it hath neede onely of some match (if I may so say) to kindle and set it on fire (like as the matter standeth ever in need of the efficient cause) which may ingender in it a certaine inventive motion, and an affection to finde out the truth. Well then, like as if a man going to his neighbour for to fetch fire, and finding there good store, and the same burning light in the chimney, should sit him downe by it and warme himselfe continually thereat, and never make care to take some of it home with him, you would take him to be unwill: even so he, that cometh to another for to learne, and thinketh not that he ought to kindle his owne fire within and make light in his owne minde, but taketh pleasure in hearing onely, and there stireth by his master still, and joyeth onely in this contentment: he may well get himselfe a kind of opinion by the words of another, like a fresh and red colour by sitting by the fire side: but as for the mosse or rust of his minde within, he shall never skoure it out, nor disperse the darkenes by the light of Philosophie.

Now if there be neede yet of one precept more to achieve the dutie of a good auditor, it is this, That we ought to remember oftsoones that which now I have to say: namely, That we exercise our wit and understanding by our selves, to invent something of our owne, as well as to comprehend that which we heare of others: to the end that we may acquire within our selves a certaine habitude, not sophistical nor historical, that is to say, apparant onely, and able to recite barely that which we have been taught by others, but a more inwardly imprinted and philosophical, making this account, that the verie beginning of a good life is to heare well and as we ought.

OF MORALL VERTUE.

The Summarie.

*B*efore he entresh into the discourse of vertues and vices, he treateth of Morall vertue in generall: proponing in the first place the diversitie of opinions of Philosophers as touching this point: the which he discusseth and examineth: Wherein after that he had begun to dispute concerning the composition of the soule, he adjoyneth his owne opinion touching that propertie, which Morall vertue hath particularly by it selfe, as also wherein it differeth from contemplative Philosophie. Then having defined the Mediocritie of this vertue, and declared the difference betweene Continence and Temperance, he speaketh of the impression of reason in the soule. And by this meanes addresseth himselfe against the Stoicks, & disputeth concerning the affections of the soule: proving the inequality therein, with such a refutation of the contrarie objections, that after he had taught how the reasonlesse part of the soule, ought to be managed, he discovereth by divers similitudes and reasons; the absurdities of the said Stoicke Philosophers, who instead of well governing and ruling the soule of man, have as much as lieth in them, extinguished and abolished the same.

OF MORALL VERTUE.

*M*y purpose is to treat of that vertue, which is both called and also reputed Morall, and namely wherein it differeth especially from vertue contemplative: as having for the subject matter thereof, the passions of the minde, and for the forme, Reason: Likewise of what nature and substance it is; as also, how it doth subsist and hath the Being: to wit, whether that part of the soule which is capable of the said vertue be endited and adorned with reason as appropriate and peculiar unto it; or, whether it borrow it from other parts, & so receiving it, be like unto things mingled, and adhering to the better: or rather, for that being under the government and rule of another, it be said to participate the power and puissance of that which commendeth it? For; that vertue also may subsist and have an essentiall being, without any subject matter and mixture at all, I suppose it is very evident and apparent. But first and foremost, I hold it very expedient, briefly to run through the opinions of other Philosophers, not so much by way of an Historical narration and so an end, as, that when they be once shewed and laid abroad, our opinion may both appeere more plainly, and also be held more surely.

Menedemus then, who was borne in the citie Eretria, abolished all pluralitie and difference of vertues, supposing that there was but one onely vertue, and the same known by sundry names: 50 For he said, that it was but one and the same thing, which men called Temperance, Fortitude, and Iustice: like as if one should say, A Reasonable creature and a man; he meaneth the selfe same thing. As for Ariston the Chian, he was of opinion likewise, that in substance there was no more but one vertue, the which he termed by the name of Health: many, in some divers respects, there were many vertues, and those different one from another: as namely for example, if a man should call our eye-sight, when it beholdeth white things Leucothea: when it seeth black Melanthea: and so likewise in other matters. For vertue, (quoth he) which concerneth and considereth considereth what we ought either to do or not to do, beareth the name of Prudence: when it ruleth and ordereth our lust or concupiscence, limiting out a certaine measure, and lawfull proportion of time unto pleasures, it is called Temperance: if it intermedle with the commerce, contracts and negotiation betweene man and man, then it is named Iustice: like as (to make it more plaine) a knife is the same still, although it cut, now one thing, and then another: and the fire notwithstanding it worketh upon sundry matters, yet it remaineth alwaies of one and the same nature. It seemeth also, that Zeno the Citiean, inclined in some sort to this opinion, who in defining Prudence, saith, that when it doth distribute to every man his owne, it ought to be called Iustice when it is occupied in objects either to be chosen or avoided, then it is Temperance; and in bearing or suffering, it should be named Fortitude. Now, they that defend and mainteine this opinion of Zeno, affirme, that by Prudence he understandeth Science or Knowledge. But Chrysippus, who was of this minde, that each vertue had a peculiar qualitie, and according to it, ought to be defined and set downe, wilt not how (ere he was aware) he brought into Philosophie, and as Plato saith, raised a swarme of vertues never knowne before, and where-with the schooles had not beene acquainted. For like as of Valiant he derived Valour, of Iust Iustice, of Clement Clemencie: so also of Gracious, he comes in with Gratiostie, of Good, Goodnes, of Great, Greatnesse, of Honest, Honestie, and all other such like Dexterities, affabilities and courtesies, he termed by the name of vertues, and so pestered Philosophie with new, strange and absurd words, more wis than was needfull.

Now these Philosophers agree jointly all in this, that they set downe vertue to be a certaine disposition and power of the principall part of the soule, acquired by reason: or rather, that it is reason it selfe: and this they suppose as a truth confessed, certaine, firme and irrefragable. They hold also, that the part of the soule, subject to passions, sensually, brutish and unreasonable, differeth not from reason by any essentiall difference, or by nature: but they imagine, that the very part and substance of the soule which they call understanding, reason, and the principal part, being wholly turned and changed, as well in sodaine passions, as alterations by habitude and disposition, becometh either vice or vertue, and in it selfe hath no brutishnesse at all: but is named onely unreasonable, according as the motion of the appetite and lust is so powerfull, that it becometh mistresse, and by that meanes she is driven and caried forcibly to some dishonest and absurd course, contrary to the judgement of reason: For they would have that very motion or passion it selfe to be reason, howbeit depraved and naught, as taking her force and strength from false and perverse judgement. Howbeit, all these (as it may seeme) were ignorant of this one point; namely, that each one of us (to speake truly) is double and compound: And as for one of these duplicities, they never thoroughly saw; that onely which is of the twaine more evident, to wit, the mixture or composition of the soule and body they acknowledge. And yet, that there is besides a certaine duplicitie in the soule it selfe, which consisteth of two divers and different natures: and namely, that the brutish and reasonles part, in manner of another bodie is combined and knit into reason by a certaine naturall linke of necessitie: It seemeth that Pythagoras himselfe was not ignorant: And this we may undoubtedly gather and conjecture by his great diligence which he employed in that Musicke and Harmonie which he inferred for the dulcing, taining & appeasing of the soule: as knowing full well, that all the parts thereof were not obedient and subject to instruction, learning and discipline, ne yet such as might by reason be altered and trained from vice to vertue: but required some other kinde of perswasive power cooperative with it, for to frame the same and make it gentle and tractable: for otherwise it would be hardly or never conquered by Philosophie, and brought within the compasse of obedience; so obdinate and rebellious it is. And Plato verily was of this opinion (which he professed openly, and held as a firme and vndoubted truth) that the soule of this universall world, is not simple, uniforme, and uncompounded, but mixed (as it were) of a certaine power of Identitie and of Diversity. For after one sort, it is governed and turned about continually in an uniforme manner, by means of one and the same order, which is powerfull and predominant over all: and after another sort againe, it is divided into circles, spheres, and motions, wandering and contrary in maner to the other: whereupon dependeth the beginning of diversitie in generation of all things in the earth. Semblably (quoth he) the soule of man, being a part and portion of that universall soule of the world, composed likewise of proportions and numbers answerable to the other, is not simple and of one nature or affection, but one part thereof is more spirittuall, intelligible and reasonable, which ought of right and according to nature have the soveraigntie and command in man: the other is brutish, sensually, erroneous, and disorderly of it selfe, requiring the direction and guidance of another. Now, this is subdivided againe into other two parts; whereof the one is alwaies called Corporall or Vegetative; the other Thy-mocides, as one would say, Irascible and Concupiscible; which one while doeth adhere and stick close to the foresaid grosse and corporall portion: and otherwhiles to the more pure and spirituall part, which is the Discourse of reason; unto which according as it doth frame and apply it selfe, it giveth strength and vigor thereto. Now the difference betweene the one and the other, may be knowne principally by the fight and resistance that often times is betweene understanding and reason on the one side, and the concupiscence and wrathfull part on the other; which sheweth that these other faculties are often disobedient and repugnant to the best part. And verily, Aristotle used these principles and grounds especially above all others at the first, 10 as appeareth by his writings: but afterwards, he attributed the irascible part unto the concupiscible, confounding them both together in one, as if ire were a concupiscence or desire of revenge. Howbeit, this he alwaies held to the very end, That the brutish and sensuall part, which is subject unto passions, was wholly and ever distinct from the intellectuall part, which is the same that reason: not that it is fully deprived of reason, as is that corporall and grosse part of the soule, to wit, whereby we have sense onely common with beasts, and whereby we are nourished as plants. But whereas, this being furd and deafe, and altogether incapable of reason, doth after a sort preceed and spring from the flesh, and alwaies cleave unto the bodie: the other sensuall part which is so subject unto passions, although it be in it selfe destitute of reason, as a thing proper unto it: yet nevertheless apt and fit it is to heare and obey the understanding and dis- 20 coursing part of the minde; insonmuch as it will turne vnto it, suffer it selfe to be ranged and ordered according to the rules and precepts thereof; unless it be utterly spoiled and corrupted, either by blinde and foolish pleasure, or els by a loose and intemperate course of life. As for them that make a wonder at this, and do not conceive how that part being in some sort brutish and unreasonable, may yet be obedient unto reason, they seeme unto me as if they did not well comprehend the might and power of reason: namely, how great it is, and forcible, or how farre forth it may pearce and passe in command, guidance and direction; not by way of rough, chur- 30 lith, violent, and irregular courses, but by faire and formall meanes, which are able to doe more by gentle inducements and persuasions, than all the necessarie constraints and inforcements in the world. That this is so, it appeareth by the breath, spirits, sinewes, bones, and other parts of the body, which be altogether void of reason: howbeit, so soone as there ariseth any motion of the will, which shaketh (as it were) the reins of reason never so little, all of them keepe their order, they agree together, and yeeld obedience. As for example, if the minde and will be disposed to run, the feet are quickly stretched out and ready for a course; the hands likewise settle to their businesse, if there be a motion of the minde either to throw, or take holde of any thing. And verily, the Poet Homer most excellently expresseth the sympathie and conformitie of this brutish part of the soule unto reason, in these verses;

*Thus wept the chaste Penelope, and drencht her lovely face
With dreary teares, which from her eyes ran trickling downe apace
For tender heart, bewailing sore
the losse of husband deere, Vlysses bright, who was in place set by her side full neere.
And he himselfe in soule, no lesse, dispirite for to see
His best beloved thus to weepe:
but wise and craftie he Kept in his teares: for why?
his eyes within his lids were set
As stiffe as yron and sturdy borne,
one drop would they not shed.*

In such obedience to the judgement of reason he had his breath, spirits, his blood and his teares. An evident prooffe hereof is to be seene in those, whose flesh doth rise upon the first sight of faire and beautifull persons: for no sooner doth reason or law forbid to come neere and touch them, but presently the same falleth, lieth downe, and is quiet againe without any stirring or 40 panting panting at all. A thing verie ordinarie and most commonly perceived in those, who be enamored upon faire women, not knowing at first who they were: For so soone as they perceive afterwards, that they be their owne sisters or daughters, their lust presently cooleth, by meanes of reason that toucheth it and interposeth it selfe betweene: so that the bodie keepeth all the members thereof decently in order, and obedient to the judgement of the said reason. Moreover, it falleth out oftentimes, that we eate with a good stomacke and great pleasure certaine meates and viands, before we know what they are: but after we understand and perceive once that we have taken either that which was uncleane or unlawfull and forbidden: not onely in our judgement and understanding we finde trouble and offence thereby; but also our bodily faculties a- 10 greeing to our opinion are dismaied thereat: so that anon, there ensue vomits, sicke quawmes, and overturnings of the stomacke, which disquiet all the whole frame. And were it not, that I greatly feared to be thought of purpose, to gather and insert in my discourse such pleasant and youthfull inducements, I could inferre in this place Plalteries, Lautes, Harpes, Pipes, Flutes, and other like muscicall instruments, how they are devised by Art, for to accord and frame with humane passions: for notwithstanding they be altogether without life, yet they cease not to apply themselves unto us, and the judgement of our minds, lamenting, singing, and wantonly disposing together with us, resembling both the turbulent passions, and also the milde affections and dispositions of those that play upon them. And yet verily it is reported alio of Zeno himselfe, that he went one day to the Theatre for to heare the Musician Anabius, who sung unto the 20 Harpe: saying unto his scholers, Let us goe Sirs and learne what harmonic and musick the entrails of beasts, their sinewes and bones: Let us see (I say) what resonance and melodie bare wood may yeeld, being disposed by numbers, proportions and order. But leaving these examples, I would gladly demand and aske of them, if when they see dogs, horses, and birds, which we nourish and keepe in our houses, brought to that passe by use, feeding and teaching, that they learne to render sensible words, to performe certaine motions, gestures, and divers leaces, both pleasant and profitable unto us; and likewise, when they read in Homer, how Achilles encouraged to battell both horse and man; they doe marvell still and make doubt, whether that part and facultie in us, whereby we are angrie, do lust, joy or grieve, be of that nature that it can well obey reason, and be so affected and disposed thereby that it may give assent thereto: confi- 30 dering especially, that it is not seated or lodged without, nor separated from us, ne yet framed by any thing which is not in us: no nor shapen by forcible meanes and constraint, to wit, by mold, stroke of hammer, or any such thing: but as it is fitted and forged by nature, so it keepeth to her, is conversant with her, and finally persited and accomplished by custome and continuance. Which is the reason that verie properly Manners be called in Greeke by the name ethos, to give us to understand, that they are nothing else (to speake plainly and after a grosse manner) but a certaine qualitie imprinted by long continuance of time, in that part of the soule which of it selfe is unreasonable: and is named ethos, for that the said reasonlesse part framed by reason, taketh this qualitie or difference (call it whether you will) by the meanes of long time and custom which they terme ethos. For reason is not willing to roote out quite all passions (which were nei- 40 ther possible nor expedient) but onely it doth limit them within certaine bounds, and setteth downe a kinde of order: and thus after a sort causeth Morall vertues not to be impossibilities, but rather mediocrities and regularities, or moderations of our affections: and this it doth by the meanes of prudence and wisdom, which reduceth the power of this sensuall and pathetick part, unto a civill and honest habitude. For these three things (they say) are in the soule of man, to wit, a naturall puissance or facultie, a passion or motion, and also an habitude. Now the said facultie or power is the verie beginning, and (as a man would say) the matter of passions, to wit, the power or aptnesse to be angrie, to be ashamed, or to be confident and bold. The passion is the actual mooving of the said power: namely, anger it selfe, shame, confidence or boldnes. The habitude is a settled and confirmed strength established in the sensuall or unreasonable 50 part by continuall use and custome: which if the passions be ill governed by reason, becometh to be a vice: and contrariwise, a vertue; in case the same be well ordered and directed thereby. Moreover, forasmuch as Philosophers do not hold and affirme, that everie vertue is a mediocritie nor call it Morall: to the end therefore, that we may the better declare and shew the difference, we had need to fetch the beginning of this discourse farther off.

Of all things then that be in the world, some have their essence and being of themselves absolutely and simply: others respectively and in relation to us. Absolutely have their being the earth, the heaven, the stars, and the sea: Respectively and in regard of us, Good, evil, profitable, ble, hurtfull, pleasant, and displeasing. Now it being so, that reason doth contemplate and behold, the one sort as well as the other: the former ranke of those things which are simply and absolutely so, pertaine unto science and speculation, as their proper objects: the second kinde of those things which are understood by reference and regard unto us, pertaine properly unto consultation and action. And as the vertue of the former sort is called Sapience: so the vertue of the other is named Prudence. For a difference there is betwene Prudence and Sapience: in this, that Prudence consisteth in a certaine relation & application of the contemplative facultie of the soule unto Action, and unto the regiment of the sensuall part according to reason: by which occasion, Prudence had need of the assistance of Fortune: whereas Sapience hath nothing to do with it, no more than it hath need of consultation, for to attaine and reach unto the ende it aymeth at. For that indeed it concerneth such things as be ever one and alwaies of the same sort. And like as the Geometrician never consulteth as touching a triangle, to wit, whether it hath three angles equall to twaine that be right, or no? Because he knoweth assuredly that it hath (for all consultations are concerning things that varie and alter sometime after one sort, and otherwhiles after another, and never medleth with those that be firme, stable, and immutable) even so, the understanding and contemplative facultie of the minde, exercising her functions in those first and principall things which be permanent, and have evermore the same nature, not capable of change and mutation; is sequestred and exempt altogether from consultation. But Prudence which descendeth to things full of varietie, error, trouble, and confusion, must of necessitie crosse them intermedle with casualties, and use deliberation in things more doubtfull and uncertaine: yea and after it hath consulted to proceed unto action, calling and drawing unto it the reasonlesse part also to be assistant and present, as drawn into the judgement of things to be executed. For need those actions have of a certaine instinct and motion to set them forward, which this Morall habitude doth make in each passion, and the same instinct requireth likewise the assistance of reason to limit it that it may be moderate, to the ende that it neither exceed the meane, nor come short and be defective: for that it cannot be chosen but this brutish and passible part hath motions in it; some overvehement, quicke and sudden, others as slow againe, and more slacke than is meet. Which is the reason that our actions cannot be good but after one manner: whereas, they may be evill after divers sorts: like as a man cannot hit the marke but one way: marie he may misse sundrie waies, either by overshooting or coming short. The part and dutie then, of that active facultie of reason according to nature, is to cut off and take away all those excessive or defective passions, and to reduce them unto a mediocritie. For whereas the said instinct or motion, either by infirmities, effeminate delicacie, feare, or slothfulness, doth faile and come short of dutie and the end required, these active reason is present ready to rouse, excite, and stirre up the same. Again on the other side, when it runneth on end beyond all measure, after a dissolute and disorderly manner, these reason is prest, to abridge that which is too much, and to repress and stay the same: thus ruling and restraining these pathetical motions, it breedeth in man these Morall vertues whereof we speake, imprinting them in that reasonlesse part of the mind: and no other they are than a meane betwene excessive and defect. Neither must we thinke, That all vertues do consist in a mediocritie: for Sapience or Wisedome, which stand in no need at all of the brutish and unreasonable part, and consist onely in the pure and sincere intelligence and discourse of understanding, and not subject to all passions, is the verie height and excellencie of reason, perfect and absolute of it selfe: a full and accomplished power (I say) wherein is engendered that most divine, heavenly and happie knowledge. But Morall vertue which favourerth somewhat of the earth, by reason of the necessities of our bodie, and in which regard it standeth in neede of the instrumentall ministerie of the pathetical part, for to worke and performe her operations, being in no wise the corruption or abolition of the sensuall and unreasonable part of the soule, but rather the order, moderation and embellishment thereof, is the extremitie and height of excellencie, in respect of the facultie and qualitie: but considering the quantitie is rather a mediocritie, taking away the excessive on the one side and the defect on the other.

But now, forasmuch as this terme of Meane or Mediocrity may be understood diverse waies, we are to set downe what kinde of meane this Morall vertue is. First and formost therefore whereas there is one meane compounded of two simple extremes, as a russet or browne colour betwene white and blacke: also that which containeth and is contained, must needs be the midst betwene the thing that doth containe and is contained, as for example, the number of 8. is just betwene 1. 2. and 4. like as that, which taketh no part at all of either extreme, as namely those things which we call Adiaphora, Indifferent, and do partake neither good nor ill: In none of these significations or senses can this vertue be called a meane or mediocrity. For surely it may not be in any wise a composition or mixture of two vices which be both worse: neither doth it comprehend the lesse and defective: or is comprehended of that which is overmuch above decency, and excessive, ne yet is it altogether void of passions and perturbations, subject to excessive and defect, to more and lesse than is meet. But this morall vertue of ours, as it is in deed, so also it is called a Meane, especially in respect of that mediocrity which is observed in the Harmonie and accord of sounds. For like as in Musick there is a note or sound called the Meane, for that it is the middes betwene the treble and base, which in Greeke be called Hypate and Nete, and lieth just betwixt the height and loudnesse of the one, and the lownesse or baseness of the other: Even so, morall vertue being a motion and facultie about the unreasonable part of the soule, tempereth the remission and intention; and in one word taketh away the excessive and defect of the passions, reducing each of them to a certaine Mediocrity and moderation that falleth not on any side.

Now to begin with Fortitude, they say it is the meane between Cowardise & rash Audacity, of which twaine the one is a defect, the other an excessive of the yrefull passion. Liberalitie, betwene Niggardise & Prodigalitie: Clemencie & Mildnesse, betwene senselesse Indolence and Crueltie: Iustice, the meane of giving more or lesse than due, in contracts and affaires betwene menlike as Temperance, a mediocrity betwene the blockish stupiditie of the minde mooved with no touch of pleasure, & an unbridled looseness whereby it is abandoned to all sensuality. Wherein especially & most clearly is given us to understand & see the difference between the brutish & the reasonable part of the soule: & thereby evident it is that wandering passions be one thing, & reason another: for otherwise we should not discern Continencie from Temperance, nor Incontinencie from Intemperance, in pleasure and lusts, if that facultie of the mind whereby we judge, and that whereby we cover and desire were all one and the same: but now, Temperance is, when reason is able to manage, handle and govern the sensuall and passionate part (as if it were a beast brought up by hand and made tame and gentle, so as it will be readie to obey it in all desires and lusts, yea and willing to receive the bit) whereas Continencie is when reason doth rule and command concupiscence as being the stronger, and leadeth it, but not without some paines and trouble thereof, for that it is not willing to shew obedience, but striveth, flingeth out sidelong, & goeth crossed, inasmuch as it hath enough to do for to master it with stripes of the cudgell, and with hard bits of the bridle to hold it in and restraine it, whilst it resisteth all that ever it may, and putteth reason to much agonie, trouble and travail: which Plato doth lively represent unto us by a proper similitude, saying, that there be two draught beasts which draw the chariot of our soules, whereof the worst doth both winke and strive against the other fellow in the same yoke, and also troubleth the coachman or charioteer, who hath the conduct of them; putting him to his shifts that he is faine alwaies to pull in and hold his head hard, otherwhiles glad to let him slacke and give him the head for feare, as Symonides saith,

out of his hands should slip anon.

Thus you see what the reason is, why they do not vouchsafe Continencie, the name of a perfect vertue in it selfe, but thinke it to be lesse than vertue. For there is not in it a certaine mediocrity arising from the Symphonie and accord of the worst with the better: neither is the excessive of passion cut away, ne yet doth the appetite yeeld it selfe obedient and agreeable to reason: but doth trouble and vex, and is troubled and vexed reciprocally, being kept downe perforce and by constraint; like as in a seditious state, both parties at discord, intending mischief and warre one against another, dwell together within the precinct of one wall: inasmuch as the soule of a continent person for the height and variance betwene reason and appetite, may apply be compared as Sophocles saith unto a city,

Which at one time is full of incesse sweete

Resounding mirth with loud triumphant song,

And yet the same doth yeeld in every streete

All signes of griefe, with plaints and groanes among.

And hereupon it is also, that they hold Incontinencie to be lesse than Vice: many Intemperance they will have to be a full & compleat vice indeed: For that in it as the affection is ill, so the reason also is corrupt & depraved: and as by the one it is incited & led to the appetite of filthinesse & dishonestie, so by the other through perverse judgement it is induced to give consent unto dishonestie dishonest lusts, and withall groweth to be senselesse & hath no feeling at all of finnes and faults which it comitteth: whereas Incontinencie retaineth still a right and sound judgement by means of reason: Howbeit through the vehement and violent passion which is stronger than reason, it is caried away against the owne judgement. Moreover, in these respects, it differeth from Intemperance: For that the reason of the incontinent person is overmatched with passion: but of the other, it doth not so much as enter combat therewith. He, albeit he contradict, gainsay, and strives a while, yet in the end yeeldeth unto lusts and followeth them; but the Intemperate man is led thereby, and at the first giveth consent, and approoveth thereof. Again, the Intemperate person is well content, and taketh joy in having sinned: whereas the other is presently grieved thereat. Again, he runneth willingly and of his owne accord to commit sinne and villanie; but the incontinent man, maugre and full against his minde doth abandon honestie. And as there is this distinct difference plainly scene in their deeds and actions, so there is no lesse to be observed in their words and speeches. For the sayings ordinarily of the Intemperate person be these and such like,

*What mirth in life, what pleasure what delights,
Without content in sports of Venus bright?
Were those joies past, and I for them unmeet,
Ring out my knell, bring forth my winding sheet.*

Another faith,
*To eat, to drinke, so merrily, are principall
All pleasures else, I Accessories call.*

As if with all his hart and soule he were wholly given to a voluptuous life, yea and overwhelmed therewith. And no lesse than those, he also who hath these words in his mouth,

*Now suffer me to perish by and by
It pleaseth me to booteth me to dy.*

speakech as one whose appetite and judgement both were out of order and diseased. But the speeches of Incontinent persons be in another key and farre different: For one faith,

*My mind is good and I her doth sway,
My nature bad, and puts it away.*

Another,
*Alas, alas, To see how Gods above have sent to men on earth this miserie
To know their Good, and that which they should love yet wanting grace, to do the contrary!*

And a third,
*Now plucks, now hales, of deadly gree a pre:
but surely, hold my reason can no more:
Tham anchor flanke stay ship from being split,
when grounded 'tis on Janas nere to the shore.*

He nameth unproperly and without good grace the flank of an anchor resting lightly upon the loose sand, to signifie the feeble hold that reason hath which is not resolute and firmly seated, but through the weaknesse and delicacie of the soule, rejecteth and forsaketh judgement: And not much unlike heereunto, is this comparison also that another maketh in a contrarie sense;

*Much like a ship which fastened in to land
With cordage strong, wher of we may be bold,
The windes do blow, and yet the ship withst and
And checke them all, her cables take such hold.*

He termeth the judgement of reason, when it resisteth a dishonest act, by the name of Cable and Cordage; which notwithstanding afterwards may be broken by the violence of some passion (as it were) with the continuall gales of a blustering winde. For to say a very truth, the intemperate person is by his lusts and desires caried with full saile to his pleasures; hee giveth himselfe thereto, and thither directeth his whole course: but the incontinent person tendeth thither also: howbeit (as a man would say) crookedly and not directly, as one desirous and endeavouring to withdraw himselfe, and to repell the passion that draweth and moveth him to it, yet in the end he also slideth and falleth into some foule and dishonest act: Like as Timon by way of biting, scoffe, traduced and reproved Anaxarchus in this wise,

Here

*Here shew's it selfe the dogged force of Anaxarchus fell,
So stubborn and so permanent, when once he took a pebble:
And yet as wise as he would seeme, a wretch (I heard folks tell)
He judged was: for that to vice and pleasures overmuch
By nature prone he was: a thing that sages most do shun
Which brought him backe out of the way, and made him dote anon,*

For neither is a wise Sage properly called continent, but temperate: not a foole incontinent, but intemperate: because the one taketh pleasure and delight in good and honest things; and the other is not offended nor displeased with foule and dishonest actions. And therefore incontinencie resembleneth properly a minde (as I may so say) Sophisticall, which hath some use of reason; but the same so weak, that it is not able to persevere and continue firme in that which it hath once knownen and judged to be right. Thus you may see the differences between Intemperance and Incontinencie: As for Continencie & Temperance, they differ also in certaine respects correspondent in some proportion unto those on the contrary side. For remorse, sorrow, displeasure and indignation, doe not as yet abandon and quit continence: whereas in the minde of a temperate person, all lieth plaine and even on every side; nothing there but quietnesse and integritie; in such sort, as whosoever seeth the great obeisance and the marvellous tranquillitie whereby the reasonlesse part is united & incorporate together with the reasonable, might well say;

*And then anon the winds were downe,
A calme ensued straightway:
No waves were seene, some power divine
The sea asleepe did lay.*

namely, when reason had once extinguished the excessive, furious, and raging motions of the lusts and desires. And yet these affections and passions which of necessity nature hath need of, the same hath reason made so agreeable, so obedient, so friendly and cooperative, yea, and ready to second all good intentions and purposes ready to be executed; that they neither run before it, nor come dragging behinde; ne yet behave themselves disorderly, no, nor shew the least disobedience: so as each appetite is ruled by reason, and willingly accompanieth it,

*Like as the sucking foale doth go
And run with dam, both to and fro.*

The which confirmeth the saying of Xenocrates, touching those who earnestly studie Philosophie, and practise it: For they onely (quoth he) doe that willingly, which others doe perforce and for dread of the law: who forbear indeed to satisfie their pleasures, and turne backe, as if they were scared from them for feare of being bitten of some curst mative or thred cat, regarding nothing els but danger that may ensue thereupon. Now, that there is in the soule a sense and perceivance of that strength, firmity, and resolution to encounter sinfull lusts and desires, as if it had a power to strive and make head againe, it is very plaine and evident: howbeit, some there be, who holde and maintaine, That Passion is nothing different from Reason: neither (by their saying) is there in the mind a dissension or sedition (as it were) of two divers faculties: but at the trouble that we feele, is no more but an alteration or change of one & the selfe same thing to wit, reason both waies; which we our selves are not able to perceive, for that forsooth it changeth suddenly and with such celeritie: never considereth all the while, that the same faculty of the minde is framed by nature to concupiscence and repentance both: to be angry and to feare: inclined to commit some foule and dishonest fact, by the allurements of pleasure, and contrariwise restrained from the same for feare of paine. As for lust, feare, and all such like passions, they are no other (say they) but perverse opinions and corrupt judgements not arising and engendered in any one part of the soule by it selfe, but spread over that which is the chiefe and principall, to wit, reason and understanding, whereof they be the inclinations, assensions, motions, and in one word, certaine operations, which in the turning of an hand be apt to change and passe from one to another: much like unto the sudden braids, starts and runnings to and fro of little children, which how violent soever they be and vehement, yet by reason of their weaknesse are but slippery, unstedfast and unconstant.

But these assertions and oppositions of theirs, are checked and refuted by apparant evidence and common sense: For what man is he that ever felt in himselfe a change of his lust and concupiscence into judgement: and contrariwise an alteration of his judgement into lust: neither doth the wanton lover cease to love when he doth reason with himselfe and conclude, That such

love is to be repressed, and that he ought to strive and fight against it: neither doth he then give over reasoning and judging, when being overcome through weaknesse, he yeeldeth himselfe prisoner and thrall to lust: but like as when by advertisement of reason he doth resist in some sort a passion arising, yet the same doth still tempt him: so likewise when he is conquered and overcome therewith, by the light of the same reason at that verie instant, he seeth and knoweth that he sinneth and doth amisse: so, that neither by those perturbations is reason lost and abolished; nor yet by reason is he freed and delivered from them; but whiles he is tossed thus to and fro, he remaineth a neuter in the mids, or rather participating in cominon of them both: As for those who are of opinion, that one while the principall part of our soule is lust and concupiscence: and then anon that it doth resist & stand against the same: are much like unto them, who imagine & say, that the hunter & the wild beast be not twaine, but one bodie, chaunging it selfe, one while into the forme of an hunter, and another time, taking the shape of a savage beast: For both they in a manifest and apparant matter should seeme to be blind and see nothing: and also these beare witness and depose against their owne sense, considering that they finde and feelee in themselves really not a mutation or change of one onely thing, but a sensible strife and fight of two things together within them. But heere they come upon us againe and object in this wise. How cometh it to passe then (say they) that the power and facultie in man which doth deliberate and consult is not likewise double (being oftentimes distracted, carried, and drawn to contrarie opinions, as it is, namely, touching that which is profitable and expedient) but is one still and the same? True, we must confesse, that divided it seemeth to be: But this comparison doth not hold, neither is the event and effect alike: for that part of our soule wherein prudence and reason is seated, fighteth not with it selfe, but using the helpe of one and the same facultie, it handleth divers arguments, or rather being but one power of discoursing it is employed in sundry subjects and matters different: which is the reason that there is no dolor and griefe at one end of those reasonings and discourses which are without passion; neither are they that consult forced (as it were) to hold one of those contrarie parts against their minde and judgement; unless peradventure it so fall out, that some affection lie close to one part or other, as if a man should secretly and under hand lay somewhat besides in one of the balances or scales, against reason for to weigh it downe. A thing (I assure you) that many times falleth out: and then it is not reason that is poised against reason; but either ambition, emulation, favour, jealousy, feare, or some secret passion, making semblance as if in shew of speeches, two reasons were at variance and differed one from another. As may appeere by these verses in Homer:

*They thought it shame the combat to reject,
And yet for feare they durst not it accept.*

Likewise in another Poet:

*To suffer death is dolorous
though with renoune it meete:
Death to avoid is cowardise:
but yet our life is sweete.*

And verily in determining of controversies betweene man and man in their contracts and suits of law, these passions comming betweene, are they, that make the longest delays, & be the greatest enemies of expedition and dispatch: like as in the counsels of kings and princes, they that speake in favour of one partie and for to win grace, doe not upon any reason of two sentences encline to the one, but they accommodate themselves to their affectio, even against the regard of utility & profit. And this is the cause that in those States which be called Aristocracies, that is to say, governed by a Senate or Counsel of the greatest men: the Magistrates who sit in judgement, will not suffer Oratours & Advocates at the Barre to moove affections in all their Pleas: for in Truth, let not the discourse of reason be impeached, and hindered by some passion, it will of it selfe tend directly to that which is good and just. But in case there do arise a passion betweene, so to crosse the same, then you shall see pleasure and displeasure to raise a combat and dissension, to encounter that which by consultation would have beene judged and determined. For otherwise, how cometh it to passe that in Philosophicall discourses and disputations, a man shall never see it otherwise, but that without any dolor and griefe, some are turned and drawn oftentimes by others into their opinions, and subscribe thereto willingly? Nay even Aristotle himselfe, Democritus also and Chrysippus have beene known to retract and recant some points, which before time they held, and that without any trouble of mind, without griefe and remorse, but

but rather with pleasure and contentment of heart: because in that speculative or contemplative part of the soule, which is given to knowledge and learning onely, there raigne no passions to make resistance, inso much as the brutish part being quiet and at repose, loveth not curiously to entermedle in these and such like matters: By which meanes it hapneth, that the reason hath no sooner a sight of truth, but willingly it inclineth thereto, and doth reject untruth and falsitie: for that there lieth in it and in no other part else, that power and facultie to beleve and give assent one way, as also to be perswaded for to alter opinion and goe another way. Whereas contrariwise, the counsels and deliberations of worldly affaires, judgements also, and arbitriments, being for the most part full of passions, make the way somewhat difficult for reason to passe, and put her to much trouble. For in these cases, the sensuall and unreasonable part of the soule is ready to stay and stop her course; yea and to fright her from going forward, meeting her either with the object of pleasure; or else casting in her way stumbling blocks of feare, of paine, of lusts and desires. And verily the deciding and judgement of this disputation lieth in the sense, which feeleth as well the one as the other, and is touched with them both: For say that the one doth surmount and hath the victorie, it doth not therefore defeat utterly and destroy the other; but drawn it is thereto perforce, and making resistance the while. As for example, the wanton and amorous person when he checketh and reprooveth himselfe therefore, useth the discourse of reason against the said passion of his; yet so, as having them both, actually subsisting together in the soule: much like as if with his hand he repressed and kept downe the one part, enflamed with an hot fit of passion, and yet feeling within himselfe both parts, and those actually in combat one against the other. Contrariwise, in those consultations, disputes, and inquisitions which are not passionate, and wherein these motions of the brutish part have nothing to do, such I meane as those be especially of the contemplative part of the soule: if they be equall and so continue, there ensueth no determinat judgement and resolution: but a doubt remaineth, as if it were a certaine pause or stay of the understanding, not able to proceed farther, but abiding in suspense betweene two contrarie opinions. Now if it chance to encline unto one of them, it is because the mightier hath overweighed the other & annulled it, yet so, as it is not displeased or discontent, nor no contesteth obstinately afterwards against the received opinion. To be short, & to conclude all in one generall word: where it seemeth that one discourse and reason is contrarie unto another; it argueth not by and by a conceit of two divers subjects, but one alone in sundrie apprehensions and imaginations. Howbeit, whensoever the brutish and sensuall part is in a conflict with reason, and the same such that it can neither vanquish, nor be vanquished without some sense of grievance: then incontinently this battell divideth the soule in twaine, so as the warre is evident and sensible. And not onely by this fight a man may know how the source and beginning of these passions differeth from that fountaine of reason: but no lesse also by the consequence that followeth thereupon. For seeing that possible it is for a man to love one childe that is ingenuous and towardly disposed to vertue: as also affect another as well, who is ill given and dissolute: considering also that one may use anger unjustly against his owne children or parents: and another contrariwise justly in the defence of children or parents against enemies and tyrants. Like as in the one there is perceived a manifest combat and resistance of passion against reason; so in the other, there may be scene as evident a yeelding and obeisance thereof, suffering it selfe to be directed thereby, yea and willingly running and offering her assistance and helping hand. To illustrate this by a familiar example, it hapneth otherwhiles, that an honest man espouseth a wife according to the lawes, with this intention onely to cherish and keepe her tenderly, yea and to companie with her duly, and according to the lawes of chastitie and honestie: howbeit afterwards in tract of time, and by long continuance and conversing together, which hath bred in his heart the affection of love, he perceiveth by discourse of reason, and findeth in himselfe that he loveth her more deere and entirely, than he purposed at the first. Semblably, yong scholars having met with gentle and kinde masters, at the beginning, follow and affect them in a kinde of zeale, for the benefit onely that they reape by them. Howbeit afterwards in processe of time, they fall to love them; and so in stead of familiar and daily disciples, they become their lovers, and are so called. The same is usually to be scene in the behaviour and carriage of men toward good magistrates in cities, neighbours also, kinsfolke and allies: For they begin acquaintance one with another, after a civill sort onely, by way of dutie or necessitie and use: but afterwards by little and little ere they be aware, they grow into an affectionate love of them, namely, when reason doth concur, perswading swading & drawing unto it that part of the mind which is the seat of passions and affections. As for that Poet whoeuer he was, that first wrote this sentence,

*Two sorts there be of bashfulness,
the one we cannot blame,
The other troubleth many an hower,
and doth decay the same.*

Doth he not plainly shew that he hath found in himselfe by experience oftentimes, that even this affection by means of lingring delay, and putting off from time to time, hath put him by the benefit of good opportunities, and hindered the execution of many brave affaires? Vnto these proofes and allegations precedent, the Stoikes being forced to yeeld, in regard they be so cleere and evident: yet for to make some way of evasion and escape, they call shame, bashfulness; pleasure, joy; and feare, warinesse or circumspection. And I assure you, no man could justly finde fault with these disguisements of odious things with honest termes: if so be they would attribute unto these passions the said names when they be raunged under the rule of reason, and give them their owne hatefull termes indeed, when they strive with reason and violently make resistance. But when convinced by the teares which they shed, by trembling and quaking of their joints, yea by change of colour going and coming in stead of naming Dolour and Feare directly, come in with (I wot not what) pretie devised termes of Morfures, Contractions or Conturbations: also when they would cloke and extenuate the imperfection of other passions, by calling lust a promptitude or forwardnes to a thing: it seemeth, that by a flourish of fine words, they devise shifts, evasions, and justifications, not philosophical but phisicall. And yet verily they themselves againe do terme those joies, those promptitudes of the will, and warie circumspections by the name of Eupathies, i. good affections and not of Apathies, that is to say, Impassibilities: wherein they use the words aright and as they ought. For then is it truly called Eupathie, i. a good affection, when reason doth not utterly abolish the passion, but guideth and ordereth the same well in such as be discrete and temperate. But what befalleth unto vicious and dissolute persons? Surely, when they have set downe in their judgement and resolution, to love father and mother as tenderly as one lover may another, yet they are not able to performe so much. Mary say, that they determine to affect a courtesan or a flatterer, presently they can finde in their hearts to love such most deere. Moreover, if it were so, that passion and judgement were both one, it could not otherwise be, so foone as one had determined that he ought to love or hate, but that presently love or hate would follow thereupon. But now it falleth our cleane contrarie; for that the passion as it accordeth well with some judgements and obiects; so it repugneth with others, and is obstinate and disobedient: whereupon it is, that themselves enforce thereto by the truth of the thing, do affirme and pronounce that every judgement is not a passion, but that onely, which stirreth up and mooveth a strong and vehement appetite to a thing: confessing thereby, no doubt, that one thing it is in us which judgeth, and another thing that suffereth, that is to say, which receiveth passions: like as that which moveth, and that which is mooved be divers. Certes, even Chrysippus himselfe, defining in many places what is Patience and what is Continency, doth avouch, That they be habitudes, apt and fit to obey and follow the choise of reason: whereby he sheweth evidently that by the force of truth, he was driven to confesse and avow, That there is one thing in us which doth obey and yeeld, and another which being obeyed, is yeelded unto, and not obeyed, is resisted.

Furthermore, as touching the Stoicks, who hold, That all finnes and faults be equal, neither wil this place, nor the time now serve to argue against them, whether in other points they swerve from the truth: howbeit, thus much by the way I dare be bolde to say, That in most things they will be found to repugne reason, even against apparent and manifest evidence. For according to their opinion, every passion or perturbation is a fault, and whosoever grieve, feare or lust, do sinne: but in those passions great difference, there is seene, according to more or lesse: for who would ever be so grosse, as to say, that Dolours feare was equal to the feare of Ajax? who as Homer writeth,

*As he went out of field did turne and looke behinde full oft:
With knee before knee decently,
and so retired soft.*

or compare the sorrow of King Alexander, who would needs have killed himselfe for the death

of Chrysippus, so that of Plato for the death of Socrates? For dolours and griefs encrease exceedingly when they grow upon occasion of that which hapneth besides all reason; like as any accident, which falleth out beyond our expectation, is more grievous, and breedeth greater anguish than that whereof a reason may be rendered, and which a man might suspect to follow. As for example, if he who ever expected to see his sonne advanced to honour, and living in great reputation among men, should heare say that he were in prison, and put to all manner of torture, as Parmeno was advertised of his sonne Philotas. And who will ever say, that the anger of Niceron against Anaxarchus, was to be compared with that of Magas against Philemon, which arose upon the same occasion, for that they both were spitefully reviled by them in reprochfull termes; 10 for Niceron caused Anaxarchus to be braid in a mortar with yron pestles: whereas Magas commanded the Executioner to lay a sharpe naked sword upon the necke of Philemon, and so to let him go without doing him any more harme. And therefore it is, that Plato named anger the sinewes of the soule, giving us thereby to understand, that they might be stretched by bitterness, and let slacke by mildnesse. But the Stoicks, for to avoid and put backe these objections and such like, denie that these stretchings and vehement fits of passions be according to judgement, for that it may faile and erre many waies: saying, they be certaine pricks or stings, contractions, diffusions or dilatations, which in proportion and according to reason, may be greater or lesse. Certes, what variety there is in judgement, it is plaine and evident. For some there be that deeme povertie not to be ill: others holde, that it is very ill: and there are againe, who 20 account it the worst thing in the world; in so much as to avoid it, they could be content to throw themselves headlong from high rocks into the sea. Also you shall have those, who reckon death to be evil, in that onely it depriveth us of the fruition of many good things: others there be, who thinke and say as much, but it is in regard of the eternall torments & horrible punishments that be under the ground in hell. As for bodily health, some love it no otherwise than a thing agreeable to nature and profitable withall: others take it to be the soveraigne good in the world, as without which they make no reckoning of riches, of children,

*Ne yet of crowne and regall dignitie,
Which men do match even with divinitie.*

Nay, they let not in the end to thinke and say, That vertue it selfe serveth in no stead, and avai- 30 leth nought, unless it be accompanied with good health: whereby it appeareth, that as touching judgement, some erre more, some lesse. But my meaning is not now to dispute against this evasion of theirs. Thus much onely I purpose to take for mine advantage out of their owne confession, in that themselves do grant, That the brutish and sensual part, according to which, they say that passions be greater and more violent, is different from judgement: and howsoever they may seeme to contest and cavill about words and names, they grant the substance and the thing it selfe in question, joining with those who mainteine that the reasonlesse part of the soule which enterreineth passions, is altogether different from that which is able to discourse, reason and judge. And verily Chrysippus in those books which he entituled, Of Anomologie, after he had written and taught, that angels is blinde, and many times will not permit a man to see those 40 things which be plaine and apparent, and as often casteth a darke mist over that which he hath already perfectly learned and known; proceedeth forward a litle further: For (quoth he) the passions which arise, drive out and chase forth all discourse of reason, and such things as were judged and determined otherwise against them, urging it still by force unto contrary actions. Then he useth the testimonie of Menander the Poet, who in one place writeth thus, by way of exclamation:

*We worth the time, wretch that I am,
how was my minde distraught
In body mine? where were my wits?
some folly (sure) me caught,
What time I fell to thin. For why?
whereof I made no choise.
Farre better things they were, wits,
which had my former voice.*

The same Chrysippus also going on still: It being so (quoth he) that a reasonable creature is by nature borne and given to use reason in all things, and so be governed thereby: yet notwithstanding we reject and cast it behinde us, being over-ruled by another more violent motion that carrieth us away. In which words, what doth he else but confesse that which hapneth upon the diffention betweene affection and reason? For it were a meere ridiculous mockerie in deed, as Plato saith, to affirme that a man were better & worse than himselfe: or that he were able now to master himselfe, & anon ready to be mastered by himselfe, and how were it possible that the same man should be better & worse than himselfe, and at once both master and servant, unlesse every one were naturally in some sort double, and had in him somewhat better and somewhat worse? And verily by that meanes, he that hath the worse part, obedient to the better, hath powre over himselfe, yea, and is better than himselfe: whereas he that suffreth the brutish and unreasonable part of his soule to command and go before, so as the better and more noble part doth follow, and is serviceable unto it, he no doubt is worse than himselfe: he is (I say) incontinent or rather impotent, and hath no power over himselfe, but disposed contrary to nature. For according to the course and ordinance of nature, meet and fit it is that reason being divine and heavenly, should command and rule that which is sensuall and voide of reason: which as it doth arise and spring out of the very bodie, so it resembleth it, as participating the properties and passions thereof, yea and naturally is full of them, as being deeply con incorporate and throughly mixed therewith: As it may appeere by all the motions which it hath, tending to no other things but those that be materiall and corporall, as receiving their augmentations and diminutions from thence, (or to say more properly) being stretched out and let slacke more or lesse, according to the mutations of the body. Which is the cause that young persons are quick, prompt, and audacious rash: also, for that they be full of blood, and the same hot, their lusts and appetites, are likewise fiery, violent and furious: whereas contrariwise in old 20 folke because the source of concupiscence feared about the liver is after a fort quenched, yea and become weake and feeble: reason is more vigorous and predominant in them: as much as the sensuall and passionate part, doth languish and decay together with the body. And verily this is that which doth frame and dispose the nature of wilde beasts to divers passions: For it is not long of any opinions good or bad which arise in them, that some of them are strong, venterous and fearelesse, yea and ready to withstand any perils presented before them: others againe be so surpris'd with feare and fright, that they dare not stirre or do any thing: but the force and power which lieth in the blood, in the spirits and in the whole bodie, is that which causeth this diversitie of passions, by reason that the passible part growing out of the flesh as from a roote, doeth bud forth and bring forth it a qualitie and pronenesse sensible. But 30 in man that there is a sympathie and fellow mooving of the body, together with the motions of the passions, may be proved by the pale colour, the red flushing of the face; the trembling of the joints, and panting and leaping of the heart in feare and anger: And againe on the contrary side by the dilations of the arteries, heart and colour, in hope and expectation of some pleasures. But when as the divine spirit and understanding of man doth move of it selfe alone without any passion, then the body is at repose and remaineth quiet, not communicating nor participating any whit with the operation of the minde and intendment; no more than it being disposed to studie upon any Mathematicall proposition or other science speculative, it calleth for the helpe and assistance of the unreasonable part: By which it is manifest, that there be two distinct parts in us, different in facultie and power one from another. In summe, 40 through the universall world, all things (as they themselves affirme, and evident experience doth convince) are governed and ordred, some by a certaine habitude: others by nature: some by sensuall and unreasonable soule: others by that which hath reason and understanding. Of all which man hath his part at once, yea, and was borne naturally with these differences above said. For, contained he is by an habitude: nourished by nature: reason & understanding he useth: he hath his portion likewise of that which is unreasonable and inbred; there is together with him the source and primitive cause of passions, as a thing necessarie for him, neither doth it enter into him from without: in which regard it ought not to be extirped utterly; but hath neede onely of ordering and government: whereupon Reason dealeth not after the Thracian maner, nor like king Lycurgus, who commanded all vines without exception to be cut downe, because 50 wine caused drunkenness: it rooteth not out (I say) all affections indifferently one with another, the profitable as well as the hurtfull: but (like unto the good gods Phylomachus and Hemerosides, who teach us to order plants that they may fructifie, and to make them gentle which were savage) to cut away that which groweth wilde and ranke, to save all the rest and so to order and manage the same, that it may serve for good use. For neither do they shed and spill their wine upon the floure, who are afraid to be drunke, but delay the same with water: nor those who feare the violence of a passion, do take it quite away, but rather temper and qualifie the same:

like

like as folke use to breake horses and oxen from their flinging out with their heeles, their stiffness & curtnes of the head & stubburnes in receiving the bridle or the yoke, but do not restraine them of other motions in going about their worke and doing their deed. And even so verily, reason maketh good use of these passions, when they be well tamed and brought (as it were) to hand: without over weakning or rooting out cleane, that part of the soule which is made for to second reason, and do it good service: For as Pindarus saith,

*The horse doth serve in chariot at the thill,
The ox at plough doth labour hard in field,
Who list in chase the wild Bore for to kill,
The hardy bound he must provide with skill.*

10 And I assure you, the entertainment of these passions and their breed, serve in farre better stead, when they doe assist reason and give an edge (as it were) and vigour unto vertues, than the beasts above named in their kind. Thus moderate ire doth second valour and fortitude: hatred of wicked persons helpeth the execution of Iustice: and indignation is just and due unto those, who without any merit or desert enioie the felicitie of this life: who also for that their heart is puffed up with foolish arrogancie, and enflamed with disdainfull pride and insolence in regard of their prosperitie, have need to be taken downe and cooled. Neither is a man able by any meanes (would he never so faine) to separate from true friendship, naturall indulgence, and kind affection: nor from humanitie, commiseration and pitie; ne yet from perfect benevo- 20 lence and good will, the fellowship in joy and sorrow. Now if it be true (as it is indeed) that they do grossely erre, who would abolish all love, because of foolish and wanton love: surely they do amisse, who for covetousnes sake and greedines of money, do blame and condemne quite all other appetites and desires. They do (I say) as much as those, who would forbid running altogether, because a man may stumble and catch a fall as he runneth: or debarre shooring for that we may overthoot and misse the marke: or to condemne hearing of musick, because a discord or jarre is offensive to the eare. For like as in sounds, musick maketh an accord and harmonie, not by taking away the loud and base notes: And in our bodies Physicke procureth health, not by destroying heat and cold, but by a certaine temperature and mixture of them both in good proportion: Even so it fareth in the soule of man, wherein reason hath the pre- 30 dominance and victorie: namely, when by the power thereof, the passions, perturbations and motions are reduced into a kind of moderation and mediocritie. For no doubt excessive sorrow and heaviness, immeasurable joy and gladnesse in the soule, may be aptly compared to a swelling and inflammation in the body, but neither joy nor sorrow simply in it selfe. And therefore Homer in this wise sentence of his

A man of worth doth never colour change, Exce live feare in him is verie strange,

doth not abolish feare altogether, but the extremitie thereof; to the end, that a man should not thinke that either valour is desperate folle, or confidence audacious temeritie. And therefore in pleasures and delights, we ought likewise to cut off immoderate lust: as also in taking punish- 40 ment, extreme hatred of malefactours. He that can do so, shall be reputed in the one not indolent, but temperate, and in the other not bitter and cruell, but just and righteous. Whereas let passions be rid cleane away (if that were possible to be done) our reason will be found in many things more dull and idle: like as the pilot and master of a ship hath little to do, if the winde be laid and no gale at all stirring. And verily (as it should seeme) wise Law-makers, seeing this well enough, have with great policie given occasion in cities and common-wealths of Ambition and Emulation among citizens one with another: and in the field against enemies devised to excite the courage of souldiours, and to whet their ire and manhood by sound of trumpets, fifes, drums, and other instruments. For not onely in Poetrie (as Plato saith verie well) he that is inspired and (as it were) ravished with the divine instinct of the Muses, will make a ridiculous foole 50 of him, who otherwise is an excellent Poet, and his crafts-master as having learned the exquisite knowledge of the art: but also in batels, the heat of courage set on fire with a certaine divine inspiration is invincible and cannot be withstood. This is that martiall furie, which (as Homer saith) the gods do insule or inspire rather into warlike men:

*With burning said he did inspire
The Princes heart with might and fire.
And againe,
One god or other surely doth him assist*

Else faring thus, he neuer could persist.

As if to the discourse of reason they had adjoined passion as a pricke to incite, and a chariot to set it forward. Certes, even these verie Stoicks with whom now we argue, and who seeme to reject all passions, we may see oftentimes, how they stirre up yong men with praises, and as often rebuke them with sharpe admonitions and severe reprehensions. Whereof there must needs ensue of the one part pleasure, and of the other part displeasure. For surely checkes and fault-finders, strike a certaine repentance and shame: of which two, the former is comprised under sorrow, and the latter under feare: and these be the meanes that they use principally to chastice and correct withall. Which was the reason that Diogenes upon a time, when he heard Plato so highly praised and extolled. And what great and woorthy matter (quoth he) finde you in that man, who having been a Philosopher so long & taught the precepts thereof, hath not in all this time greeved and wounded the heart of any one person? For surely the Mathematicall sciences a man cannot so properly call the eares or handles of Philosophie (to use the words of Xenocrates) as he may affirme that these affections of yong men, to wit, bashfulness, desire, repentance, pleasure and paine are their handles, whereof reason and law together taking hold by a discreet apt and wholesome touch, bring a yong man speedily and effectually into the right way. And therefore the Lacedaemonian schoolmaster and governour of children said verie well, when he professed, that he would bring to passe that the child whom he tooke into his tuition, should joy in honest things, and grieve in those that were foule and dishonest. Then which there cannot possibly be named a more woorthy or commendable end of the liberall education 20 and bringing up of a yong youth well descended.

OF VERTVE AND VICE. 30

The Summarie.

In this little treatise adjoynd aptly unto the former, the Author prooveth, that outward and corruptible things be not they that set the soule in repose, but reason well ruled and governed: And after that he hath depainted the miserable estate of wicked and sinfull persons, troubled and tormented with their passions both night and day, he prooveth by proper and apt similitudes, that Philosophie together with the love of vertue, bringeth true contentment and happinesse indeed unto a man.

OF VERTVE AND VICE. 40

*I*t seemeth, and commonly it is thought, that they be the garments which do heat a man; and yet of themselves they neither doe heat nor bring any heat with them: for take any of them apart by it selfe, you shall finde it colde; which is the reason that men being verie hote, and in a fit of a fever, love often to change their clothes, for to coole and refresh their bodies. But the truth is this, Look you what heat a man doth yeeld from himselfe, the clothes or garments that cover the body do keepe in the same, and unite close together: and being thus included and held in, suffer it not to evaporate, breathe out, and vanish away. The same error in the state of this life, hath deceived many man, who imagine that if they may dwell in stately and gorgeous great houses, be attended upon with a number of servants, retaine a sort of slaves, and can gather together huge summes of golde and silver, then they shall live in joy and pleasure: whereas in verie sooth,

sooth, the sweete and joyfull life proceedeth not from any thing without. But contrariwise, when a man hath those goodly things about him, it is himselfe that adderth a pleasure and grace unto them, even from his owne nature and civill behaviour, composed by morall vertue within him, which is the very fountaine and lively spring of all good contentment.

For if the fire do alwaies burne out light,

More stately is the house, and faire in sight.

Seemably, riches are more acceptable, glorie hath the better and more shining lustre, yea, and authoritie carrieth the greater grace, if the inward joy of the soule be joined therewith: For surely men doe endure povertie, exile and banishment out of their owne countries, yea, and beare the burden of olde age willingly and with more ease, according as their maners be milde, and the minde disposed to meeknesse. And like as sweet odours, and Aromaticall perfumes, give a pleasant smell unto thred-bare and ragged clothes; but contrariwise, the rich robe of Anchyses yielded from under it stinking matter and corrupt blood; which as the Poet saith,

Ran downe by drops upon his cloke

Off like so fine, and so did foke.

Even so, with vertue, any sort of life, and all maner of living is pleasant & void of sorrow: whereas contrariwise, vice causeth those things which otherwise seemed great, honourable, and magnificent, to be odious, lothsome and unwelcome to those that have them, if (I say) it be mingled therewith, according to the testimonie of these vulgar verses:

This man who whiles he walks abroad in street

Or market place, is ever happy thought:

No sooner sets within his owne house feet,

Thrice wretched but he is, and not for ought.

His wife (as master) hath of all the power,

She bids, commands, she chides and fights: each howler.

And yet one may with ease berid and divorced from such a curst and shrewd wife, if he be a man in deed, and not a bond-slave; but for thine owne vice, no meanes will serve to exempt thee from it. It is not enough to command it to be gone, by sending a little script or bill of divorce: ment, and to thinke thereby to be delivered from troubles, and so to live alone in quiet and repose. For it cleaveth close within the ribbes; it sticketh fast in the very bowels, it dwelleth there both night and day,

It burneth thee, yet fire-br and none is seene,

And hasteneth age apace before thou weeene,

A troublesome companion it is upon the way, by reason of arrogancy and presumption: a costly and sumptuous guest at the table for gluttonie and gourmandise: an unpleasant and combersome bedfellow in the night, in regard of thoughts, cares and jealousies which breake the sleepe, or trouble the same with fantasies. For whiles men lie asleepe, the bodie is at rest and repose; but the minde all the while is disquieted and affrighted with fearefull dreames and tumultuous visions, by reason of superstitious feare of the gods,

If thus I sleepe, when sorrowes me surprise,

Then fearefull dreames me kill before I rise.

saith one. And even so do other vices serve men: to wit, Envie, Feare, Wrath, Wanton Love, and Unbridled lust. For in the day time, vice looking out, and composing it selfe somewhat unto others abroad; is somewhat ashamed of herselfe, and covereth her passions; the giveth not herselfe wholly to her motions and perturbations, but many times doth strive againe and make resistance: but in sleepe, being without the danger of lawes and the opinion of the world, being farre removed (as it were) from feare and shame: then it setteth all lusts aworke, then it quickeneth and raiseth up all leaudnesse, and then it displaith all lascivious wantonnesse. It tempteth (as Plato saith) a man to have carnall dealing with his owne mother, and to eat of forbidden and unlawfull meats: there is no villanie that it forbeareth; executing (so far forth as it is able) all abomination; and hath the fruition thereof, if it be but by illusions and fantasticall dreames, which end not in any pleasure, nor accomplishment of concupiscence, but are powerfull onely to excite, stirre; and provoke still the firs of secret passions and maladies of a corrupt heart. Wherein lieth then, the pleasure and delight of sinne, if it be so, that in no place nor at any time it be void of pensiveness, care and griefe: if it never have contentment, but alwaies in molestation and trouble, without repose? As for carnall delights and fleshy pleasures, the good complexion and sound constitution of an healthfull bodie, giveth thereby meanes, place, opportunity

nity and breeding. But in the soule it is not possible that there should bee engendred anie mirth, joy and contentment, unlesse the first foundation be laied in peace of conscience, and tranquillitie of spirit, void of feare, and enjoying a settled calme in all assurance and confidence, without any shew of tempest toward. For otherwise, suppose that some hope doe smile upon a man; or say, that delight tickle a little; the same anon is troubled, and all the sport is marred by some carefull cogitation breaking forth: like as the object and concurrence of one rocke troubleth and overthroweth all, though the water and weather both be never so calme.

Now gather gold and spare not by heapes, rake and scrape together masses of silver, builde faire, gallant and stately walking places, replenish all thy house with slaves, and a whole cite with debtrous: unlesse withall thou doe allay the passions of thy minde; unlesse thou slay and appease thy insatiable lust and desire; unlesse thou free and deliver thy selfe from all feare and carking cares: thou dost as much as streine wine, or make Ipcras for one that is sicke of a fever, give honie to a cholericke person diseased with the raging motion of choler, offer meates and viands to those that be sicke of the stomachicall flux, continuall laske, ulceration of the guts and bloody flux, who neither take pleasure therein, nor are the better but the woofe rather a great deale for them. See you not how sicke folkes are offended, and their stomacks rise at the most fine, costly and deintiest meates that be offered unto them? how they spit them forth againe, and will none, though they be forced upon them? And yet afterwards, when the bodie is reduced againe into good temperature: when pure spirits and good fresh blood is engendred, and when the naturall heate is restored and become familiar 20 and kind: then they rise up on their feete to their meat, then their stomacks serve to eate full favorly of course bread with cheese or cresses, and therein they take great pleasure and contentment: The like disposition in the minde doth reason worke. Then and never before shalt thou be pleased and at peace with thy selfe, when thou hast once learned what is good and honest indeed: In povertie thou shalt live deliciously like a king: or in a private and quiet state sequestered from civill and publike affaires, thou shalt live as well as they who have the conduct of great armies, and governe the common-weale. When thou hast studied Philosophie and profited therein, thou shalt never lead a life in discontentment, but shalt learne how to away with any estate and course of life, and therein find no small joy & harts ease. Thy riches thou wilt rejoyce in, because thou shalt have better meanes to do good unto all men: In povertie likewise thou 30 wilt take joy in regard thou shalt have fewer cares to trouble thee: Glorie will turne to thy disgrace, when thou shalt see thy selfe so honoured: and thy low estate and obscure condition will be no lesse comfort, for that thou shalt be safe and secured from envie.

THAT VERTUE MAY BE TAUGHT AND LEARNED.

The Summarie.

Lutarch refusing heere the error of those, who are of opinion, That by good and diligent instruction a man cannot become the better; recommendeth sufficiently the studie of vertue. And to prove this assertion of his, he sheweth that the apprenticeship 40 of that, which is of small consequence in this world, witnesseth enough that a man ought to be trained from day to day to the knowledge of things that are becoming and worthy his person: Afterwards, he declareth that as much travell should be employed to make him comprehend such things as be far distant from the capacity and excellencie of his spirit: In which discourse he taxeth covertly those vaine and giddy heads, who (as they say) runne after their owne shadow, whereas they should stay and rest upon that which is firme and permanent.

THAT

THAT VERTUE MAY BE taught and learned.

E dispute of vertue, and put in question, whether Prudence, Justice, Loyalitie and Honestie may be taught or no? And do we admire then the works of Oratours, Sailers and Shipmasters, Architects, Husbandmen and an infinite number of other such which be extant? Whereas of good men we have nothing but their bare and simple names, as if they were Hippo-Centaures, Gyants or Cyclopes; and mervaille we that of virtuous actions which be entier, perfect, and unblameable, none can be found: ne yet any maners so composed according to durie, but that they be tainted with some passions and vicious perturbations? yea and if it happen that nature of her selfe bring forth some good and honest actions, the same straightwaies are darkened, corrupted and in a maner marred, by certeine strange mixtures of contrarie matters that creepe into them, like as when among good come there grow up weeds and wilde bushes that choke the same; or when some kinde and gentle fruit is cleane altered by savage nourishment. 20 Men learne to sing, to daunce, to read and write, to till the ground, and to ride horses, they learne likewise to shew themselves, to do on their apparell decently; they are taught to wait at cup and trencher, to give drinke at the table, to season and dresse meate: and none of all this can they skill to performe and do handsomely, if they be not trained thereto: and yet shall that, for which these and such like qualities they learne, to wit, good life and honest conversation, be reckoned a meere casuall thing, comming by chance and fortune, and which can neither be taught nor learned? Oh good sirs, what a thing is this? In saying, That vertue cannot be taught, we denie withall that it is, or hath any being. For if it be true, that the learning of it, is the generation and breeding thereof, certes he that hindereth the one disannulleth the other: and it denying that it may be taught, we graunt that no such thing there is at all: And yet as Plato 30 saith, for the necke of a Lute not made in proportion to the rest of the bodie, there was never known one brother go to warre with another, nor a friend to quarrell with his friend, ne yet two neighbour cities to fall out and mainteine deadly feud, to the interchangeable working and suffering of those miseries and calamities which follow open warre. Neither can any man come forth and say, that by occasion of an accent (as for example, whether the word Telchines should be pronounced with the accent over the second syllable or no) there arose sedition and dissention in any city; or debate in a house betweene man and wife, about the warpe and woufe of any webbe: Howbeit never man yet would take in hand to weare a peece of cloth, nor handle a booke, nor play upon the lute or harpe, unlesse he had learned before; for albeit he were not like to susteine any great losse and notall damage thereby, yet he would feare to be mocked 40 and laughed to scorne for his labor, in which case as Herachius saith, it were better for a man to conceale his owne ignorance: and may such an one thinke then, that he could order a house well, rule a wife, and behave himselfe as it becommeth in marriage, beare misfortune, or governe a common weale as he ought, being never bound and brought up to it? Diogenes espying upon a time aboy eating greedily, and unmanerly gave his master or Tutor a good cuffe on the eare: and good reason he had so to do, as imputing the fault rather to him, who had not taught, than to the boy, who had not learned better manners. And is it so indeed? ought they of necessity, who would be manerly at the table, both in putting hand to a dish of meat, and taking the cup with a good grace, or as Aristophanes saith,

At board not feeding greedily,
Nor laughing much undecently,
Nor crossing feet full wantonly.

to be taught even from their Infancie. And is it possible that the same should know how to behave themselves in wedlocke, how to manage the affaires of State, how to converse among men, how to beare office without touch and blame, unlesse they have learned first how to cary themselves one toward another? Aristippus answered upon a time, when one said unto him, And are you fit every where? I should (quoth he, laughing merrily) cast away the fare for ferriage, which I pay unto the mariner, if I were every where. And why might not a man say likewise, If children be be not the better for their teaching, the falariae is lost which men bestow upon their Masters and Teachers. But wee see that they taking them into their governance presently from their nour-ces, like as they did forme their limmes and joints featly with their hands, do prepare and frame their maners accordingly, & fet them in the right way to vertue. And to this purpose answered very wisely a Laconian Schoole-master to one who demanded of him, what good he did to the childe of whom he had the charge? Mary (quoth he) I make him to take joy and pleasure in those things that be honest. And to say a trueth, these teachers and gournours instruct children to holde up their heads straight as they go in the street, and not to beare it forward: also, not to dip into sauce, but with one finger: not to take bread or fish but with twaine: to rubbe or scratch after this or that maner: and thus and thus to truffle and holde up their clothes. What shall we say then to him, who would make us beleue that the Art of Physicke professeth to scoure the morpew, or heale a whit-flaw: but not to cure a pleurisie, fever, or the phrensie? And what differeth he from them, who holde that there be schooles and rules to teach perties and little children how to be manly, and demean themselves in small matters, but as for great, important and absolute things, it must be nothing els but use and custome, or els meere chance and fortune that doth effect them? For like as he were ridiculous, and worthy to be laughed at, who should say, that no man ought to lay hand upon the oare for to row, but he that hath bene prentise to it; but sit at the sterne and guide the helme he may, who was never taught it: euen so, he, who maintaineth, that in some inferior arts there is required apprenticeship, but for the at-tainining of vertue none at all, deserveth likewise to be mocked. And verily, he should doe contrary unto the Scythians: For they, as Herodotus writeth, use to put out the eies of their slaves only, to the end that being blinde, they might turne round about with their milke, & so stirre and shake it. But he forsooth putteth the eie of reason into these base and inferior arts, which are no better than servants waiting upon others; but plucketh it from vertue. Sphæras answered contrariwise, being demanded of Callias the sonne of Chabrias, by way of contempt and derision, in this wise, What are you sir? An Archer? A Targetiere? A man at armes? or a light armed souldiour? I am none (quoth he) of all these, but rather one of those who commandeth them all.

Well, ridiculous then is he, and very absurd, who would say, There were an art to be taught, of drawing a bowe & shooting, of fighting close at hand being armed at all pieces, of discharging bullets with a sling, or of sitting and riding an horse; but forsooth to leade and conduct an army, there was none at all: as who would say, that feat, were a thing not learned, but comming by chance, I know not how. And yet I must needs say, more sottish and foolish were he, who should hold and affirme that Prudence onely could not be taught, without which no other Arts and Sciences be worth ought, or availe any whit. That this is true, and that the is alone the guide which leadeth and guideth all other Sciences, Arts and Vertues, giving them every one their due place and honour, and making them profitable to mankind, a man may know by this, if there were nothing els, That there would be no grace at a feast, though the meat were never so well drested and served up by skillfull Cooks, though there were proper Escuirs or Shewers to set the dishes upon the boord, Carvers, Tasters, Skinners, and other Servitors and Waiters enough, unless there be some good order observed among the said Ministerts, to place and dispose everie thing as it ought.

HOW

HOW A MAN MAY DIS-
 CERNE A FLATTERER
 FROM A FRIEND.

The Summaric.

FHe traveller hath great occasion and cause to reioyce, if in his iourney he goe with a good companion, who by his pleasant and profitable discourses may make him for get the tedious difficultie of the way: euen so in this life, happie is the man, who can finde and meet with those to heare him company, by whom he may both easily passe through the occurrent dangers that are presented unto him, and also advance forward cher-fully unto vertue. In which regard our author Plutarch having discoursed as touching the Nourture, education, and instruction of youth, as also of Vice and Vertue in generall, by good order and in great reason, sheweth in this Treatise, what sort of people we ought carefully to avoid, and with whom to joine and be acquainted. And as he was a man well experienced and practised in the affaires of this world, he affirmeth and proveth by very sound and firme reasons, That there is nothing whereof we are to be more wary and heedfull, than false friendship, which he callth Flatterie. Moreover, this being a matter of so great importance, as every wise man may well thinke and perceive, he draweth out this present discourse in length: and for that his purpose is to instruct us in those meanes whereby we may be able to distinguish betwene a flatterer and a true friend; he sheweth in the first place, That the only principall remedie to stop up the entrie against all flatterers, is to know our selves well: for otherwise, we shall have such array and ornaments hanged upon us, that we shall not easily perceive and discerne who we are. And contrariwise, it hapneth oftentimes, that we esteeme them to be our perfect friends, so skillfull are they in counterfeiting; and withall, when they finde us disposed to entertaine such companie, our owne indiscretion depriveth us of that true insight and view, which our soule ought to have in discerning a false friend from a true. Being willing therefore to aid and helpe us in this point, he describeth a crafty and wily flatterer, he discovereth his cunning casts, and depaitheth him in his colours, shewing the very draught & lineaments which way direct us to the knowledge of him, to wit, That he doth conforme and frame himselfe to the humor and nature of those whose companie he haunteth; how he is unconstant and mutable, changing and turning into many and sundry fashions; without anyright and sincere affection, applying himselfe all the while to every thing els but vertue, willing to be reputed alwaies more learned and wiser, than those whom hee flattereth: without regard of doing them good any way, or seeking their profit, he onely aimeth at this, to please them and follow their weine in all things by custome and use, bringing him that will give eare unto his words, to this passe, That he shall thinke vice to be vertue: working covertly and under-hand for to deceive more cleanly, transforming vertue into vice, and making it nothing strange and coy to blame himselfe, for to do the more mischief afterwards to another: then he flattereth most, when he maketh no semblance or shew at all that he minded any such thing, and exalteth up to the skie those that be most vicious, and worst of all others, so they will give him entertainment. Likewise, for that flatterers shew themselves otherwise, very forward and bold to speake their minds and to finde fault, which is one of the best and surest marks of true friendship, he treateth consequently of this libertie and freedome of speech, and how a man may know whether there be any flatterie therein or no. He declareth therefore, how flatterers use this franke reprehension in vaine and frivolous things, and never in those finnes and grosse faults which are in deed blame-worthy: so that this manner of reprehension, is a kinde of soothing them up, and calling men asleepe in their notorious vices: or els they charge them with faults cleane contrary. Now after he hath shewed how a man should take heed and beware of them, he discovereth of those services which may make flatterers, and wherein the same differ from the offices and duties of friends, and in pursuing and prosecuting this Antithesis, he proveth that a flatterer is prest and ready to do his pleasure in shamefull matters, whereas a friend sheweth his goodwill in those that be honest: also that a flatterer

flatterer is envious, and so is not a friend. And for that our nature is proud and blinde withall, having need of good friends to guide and direct it, he describeth with what manner of eye, and care we ought to see and heare those that procure our good, albeit they may seeme to carie with them a kinde of severitie. Meane while he exhorteth friends, so to temper and qualifie their libertie in reprehension, that all impudencie and importunate rigor be farre from it. But forasmuch as this is (as it were) the principall thing in amitie he sheweth, That first we must cut away selfe-love in all our reprehensions; and secondly all myrrours, bitter and biting speeches: then he adjoineth moreover, in what seasons, and upon what occurrences, a man ought to reprove and say his minde frankly: and with what dexterity he is to proceed: that is to say, that sometimes, yea, and more often, he ought to rebuke his friend apart, or under the person of another: wherein he is to looke unto this, That he eschue all waime-glorie, and season his reprehensions with some praise among, to make them more acceptable and better taken. Consequently, he teacheth us, how we must receive the advertisement, admonitions, and reprehensions of a true friend: and returning to the very point in deed, of amitie and friendship, he sheweth what meane a man should keepe for to avert and turne away the neighbour vice, and to urge our friends forward to their devoir: adding moreover, That all remonstrance and admonition ought to be tempered with mildnesse and lenitie: wherein he concludeth this whole Treatise, which I assure you is to be well read and marked in the deides of all persons, but those especially, who are advanced above others in worldly wealth or honourable place.

HOW A MAN MAY DISCERNE a flatterer from a friend.

Lato writeth (ô Antiochus Philopappus) that all men do willingly pardon him, who professeth, That he loveth himselfe best: Howbeit thereby (quoth he) is ingendred in us, this fault and inconvenience among may others the greatest: that by this meane no man can be a just judge of himselfe, but partiall and favourable. For the lover is ordinarily blinded in the thing that he loveth, unless he have beene taught, yea and accustomed long before, to affect and esteeme things honest above those that be his owne properly, or inbred and familiar to him. This is it, that giveth unto a flatterer that large field, under pretence of friendship, where he hath a fort (as it were) commodiously seated, and with the vantage to assaile and endamage us, and that is, Selfe-love: whereby everie man being the first and greatest flatterer of himselfe, he can be verie well content, to admit a stranger to come neere and flatter him, namely, when he thinketh and is well willing withall, to witnesse with him and to confirme that good selfe-conceit and opinion of his owne. For even he, who is justly reproched to be a lover of Flatterers, loveth himselfe notwithstanding exceeding well: and for that good affection that he hath, is both very willing, yea and fully perswaded also, that all good things are in himselfe: and the desire whereof is not simply, bad, and unlawfull: but the perswasion is it, that is dangerous and slipperie, having need to be restrained with great heed and carefulnesse. Now if Truth be an heavenly thing, and the verie source yielding all good things (as Plato saith) aswell to the gods as to men: we ought thus to judge, That a flatterer is an enemy to the gods, and principally to Apollo: For opposite he is alwaies and contrarie to this precept of his, Know thy selfe: causing a man to be abused and deceived by his owne selfe, yea and to be ignorant of the good and evil things that be in him; in making the good gifts which are in him to be defective & imperfect: but the evil parts incorrigible and such as cannot be reformed. Now if it were so, that flatterie (as the most part of other vices) toucheth either onely or especially, base, meane, and abject persons, it were perhaps so neither so hurtfull, nor so hard to be avoided as it is. But like as wormes breed most of all and soonest in frimme, tender and sweet wood: even so, for the most part the generous and gentle natures, and those mindes that are more ingenuous, honest, amiable, and milde than others, are readiest to receive and nourish the flatterer that hangeth upon him. Moreover, as Simonde was wont to say, that the keeping of an elcuires or stable of horses, followeth not the lampe or oile cruet, but the rich come fields: that is, it is not for poore men to entertaine great horses, but those rather who are landed men and with their revennewes able to maintaine them:

Even

Even so, we see it is ordinarie, that flatterie keepeth not companie nor fortheth with poore folke, or such persons as live obscurely & are of no abilitie: but commonly it is the ruine and decay of great houses, & a maladie incident to mighty States; which oftentimes undoeth & overthroweth whole Monarchies, Realmes, and great Seignories. In which regard it is no small matter, nor a thing that requireth little, or no forecast & providence to search & consider the nature thereof: least being so active and busie as it is, and readie to meddle in everie place (nothing so much) it do no hurt unto friendship, nor bring it into obloquie and discredit. For these flatterers resemble lice for all the world: And why? These venime we see never haunt those that be dead, but leave and forsake the corps so soone as ever the blood (whereof they were wont to feede) is extinct or deprived of vitall spirit: Semblably, a man shall never see flatterers, so much as approach unto such persons as are in decay, whose life is crackt and credit waxeth coole; but looke where there is the glorie of the world, where there is authoritie and power, thither they flocke, and there they grow: no sooner is there a change of fortune but they sneake and slinke away, and are no more scene. But we ought not to attend so long and stay for this triall, being unprofitable, or rather hurtfull and not without some danger: For it goeth verie hard with a man, if at the verie instant and not before, even when he hath most need of friendship, to perceive those to be no friends whom he tooke to be, and namely, when he hath not with him at hand, a good and faithfull friend, to exchange for him that is untruthful, disloyal and counterfeit. For if a man did well, he should be provided before hand of an approved and tried friend, ere he have neede to employ him, aswell as of current and lawfull money; and not then to make triall of him and finde him faultie, when he is in greatest need and standeth in most need: For we ought not to make prooff with our losse, and finde him to be false to our cost and detriment; but contrariwise to be skillfull in the meanes of smelling out a flatterer, that we receive no damage by him: For otherwise, that might befall us, which happeneth unto those who for to know the force of deadly poisons, take the assay, and taste first themselves thereof: well may they indeed come to the judgement thereof: but this skill is deereely bought, when they are sure to die for it. And like as we do not commend such; no more can we praise and approve of those, who measure friendship onely by honestie and profit: thinking withall, That such as converse and company with them pleasantly, are straight waies to be attained as flatterers, no lesse then if they were taken in the very act of flatterie: For surely a friend should not be unpleasant & unfavoure, without any seasoning (as it were) of delightfome qualities: neither is friendship to be accounted venerable in this respect, that it is austere or bitter; but even that verie beauty and gravitie that it hath is sweet and desirable, and as the Poet saith,

About her alwaies seated be Delightfome Love and Graces three.

And not he onely who is in calamitie,
*Doth great content and comfort find
To see the face of true friend.*

according as Euripides saith, but true amitie addeth no lesse grace, pleasure, and joy unto those that be in prosperitie, than it easeth them of sorrow and grieve who are in adversitie. Evenus was wont to say, that of all pleasant sauce, fire was the best and most effectual: And even so God having mingled friendship with this life of ours, hath made all things joious, sweete, pleasant and acceptable, where a friend is present and enioieth his part. For otherwise a man can not devise nor expresse, how and in what sort a flatterer could infinuate himselfe and creepe into favour, under the colour of pleasure, if he saw that friendship in the owne nature never admitted any thing that was pleasant and delectable. But like as false and counterfeit peeces of gold which will not abide the touch, represent onely the lustre and bright glittering of gold: So a flatterer resembling the sweete and pleasant behaviour of a friend, sheweth himselfe alwaies joious, mery and delightfome, without crossing at any time. And therefore we ought not presently to suspect all to be flatterers who are given to praise others: For otherwhiles to commend a man, so it be done in time and place convenient, is a propertie no lesse befitting a friend, than to blame and reprehend: Nay contrariwise, there is nothing so adverse and repugnant to amitie and societie, than testinesse, thwarting, complaining, and evermore fault-finding: whereas, if a man knoweth the good will of his friend to be ever prest and readie to yeeld due praises, and those in full measure to things well done, he will beare more patiently and in better part another time, his free reprehensions and reproofe for that which is done amisse: for that he is verily perswaded of him that as he was willing ynough to praise, so he was as loth to dis-

praise, and therefore taketh all in good worth. A difficult matter then it is, will some one say, to discerne a flatterer from a friend, seeing there is no difference between them, either in doing pleasure, or yeelding praise: for otherwise, we see oftentimes, that in many services, courtesies and kindnes besides, a flatterer is more readie and forward than a friend. True it is indeed we must needs say: a right hard matter it is to know the one from the other; especially if we speake of a right flatterer indeed, who is his owne crafts-master, and can skill how to handle the matter artificially, and with great cunning and dexterity: if (I say) we make no reckoning of them for flatterers, as the common people doe, who are these ordinarie smell-feasts, and as ready as flies to light in everie dish: these parasites (I say) whose tooing (as one said verie well) will be walking so soone as men have washed their hands, and be readie to sit downe to meat, cogging and foot-10 thing up their good masters at everie word, who have no honestie at all in them, and whose fecutillitie, profane, and irreligious impuritie, a man shall soone finde with one dish of meat and cup of wine. For surely there was no great need to detect and convince the flatterie of *Melan-
 15 thim* the Parasite and Iester of Alexander Phraus the Tyrant, who being asked upon a time how Alexander his good Lord and master was murdered, Mary with a thrust (quoth he) of a sword, which went in at his side, and ranne as farre as into my belly: neither of such as a man shall never see to faile, but where there is a good house and plentifull table kept, they will be sure to gather round about it, in such sort as there is no fire nor iron grates, or brasse gates, can keepe them backe, but they will be readie to put their foot under the boord: no nor of those women who in times past were called in Cyprus, Colacides, i. Flatteresses; but after they were come to 20 Syria, men named them, Climateides, as one would say, Ladders, for that they used to lie along, & to make their backs stepping stools or ladders as it were for Queenes & Great mens wives to get upon when they would mount into their coaches. What kinde of flatterer then is it so hard and yet needfull to beware of? Forsooth, even of him who seemeth none such, and professeth nothing lesse than to flatter: whom a man shall never finde about the kitchen where the good meate is dressed, nor take measuring of shadoves to know how the daie goes, and when it is dinner or supper time: ne yet see drunken and lying along the ground untowardly, and full like a beast: But for the most part sober he is enough; he loveth to bee a curious Polypragmon; he will have an oare in every boat, and thinks he is to intermedle in all matters; he hath a minde
 30 to be privie and partie in all deepe secretes; and in one word he carrieth himselfe like a grave Tragedian, and not as a Comicall or Satyricall player, and under that vision and habit he counterfeiteth a friend. For according to the saying of Plato, it is the greatest and most extreame injustice for a man to make semblance of being just when he is not: even so we are to thinke, that flatterie of all others to be most dangerous, which is covert and not avert or professed; which is serious (I say) and not practised by way of jest and sport. And verily such glozing and flatterie as this, causeth men oftentimes to mistrust true friendship indeed, and doth derogate much from the credit thereof: for that in many things it jumpeth so even therewith, unlesse a man take verie good heed and looke narrowly into it. True it is, that Gobrias being runne into a daire and secret roome, together with one of the usurping Tyrants of Persia, called Magi, whom he persued hard, and at handy gripes struggling, grappling, and wrestling close together, 40 cried out unto Darius coming into the place with a naked sword, and doubting to thrust at the Usurper, for feare he should runne Gobrias thorough also; Thrust hardly and spare not (quoth he) though you dispatch us both at once. But we who in no wise can allow of that common saying, Let a friend perish, so he take an enemy with him: but are desirous to plucke and part a flatterer from a friend, with whom he is coupled and interlaced by meanes of so many resemblances: we (I say) have great cause to feare and beware, that we doe not cast and reject from us the good with the bad: or least in pardoning and accepting that which is agreeable and familiar unto us, we fall upon that which is hurtfull and dangerous. For like as among wilde seeds of another kind, those that being of the same forme, fashion, and bignes with the graines of wheat are intermingled therewith, a man shall hardly trie out from the rest, for that they will not passe thorough the holes of the sieve, riddle or trie, if they be narrow; and in case they be large and wide, out goeth the good come together with them; even so it is passing hard to separate flatterie from friendship, being so intermeddled therewith in all accidents, motions, affaires, dealings, employment and conversation as it is. For considering that a flatterer seeth well ynough, that there is nothing in the world so pleasurable as friendship, nor yeeldeth more contentment unto man than it doth: He windeth himselfe into favour by meanes of pleasure, and wholly is imploied to procure mirth and delight. Also for that both grace and commoditie accompany accompany amitie; in which regard the common Proverbe saith, that a friend is more necessary than either fire or water. Therefore a flatterer is readie to put himselfe forward, and offereth his service with all double diligence, striving in all occasions and busineses to be ever prompt and officious. And because the principall thing that linketh and bindeth friendship sure at the beginning, is the conformitie and likenes of manners, studies, endevours and inclinations, and in one word seeing that to be like affected, and to shew pleasure or displeasure in the same things, is the chiefe matter that knitteth amitie and both combineth, and also keepeth men together, by a certaine mutuall correspondencie in naturall affections: the flatterer knowing so much, composeth his nature (as it were) some unformed matter ready to receive all sorts of im-10 pressions, studying to frame and accommodate himselfe wholly to all those things that he taketh in hand; yea and to resemble those persons just by way of imitation whom he meaneth to let upon and deceive, as being souple, soft, and pliable, to represent them lively in everie point, so as a man may say of him after this manner,

Achilles come thinke you he is?

Nay, even Achilles himselfe servs.

But the craftiest cast of all other, that he hath, is this, That seeing (as he doth) libertie of speech, (both in truth, and also according to the opinion and speech of the whole world) to be the proper voice of friendship (as a man would say) of some living creature; inso much, as where there is not this freedome of speaking frankly, there is no true friendship nor generositie in deed. In 20 this point also, he will not seeme to come short, nor leave it behinde for want of imitation; but after the fashion of fine and excellent cookes, who use to serve up tart, bitter and sharpe sauces together with sweet & pleasant meats, for to divert & take away the fatietic and fulnesse which he so followeth them. These flatterers also use a certaine kind of plaine and free speech; howbeit, neither sincere and naturall is it, nor profitable, but (as we commonly say) from teeth outward, or (as it were) beckening and winking slightly with the eie under the browes, not touching the quicke, but tickling aloft onely, to no purpose. Well, in these respects above specified, hardly and with much adoe is a flatterer discovered, and taken in the manner; much like unto those beasts, who by nature have this propertie, To change their colour, and in hue to resemble that bodily matter or place whereon they settle, and which they touch. Seeing then it is so, that
 30 he is so apt to deceive folke, and lieth hidden under the likenesse of a friend; our part it is, by unfolding the differences that are so hidden, to turne him out of his masking habit, and being de- spoiled of those colours and habilements that he borroweth of others, for want of his owne (as Plato saith) to lay him naked and open to the eie: let us therefore enter into this discourse, and fetch it from the very first beginning.

We have already said, that the originall of friendship among men (for the most part) is our conformitie of nature and inclination, embracing the same customes and maners, loving the same exercises, affecting the same studies, and delighting in the same actions and imployments: concerning which, these verses well and fitly runne;

Olde folke love best with aged folke to talke,

And with their feeser young children to disport:

Women once met, do let their tongues to walke,

With such likewise, such persons best do sport:

7 he wretched man his miseries doth lament

With those, whose fate like fortunes do torment.

The flatterer then, being well aware that it is a thing naturally inbred in us, to delight in those that are like our selves, to converse with them, and to use and love them above all others, endevoureth first and foremost to draw and approach, yea, and to lodge neere unto him whom he meaneth to enveagle and compasse, even as if he went about in some great pasture to make toward one beast, whom he purposeth to tame and bring to hand, by little and little joining close unto him, as it were, to be concorporated in the same studies and exercises, in the same affections, employments and course of life: and this he doth so long, untill the party whom he laieti for, have given him some advantage to take holde by, as suffering himselfe gently to be touched, clawed, handled and stroked; during which time, he leteeth slip no opportunitie to blame those persons, to reprove those things, and courses of life, which he perceiveth the other to hate: contrariwise, to praise and approve all that which he knoweth him to take delight in: and this he doeth not after an ordinary manner and in a meane, but excessively and beyond all measure, with a kinde of admiration and wonder; confirming this love or hatred of his, to a thing, not as if he had received these impressions from some sudden passion, but upon a staied and settled judgement. Which being so: how, and by what different marks shall he be known and convinced, that he is not the like or the same in deed, but only a counterfeit of the like and of the same? First, a man must consider well, whether there be an uniforme equalitie in all his intentions and actions or no? whether he continue and persist still, taking pleasure in the same things, and praising the same at all times? whether he compose and direct his life according to one and the same molde and paterne? like as it becommeth a man who is an ingenuous lover of that friendship and conversation which is ever after one maner, and alwaies like it selfe: for such a one in deed is a true friend. But a flatterer contrariwise is one who hath no one permanent seat in his maners and behaviour, nor hath made choise of any life for his owne content, but only to please another, as framing and applying his actions wholly to the humor of another, is never simple, uniforme, nor like himselfe, but variable and changing alwaies from one forme to another, much like as water which is poured out of one vessel into another, even as it runneth forth, taketh the forme and fashion of that vessel which receiveth it. And herein he is cleane contrarie to the ape; for the ape as it should seeme, thinking to counterfeit a man, by turning, hopping and dauncing as he doth, is quickly caught: but the flatterer, whiles he doth imitate and counterfeit others, doth entice and draw them, as it were, with a pipe or call, into his net, and so beguileth them. And this he doeth not alwaies after one maner; for with one he daunceth and singeth; with another he will seeme to wrestle, or otherwise to exercise the bodie in feats of activitie: if he chance to meet with a man that loveth to hunt, and to keepe hounds, him he will follow hard at heeles, setting out a throat as loud in a maner as Hippolytus in the Tragedie Phædra, crying,

*So he, this is my joy and onely good,
With erie to lure, with touting borne to winde,
By leave of gods to bring into the wood
My hounds, to rouse and chase the dapple Hinde.*

And yet hath he nothing to do at all with the wilde beasts of the Forrest, but it is the hunter himselfe whom hee laith for to take within his net and toile. And say that hee light upon a young man that is a student & given to learning, then you shall see him also as deepe poring upon his booke, and alwaies in his Studie; you shall have him let his beard grow downe to his foot, like a grave Philosopher: who but he then, in his slide thred-bare students cloake, after the Greeke fashion, as if he had no care of himselfe, nor joy of any thing els in the world: not a word then in mouth, but of the Numbers, Orthangles and Triangles of Plato. If peradventure there fall into his hands an idle do-nothing, who is rich withall, and a good fellow, one that loveth to eat and drinke and make good cheere,

*This wily Fox Vlysses tho
His ragged garments will off do.*

off goes then his bare and overworne studying gowne, his beard he causeth to be cut & shorne as neere as a new mowen field in harvest, when all the corne is gone: no talke then but of flagons, bortels, pots, and cooling pans to keepe the wine cold: nothing now but merie conceits to moove laughter in everie walking place and gallerie of pleasure: Now hee letteth his frumpes and scoffes against schollers and such as studie philosophie. Thus by report it fell out upon a time at Syracusa: For when Plato thither arrived, and Denys all on a sodaine was set upon a furious fit of love to Philosophie, his palace and whole court was full of dust and sand, by reason of the great recourse thither of Students in Geometrie, who did nothing but draw figures therein. But no sooner had Plato incurred his displeasure and was out of favor: no sooner had Denys the tyrant bidden Philosophie farewell, & given himselfe againe to belly-cheere, to wine, vanities, wantonnesse, and all loosenesse of life: but all at once, it seemed the whole court was transformed likewise, (as it were by the force and enchantment of Cyrces) into hatred and detestation of good letters; so as they forgot all goodnesse, and betooke themselves to folly and foolishnesse. To this purpose it were not amisse for to alledge as testimonies, the fashions and acts of some notorious flatterers, such I meane as have governed Common-welths, and affected popularitie. Among whom the greatest of all other was Alcibiades, who all the while he was at Athens used to scoffe, and had a good grace in merie conceits & pleasant jests: he kept great horses, and lived in jollitie, most gallantly, with the love and favor of all men: when he sojourned in Sparta, he went alwaies shaven to the bare skin, in an overworne cloke, or else the same very coarse, and never washed his bodie but in cold water. Afterwards, being

in

in Thrace, he became a soldior, and would carrouse and drinke lustily with the best. He came no sooner to Tisaphernes in Asia, but he gave himselfe to voluptuousnes and pleasure, to riot, wantonnes, and superfluous delights: Thus throughout the whole course of his life, he was the love of all men, by framing himselfe to their humors and fashions wheresoever he came. Such were not Epaminondas and Agefilas: For albeit they conversed with many sorts of people, travailed divers cities, and saw sundry fashions and maners of strange nations; yet they never changed their behavior, they were the same men still, retaining evermore a decent port which became them, in their apparell, speech, diet, and their whole cariage and demeanor. Plato likewise was no changeling, but the same man at Syracusa, that he was in the Academie or College at Athens: and looke what his cariage was before Dion, the same it was and no other in Denys his court.

But that man may very easily finde out the variable changes of a flatterer, as of the fish called the Pourcuttle, who will but staine a little and take the paines to play the dissembler himselfe, making shew as if he likewise were transformed into divers and sundry fashions; namely in unliking the course of his former life, and sodainly seeming to embrace those things which he rejected before, whether it be in diet, action or speech: For then he shall soone see the flatterer also to be inconsistent, and not a man of himselfe, taking love or hatred to this or that, joying or greiving at a thing, upon any affection of his owne that leadeh him thereto, for that he receiveth alwaies as a mirrour the images of the passions, motions and lives of other men. If you chance to blame one of your friends before him, what will he say by and by? Ah well, You have found him out I see now at last though it were long since: I wis I liked him not long a great while ago: Contrariwise, if your minde alter, so that you happen to fall a praising of him againe: Very well done will he say, and binde it with an oth, I can you thanke for that: I am very glad for the mans sake, and I beleeve no lesse of him. Do you breake with him about the alteration of your life, and beare him in hand that you meane to take another course, as for example, to give over State affaires, to betake your selfe to a more private and quiet life. Yea marie (quoth he) and then you do well, it is more than high time so to do: For long since we should have bene disburdened of these troubles so full of envie and perill. Make him beleeve once that you will change your copie, and that you are about to shake off this idle life, and to betake your selfe unto the Common-weale, both to rule and also to speake in publike place: you shall have him to sooth you up, and second your song, with these and such like responds: A brave mind (beleeve me) and becomming a man of your worth and good parts: For to say a truth, this idle and private life, though it be pleasant, and have ease enough, yet it is but bale, abject, and dishonorable; when you finde him there once, muffle his nose immediately with this posie,

*Good, for me thinks you soone do turne your stile,
You seeme much chang'd from him you were ere while.*

I have no neede of such a friend, that will alter as I doe, and follow me every way (for my shadow can do that much better) I had rather have one that with me will follow the truth, & judge according to it and not otherwise. Avant therefore, I will have nought to do with thee. Thus you see one one way to discover a flatterer.

A second difference we ought to observe in his imitations and resemblances, for a true friend doth not imitate all that he seeth him whom he loveth to do; neither is he forward in praising everie thing, but that onely which is best: For according to Sophocles,

*In love he would his fellow be,
But not in hate and enmities.*

And verily one friend is ready and willing to assist another in well doing and in honest life, and never will yeeld to be companion in leaudnesse, or helpe him to commit any wicked and heinous fact; unless peradventure through the ordinarie conversation, and continuall acquaintance together, he be tainted with infection of some ill qualitie and vicious condition, even against his will and ere he be well aware; much like as they who by contagion catch the murther and bleeched eyes; or as the familiar friends and schollers (by report) of Plato did imitate him in stopping forward; and those of Aristotle in his stammering and maffling speech; and the Courtiers of Alexander, the Great, in bending of his necke, and rough voice when he spake. For even so, some there be who receive impression of their manners and conditions at unawares and against their wils. But contrariwise, it fareth with a flatterer even as with the Chameleon; For as he can take upon him any colour save onely white; semblably, a flatterer cannot possibly frame himselfe to any thing that good is and of importance: but there is no naughtinesse and badnesse badnesse in the world which he will not quickly imitate. And well I may compare such fellows to ill painters, who when through insufficiency in their art they be not able to draw to the life, the beautie and fauour of a good face, will be sure yet to expresse the riuels, warts, moulcs, freckles, scarres and such like deformities. For euen so a flatterer can imitate verie passing well, Incontinencie, foolish superstition, haughtines and choler, bitternesse towards household seruants, distrust and diffidence in friends & kinsfolke, yea and treacherie against them: for that by nature he is alwaies inclined to the woofe; and besides, so far he would be thought from blaming vice, that he undertaketh to imitate the same. For those that seeke for amendment of life and reformation of manners are euer suspected: such (I say) as thew themselves displeased and offended at the faulcs and misdemeanors of their friends. And this was it that made Dionodius to Derys the Tyrant, Santus to Philip, and Cleomenes to Protophantus, and in the ende was their ruine and overthrow. The flatterer who desireth to be both pleasant and faithfull at once, or at leastwise so to be reputed, for excessive love and friendship that he pretendeth, will not seeme to be offended with his friend for any lewd parts, but in all things would be thought to carie the same affection, and to be in manner of the same nature and incorporate into him: whereupon it cometh to passe also, that euen in casuall things and the occurrences of this life, which happen without our will and counsell, he will reedes have a part, there is no remedie. This if he be disposed to flatter sicke persons, hee will make as though hee were sicke also of the same disease for companie: and if hee have to doe with such as bee dimme sighted or hard of hearing, hee will be thought neither to see nor heare well for fellowship. Thus the flatterers about Derys the Tyrants, when he had an impediment in his eyes that he could not see cleerely, faigned that themselves likewise were halfe blinde, and to make it good, hit one upon another at the board, and overthrow the dishes upon the table as they fate at supper. Others there be that proceed farther than so, and because they would appeere more touched with a fellow-feeling of affections, will enter as farre as to the verie inward secretts that are not to be revealed. For if they can perceive that they whom they do flatter, be not fortunate in their marriage, or that they are grown into distrust, jealousy, and sinister opinion, either of their owne children, or their neer kinsfolke and familiars; they spare not themselves but begin to complaine, & that with grieft of heart and sorrow of their owne wives and children, of their kindred and friends, laying abroad some criminous matters, which were better (iwis) to be concealed and smothered, than uttered and revealed. And this resemblance and likeness that they take upon themselves, causeth them to seeme more affectionate and fuller of compassion. The other then, thus flattered, thinking that by this means they have received from them a sufficient pawning and assurance of their fidelitie, sticke not to let fall from their mouth some matter of secrecie also; and when they have once committed it unto them, then they are euer after bound to use them, yea and be afraid to mistrust them in any thing. I my selfe knew one who seemed to put away his owne wedded wife, because his friend whom he flattered had divorced his before: and when he had so done, was known to go secretly unto her, and messengers there were who passed to and fro betweene them under hand: which the divorced wife of the other perceived and found out well ynough. Certes little knew he what a flatterer was, and he had no experience of him who thought these Iambicke verses to expresse the Sea-crab better than him,

A beast whose body and belly are meet,

The eie doth serve each way to see:

With teeth it creeps, they stand for feet,

A read now what creature this may be?

For this is the very portraiture and image of a parasite, who keepe about the frying pan (as Eupolis saith) of his good friends, and watch where the cloth is laid: But as touching these things, let us referre them to their proper place for to be discoursed more at large. Howbeit, for the present let us not leave behinde us one notable device and cunning craft; that a flatterer hath in his imitations; to wit, that if he do counterfeit some good qualitie that is in him whom he doth flatter, yet he giueth him alwaies the upper hand: For among those that be true friends; there is no emulation at all no jealousy or envy betweene one & another: but whether they be equall in well doing or come behinde, they take all in good part and never grieve at the matter. But the flatterer bearing wel in minde that he in euerie place, is to play the second part, yeeldeth alwaies in his imitation the equalitie from himselfe, and doth affect to counterfeit another so, as he will be the inferior, giving the superiority unto the other in all things but those which are naught, for therein he chalengeth to himselfe the victorie over his friend. If he be somewhat mal-content and hard to be pleased, then will the flatterer professe himselfe to be starke melancholike: if his friend be somewhat too religious or superstitious, then will he make semblance as though he were rapt and transported altogether with the feare of the gods: If the other be amorous, he will be in love furious: when the other saith I laughed a good; but I (will he say againe) laughed untill I was well nere dead. But in good things it is cleane contrarie, for when he speaketh of good footmanship he will say, I runne swiftly indeed; but you fly away. Againe, I fit a horse and rid reasonable wel; but what is that to this Hippo-Centaur here for good horsemanship? Alfo, I have a pretie gift in Poetrie (I must needs say) and am not the worst versifier in the world; but

and

To thunder verses I have no skill,

To Iupiter there leave that I will.

10 in these and such like speeches two things at once he doth: for first he seemeth to approve the enterprise of the other as singular good, because he doth imitate him; and secondly he sheweth that his sufficiencie therein is incomparable and not to be matched, in that he confesseth himselfe to come short of him. And thus much of the different marks betweene a flatterer and a friend as touching their resemblances.

Now, forasmuch as there is a communitie of delectation and pleasure in them both (as I have said before) for that an honest man taketh no lesse joy and comfort in his friends, than a lewd person in flatterers, let us consider likewise the distinction betweene them in this behalfe. The onely way to distinguish them a sunder in this point, is to marke the drift and end of the 20 delectation both in the one and the other: which a man may see more cleerely by this example: There is in a sweete ointment an odoriferous smell; so is there also in an Antidote or medicine; but herein lieth the difference, for that in the ointment above said, there is a reference to pleasure onely, and to nothing else; but in the Antidote, beside the delectation that the odor yeeldeth, there is a respect also of some medicinable vertue; namely either to purge and cleanse the bodie, or to heate and chafe it, or else to incamate and make new flesh to come. Again, Painters do grinde and mixe fresh colours and lively rinctures; so the Apothecarie hath drugs and medicines of a beautifull and pleasant colour to the eie, that it would do a man good to look upon them. But wherein is the difference? Is there any man so grosse that conceiveth not readily, that the ods lieth in the use or end, for which both the one and the other be ordained? 30 Semblably the mutuall offices and kindnes that passe from friend to friend, beside the honestie and profite that they have, bring with them also that which is pleasing and delectable, as if some deinty and lively flowers grew thereupon: For sometime friends use plaies and pastimes one with another: they invite one another, they eate and drinke together: yea and otherwhiles (beleeve me) you shall have them make themselves mery and laugh hartly, jesting, gauding, and disposing one with another; all which serve as pleasant sauces to season their other serious and honest affaires of great weight and consequence. And to this purpose serve wel these verses:

With pleasant discourses from one to another

They made themselves mery, being met together.

Alfo,

And nothing else disjoined our amity,

Nor parted our pleasures and mutuall jollity.

40 But the whole worke of a flatterer, and the onely marke that he shootheth at, is alwaies to de-vise, prepare and coniect, as it were, some play or sport, some action and speech, with pleasure and to do pleasure. And to knit up all briefly in one word; he is of opinion that he ought to do all for to be pleasant: whereas the true friend doing alwaies that which his dutie requireth, many times pleaseth, and as often againe he is displeased: not that his intention is to displease at any time; howbeit if he see it expedient and better so to do; he will not sticke to be a little harsh and unpleasant. For like as a Physician when neede requireth, putteth in some Saffron or Spiknard into his medicine: yea and otherwhile permitte his patient a delicate bath, or liberal 50 and deinty diet to his full contentment: but sometimes for it againe, leaving out all sweet odors, casteth in Cassum;

Or Polium which strong sent doth yeeld

And stinks most of all herbes in field.

or else he bruseth and stampeth some Ellcbore, and forceth his patient to drinke of that potion: nor proposing either in the former medicine pleasure, nor in the latter displeasure for the end: but both by the one and the other, training the sicke person under his hand to one & the same effect of his cure, to wit, his good and the health of his body; even so it is with a true friend:

one

one while with praises and gracious words he extolled and cheereth up his friend, inciting him thereby alwaies to that which is good and honest, as he in Homer,

*Deere heart Sir Teucer worth the sonne of Telamon that Knight,
Come Prince and floure of valiant knights,
Shooe thus your arrows flight.*

And another,
How can I ever put out of minde Heavenly Vlysses a Prince so kinde?

Contrariwise, another while where there is need of chastisement and correction, he will not spare but use sharpe and biting words: yea, and that free speech which carrieth with it an affection carefull to do good, and such as in deed befleemeth a tutor and governour, much after this manner:

*What Menelaus! how ever thou from Iupiter you descend:
Thou play the foole for folly such
I cannot you commend.*

It falleth out so likewise, that sometime he addeth deeds to words. And thus Menedemus shut the doore against the sonne of Aclepiades his friend, and would not deigne once to salute him, because he was a riotous youth, and lived dissolutely and out of all order: by which meanes he was reclaimed from loose life, and became an honest man. Arcesilam in like maner excluded Bartus out of his schoole, and would not suffer him to enter, because in a Comedie that he composed, he had made one verse against Cleanthes; but afterwards Bartus repenting of that he had done, and making satisfaction unto Cleanthes, was pardoned and received againe into his favor. For a man may offend his friend with intention to doe him good; but he must not proceed so farre in displeasing him, that thereby he breake or undo the knot of friendship: he ought (I say) to use a sharpe rebuke, as a Physician doth some bitter or tart medicine, to save or preserve the life of his patient. And a good friend is to play the part of a Musician, who to bring his instrument into tune, and so to keepe it, setteth up these strings, and letteth downe those: and so ought a friend to exchange profit with pleasure, and use one with another, as occasion serveth, observing still this rule often times, to be pleasing unto his friend, but alwaies profitable: whereas the flatterer being used evermore to sing one note, and to play upon the same string, that is to say, To please: and in all his words and deeds, to aime at nothing els but the contentment of him whom he flattereth, can not skill either in act to resist, or in speech to reprove and offend him; but goeth on still so following his humor, according alwaies with him in one tune, and keeping the same note just with him.

Now, as Xenophon writeth of king Arcesilam, that he was well apaid to be commended of them who he knew would also blame him if there were cause, so we are to thinke well of friendship when it is pleasant, delightfome and cheereful, if otherwhiles also it can displease and crosse againe; but to have in suspicion the conversation and acquaintance of such, as never doe or say any thing but that which is pleasing, continually keeping one course without change, never rubbing where the gall is, nor touching the sore, without reproofe and contradiction. We ought (I say) to have ready alwaies in remembrance the saying of an ancient Laconian, who hearing king Charilus so highly praised and extolled; And how possibly (quoth he) can he be good, who is neerer sharpe or severer unto the wicked? The gad-flie (as they say) which useth to plague bulles and oxen, feedeth about their eares, and so doth the tick deale by dogges: after the same maner, flatterers take holde of ambitious mens eares, and possesse them with praises; and being once set fast there, hardly are they to be removed and chased away. And here most needfull it is, that our judgement be watchfull and observant, and doe discern whether these praises be attributed to the thing or the person; wee shall perceive that the thing it selfe is praised, if they commend men rather absent than in place: also if they desire and affect that themselves, which they do so like and approve in others: again, if they praise not us alone; but all others, for the semblable qualities: likewise, if they neither say nor do one thing now, and another time the contrary. But the principall thing of all other, is this, if we our selves know in our owne secret conscience, that we neither repent nor be ashamed of that, for which they so commend us: yet wish in our hearts, that we had said or done the contrary: for the inward judgement of our mind and soule bearing witness against such praises, and not admitting thereof, is void of affections and and passions, whereby it neither can be touched nor corrupted and surprisid by a flatterer. Howbeit, I know not how it commeth about, that the most part of men can not abide nor receive the consolations which be ministred unto them in their adversities, but rather take delight and comfort in those that weep, lament and mourne with them: and yet the same men having offended or being delinquent in any dutie, if one come and find fault or touch them to the quicke therefore, do strike and imprint into their hearts remorse and repentance, they take him for no better than an accuser and enemy: contrariwise, let one highly commend and magnifie that which they have done; him they salute and embrace, him they account their wel-willer and friend in deed. Now, whosoever they be that are ready to praise and extoll with applause and clapping of hands, that which one hath done or said, were it in earnest or in game; such (I say) are dangerous and hurtfull for the present onely, and in those things which are next hand: but those, who with their praises pierce as farre as to the maners within, and with their flatteries proceed to corrupt their inward natures and dispositions, I can liken unto those slaves or household servants, who rob their masters, not onely of that come which is in the heape, & lieth in the garners, but also of the very seed; for the inclination and towardnesse of a man, are the seed that bring forth all his actions, and the habitude of conditions and maners, are the very fource and head from whom runneth the course of our whole life, which they pervert in giving to vices the names of virtues. Thucydes in his storie writeth: That during civil seditions and warres, men transferred the accustomed significations of words unto other things, for to justify their deeds: for despareate rashnesse, without all reason, was repured valour, and called Love-friend: provident delay and temporizing, was taken for decent cowardise: Modestie and temperance, was thought to be a cloke of effeminate unmanlinesse: a prudent and wary circumspection in all things, was held for a generall slouth and idleness. According to which precedent, we are to consider and observe in flatterers, how they terme prodigalitie by the name of liberalitie; cowardise is nothing with them but heedfull warinesse: brainficknesse they entitle promptitude, quicknesse, and celeritie: base and mechanickall nigardise, they account temperate frugallitie. Is there one full of love and given to be amorous? him they call good fellow, a boun-companion, a man of a kinde and good nature. See they one halfe, wrathfull, and proud withall? him they will have to be hardie, valiant and magnanimous: contrariwise, one of a base minde and abject spirit, they will grace with the attribute of fellow-like, and full of humanity. Much like to that which Plato hath written in one place: That the amorous lover is a flatterer of those whom he loveth. For if they be flat nosed like a shoing horse, such they call lovely and gracious: be they hawk nosed like a griffin, oh, that is a kingly sight say they: those that be blacke of colour, are manly: white of complexion, be Gods children. And as for the terme Melichrius, that is, Hony-coloured, it is alwaies (verily) a flattering word, devised by a lover, to mitigate and diminish the odiousnesse of a pale hue, which he seemeth by that sweet name, not to dislike, but to take in the best part. And verily if hee that is foule & ill favoured, be borne in hand that he is faire and beautifull, or one of small & lowe stature made believe that he is goodly & tall; he neither continueth long in this his error, neither is the damage that he susteineth thereby greivous & great, nor unrecoverable: but the praises which induce & inure a man to believe, That vice is vertue, inso much that he is nothing at all discontented in his sinne and greaved therefore, but rather taketh pleasure therein: those also which take away from us all shame and abashment to commit faults; such were they that brought the Sicilians to ruine, and gave them occasion to beautifie or colour the tyrannic and crueltie of Denys and Phalaris, with the goodly names of Iustice and Hatred of wickednesse: These were the overthrow of Aegypt, in clogging the effeminate wantonnesse, the furious superstition, the yelling noises after a fanaticall maner of king Ptolomeus, together with the marks that he carried of Lillies and Tabours in his body, with the glorious names of Devotion, Religion, and the service of the gods. And this was it that at the same time went very neere, and had like to have corrupted and spoiled for ever the maners and fashions of the Romanes, which before were so highly reputed, to wit, naming the riotousnes of Antonie, his loosenes, his superfluous delights, his sumptuous shewes & publike feasts, with their profusion and wasting of so much monie, by smooth and gentle termes of courtesies, and meriments full of humanitie, by which disguisements and pretexts, his fault was mollified or diminished in abusing so excessively the grandence of his puissiance & fortune. And what was it else that made Ptolomeus to put on the masque or muffle (as it were) of a piper, and to hang about him pipes and flutes? What was it that caused Neero to mount up the Stage to act Tragedies, with a vifour over his face, and buskins on his legs? was it not the praise of such flatterers as these? And are not most of our kings being when they sing finall and fine, after a puling maner, saluted Apolloes for their musicker: and if they drinke until they be drunke, honored with the names of Bacchus the god of wine: and when they seeme a little to wrestle or trie some feats of activitie, stiled by and by with the glorious addition of Hercules, brought (thinke you) to exceeding dishonour & shame by this grosse flatterie, taking such pleasure as they do in these gallant surnames. And therefore we had most need to beware of a flatterer in the praises which he giveth, which himselfe is not ignorant of, but being carefull and very subtil in avoiding all suspicion, if haply he meet with one of these fine fooles, and delicate minions, well set out in gay apparell: or some rusticall thicke-skin, carying on his backe a good leather pilch; or (as they say) one that feedeth grossly: such he will not spare but abuse with broad flattery, and make common laughing stocks of them: Like as Struthias, making a very alle of Bias, and riding him up and downe, yea & insulting upon him for his fortinellie with praises that he would seeme to hang upon him: Thou hast (quoth he) drunk more than king Alexander the great, & with that turning to Cyprius laughed as hard as ever he could till he was ready to sinke againe: But if a flatterer chance to deale with them that be more civill and elegant, and do perceive that they have a speciall eie unto him in this point, namely that they stand well upon their guard in this place, for feare lest they be surprisid by him: then he goes not to worke directly in praising of them, but he keepeth aloofe, he fetcheth about many compasses a great way off at first, afterwards by little and little he winneth some ground and approacheth neerer and neerer, making no noise untill he can touch and handle them, much after the maner of those that come about wilde beasts, affaying how to bring them to hand and make them tame and gentle. For one while he will report to such a one the praises that some other give out of him: imitating herein the Rhetoricians, who many times in their orations speake in the third person, and after this maner he will begin: I was not long since (quoth he) in the market place, where I had some talke with certaine strangers, and other ancient personages of good worth, whom I was glad at the heart to heare, how they recounted all the good in the world of you, and spake wonderfully in your commendation. Otherwhiles he will devise and fetch out of his owne fingers ends some light imputations against him, yet all forged and false, agreeable to his person and condition, making semblance as if he had heard others what they said of him, and very cunningly will he close with him, and beare him in hand that he is come in all haste to know of him, whether ever he said or did so as was reported of him: And if the other do denie it, (as it is no other like but he will) thereupon he takes occasion to enter into the praise and commendation of the man in this wise: I marvel truly how that you should abuse and speake ill of any of your familiars and friends, who were never wont so much as to miscall or say otherwise than well of your very enemies: or how it possibly could be, that you should be ready to gape after other mens goods, who use to be so liberall and bountifull of your owne? Other flatterers there be, who like as Painters to set up their colours and to give them more beautifull light and lustre unto them, lay neere unto them others that be more darke and shadowie: so they in blaming, reprooving, reproching, traducing & deriding the contrarie vertues to those vices which are in them whom the meane to flatter, covertly and underhand do praise and approve those faults and imperfections that they have, and so in praising and allowing, do feede and cherish the same: As for example, if they be among prodigall ding-thrifts and wasters, riotous persons, covetous misers, mischievous wretches, and such as have raked & scraped goods together by hooke and crooke, and by all indirect means they care not how: before them they will speake basely of Temperance and Abstinence, calling it rusticitie: and as for those that live justly and with a good conscience, contenting themselves with their estate, and therein reposing suffisance, those they will nickname, heartlesse, and base minded folke, altogether insufficient to do or dare anything. If it fall out, that they converse and be in companie with such as be idle larks, and love to sit full at home and do nothing, forbearing to meddle with ordinarie affaires abroad in the world: they will not baste to finde fault with policie and civill government, calling the managing of State matters and common weale, a thanklesse intermeddling in other mens affaires, with much travaile and no profit. And as for the minde and desire to be a magnifrate and to sit in place of authoritie, they will not let to say it is vaine glory and ambition, altogether fruitlesse. For to flatter and claw an orator, they will reproove in his presence a Philosopher. Among light huswives that be wantonly given, they winne the price, and are very well accepted, if they call honest matrons and chaste dames (who content themselves with their owne husbands, and them love alone) rude and rusticall women, untaught, ill bred, unlovely and having no grace with them. But herein is the very very height of wickednesse, that these flatterers for advantage will not spare their owne selves: For like as wrestlers debate their owne bodies and stoupe downe low otherwhiles, for to overthrow their fellows that wrestle with them, and to lay them along on the ground; so in blaming and finding many faults with themselves, they winde in, and creepe closely to the praise and admiration of others: I am (quoth one of them) a very coward, and no better than a verie slave at sea; I can away with no labour and travell in the world; I am all in a heat of choler, and raging mad, if I heare that one hath given me any bad termes; many as for this man (meaning him whom he flattereth) he casteth doubts at no perill and danger, all is one with him, sea or land, he can endure all hardnesse, and he counteth nothing painfull, no hurt there is in him, a singular man he is, and hath not his fellow, he is angry at nothing, he beareth all with patience. But say he meet with one at adventure, which standeth upon his owne bottome, and hath some great opinion of his owne sufficiency for wit and understanding, who hath a desire to be austere, and not to depend upon the conceits of others, but resteth in his owne judgement; and upon a certaine uprightnesse in himselfe, effoones hath these verses in his mouth:

*Sir Diomed, do not me praise
so much to more or lesse,
Nor out of measure me dispraise,
I love not such exesse.*

This flatterer then, who is his owne crafts-master and hath thoroughly learned his trade, goeth not the old way to worke in setting upon him, but he hath another engin and device in store to assaile such a grim sir withall. He will make an errand to him for counsell in his owne affaires, as being the man whom he esteemeth to have more wit and wisdom than himselfe. There be divers others (quoth he) with whom I have better acquaintance and familiaritie than with your selfe: Howbeit, sir I am forced of necessitie to make bold and to importune you a little: For whither else should wee ingram men repaire, that have neede of advice? and to whom are we to have recourse in matters of trust and secrecie. And then after he hath heard once what he will say, and it makes no matter what it be; he will take his leave, saying, that he hath received not counsell from a man, but an oracle from some god. Now before he departeth, if haply he perceive that he taketh upon him good skill and insight in literature, he will present unto him some compositions of his owne penning, praying him withall to peruse them, yea and to correct the same. Mithridates the king, affected and loved the art of Physicke verie well: by reason whereof some of his familiar friends about him, came and offered themselves to be cut and cauterized by him: which was a meere flatterie in deed and not in word. For it seemed that they gave great testimonie of his soule, in that they put their lives into his hands:

*Of subtile spirits thus you may see,
That many formes and shapes there be.*

But this kind of dissimuled praises, requiring greater and more warie circumspection to be taken heed of, if a man would detect and convince, hee ought of purpose when hee is tempted and assailed with such flatterie, to obtunde and propose unto the flatterer absurd counsell, if he seeme to demand and aske it: advertisements also and properly of the same kinde, yea and corrections without all sense and to no purpose, when he shall offer his labours to be read and perused: In so doing, if he perceive the partie suspected to be a flatterer, doth not gaine say nor contradict anything, but alloweth of all and receiveth the same, yea and more than that, when he shall to everie point crie out and say, Oh well said and sufficiently: O excellent wit: before, then he is caught in a trap: then I say it will be found plainly according to the common by-word,

*That when he did a watchword crave,
Some other thing he sought to have:
Or as we say (in Proverb old)*

Draffe w as his errand, but drinke he would.

that is to say, he waited for some occasion and opportunitie, by praising to puffe him up with vanitie and overweening of himselfe. Moreover, like as some have defined painting to be a mute Poësie; even so praising is a kind of silent and secrete flatterie. Hunters (we see) then soonest deceive the poore beasts, when they seeme to do nothing lesse than to hunt, making semblance as though they either travelled like wayfaring men, or tended their flocks, or else tilled the ground. Semblably flatterers touch those whom they flatter, neereft and enter to the verie quickly by praising, when they make no shew thereof, but seeme to do nothing lesse than praise. For

For he that giveth the chaire and seat to another comming in place, or as he is making an oration either in publicke place before the people, or in Councell house to the Senate, breaketh off his owne speech, and yeeldeth unto him his roome, giving him leave to speake or to opine, and remaineth silent himselfe: by this his silence sheweth, that he doth repute the other a better man, and of more sufficiency for wisdom and knowledge than himselfe, much more than if he should pronounce and ring it out aloud to the whole audience. And hereupon it is that this sort of people who make profession of flatterie, take up ordinarily the first and highest seats, aswell at sermons and publicke orations whither men flocke to heare, as at the Theaters and shewen places, not that they thinke themselves worthe of such places, but because they may rise and make roome for better & richer persons as they come, and thereby flatter them kindly. This we see also, that in sollemne assemblies and great meetings or auditories, they are by their good wils the first that put themselves forth, and make offer to begin speech; but it is for nothing else, but that afterward they would seeme to quit the place and give assent to their betters, soone retracting their owne opinions, when they heare a mightie man, a rich or noble personage in authoritie to contradiect and say the contrarie. And here we ought most of all to be circumspect and warie, that we may evict them of this, That all this courting, this giving place, this yeelding of the victorie and reverence made unto others, is not for any more sufficiency that they acknowledge in them, for their knowledge, experience and vertues; ne yet for their worthinesse in regard of elder age, but only for their wealth, riches, credit, and reputation in the world. **Megabyus* a great Lord belonging to the kings court of Persia, came upon a time to visit Apelles the painter: and sitting by him in his shop to see him worke, began of his owne accord to discourse I wot not what, of lines, shadowes and other matters belonging to his art: Apelles hearing him, could not hold but said unto him; See you not fir these litle prentise boies here that grinde Oker and other colours? So long as you fare still and said never a word, they advised you well and their eie was never off, wondering to see your rich purple robes, your chaines and jewels of gold, no sooner began you to speake, but they fell to teighing, and now they laugh you to skorne, talking thus as you doe of those things which you never learned. And Solon being demanded once by Craesus King of Lydia, what men he had seene whom he reputed most happie in this world? named unto him one Tellus, none of the great men of Athens, but a good plaine and meane citizen, Cleobis also and Biton: and these he said were of all others most fortunate. But these flatterers will affirme that Kings and Princes, rich men and rulers, are not onely blessed, happie and fortunate; but also excell all others in wisdom, knowledge and vertue. There is not one of them that can endure so much as to heare the Stoicks, who hold, that the sage and wise man (such a one as they depaint unto us) ought all at once to be called, rich, faire, noble, yea and a king: whereas our flatterers will have the rich man onely, whom they are disposed to flatter, to be an Orator and a Poet; yea and if he will himselfe, a painter, a good piper, passing light of foote and strong of limmes; in so much, as whosoever wrestleth with him, shall be sure to take the foile and lye along; and whomsoever he runneth with in the race, he shall come behinde him a faire deale, but how? Surely even as Crispon the Himeræan lagged for the nonce behind King Alexander the Great, when he ran with him for the best game: for which the King was highly displeased & wroth at him, when he once perceived it. Carneades was wont to say, that the sons of Kings and great rich men, learned to do nothing well and right, but onely to fit and ride an horse. For that their masters are wont to flatter and praise them in all their schooles where they be taught: for if they be at the exercise of wrestling, you shall have him that wrestleth with them, of purpose to take a fall and lye under them: Marie, the horse not knowing nor having the reason to discerne a private mans sonne from a prince; nor whether he be poore or rich that sits upon his backe, will be sure to cast him over his head and lay him along whosoever he be, that cannot skill how to hold and rule him. Bion therefore was but a verie loob and foole in saying thus: If I wist that with praising a peece of ground I could make it good, rich and fertile, it should want for no praises; and rather would I commend it than toile and moile in digging, tilling, & doing worke about it. And yet I will not say, that a man is too blame and doth amisse in praising: if so be, that those who are praised be the better and more fruitfull in all good things for it. Howbeit to come againe into the ground before said; a field being praised never so much is not the worse nor lesse fertile therefore: but I assure you they that commend folke falsely, and beyond their desert and due, puffe them full of winde and vanitie, and worke their overthrow in the end. But now having discoursed sufficiently upon this article and point of praises, let us proceed forward to treat of franknes and libertie of speech.

And

And verily meeete and reason it had bene, that as Patroclus when he put on the armour of Achilles, and brought forth his horses of service to battell, durst not meddle with his speare Pelias, but left it onely untouched; so a flatterer also, although he maske and disguise himselfe with other habits, ornaments and ensignes of a friend, should let this libertie onely of speech alone, and not once go about to touch or counterfeite it, as being indeed

A baston of such poise and weight

So big withall so stiffe and freight,

that of all others it belongeth onely to friendship for to be caried and welded by it. But for as much, as our flatterers now a daies are afraid to be detected in laughing in their cups, in their jests, scoffes; and game some mirth; therefore to avoide such discovery, they have learned forsooth to knit and bend the browes, they can skill iwis, to flatter, and yet looke with a frowning face and crabbed countenance, they have the cast to temper with their glavering gloses some rough reprehensions, and chiding checks among: let us not overpasse this point untouched, but consider and examine the same likewise. For mine owne part I am of this minde; That as in a Comedie of Menander, there comes in a counterfeite Hercules to play his part upon the stage with a club on his shoulder, that is (you may be sure) nothing massie, heavey, stiffe and strong, but some device and gawd, hollow and emptie within, made of browne paper or such like stuffe; Even so, that plaine and free speech which a flatterer useth, will be found light, soft, and without any strength at all to give a blow: much like (to say truly) unto the soft bed pillows that women lie on, which seeming full and plump to resist and beare out against their heads, yeeld and sinke under the same so much the more: For after the same maner, this counterfeite free speech of theirs puffed up full of winde, or else stuffed with some deceitfull light matter, seemeth to rise up, to swell, and beare out hard & stiffe, to the end that being pressed downe once (and both sides as it were comming together) it might receive, enlap and enfold him that chaunceth to fall thereupon, and so carie him away with it. Whereas the true and friendly libertie of speech indeed, taketh hold of those that are delinquent and do offend, bringing with it a kinde of paine for the time, which notwithstanding is holsonne and healthfull: resembling heerein the nature of honie, which being applied to a sore or ulcerous place, at the first doth smart and sting; but it doth cleanse and mundifie withall, and otherwise is profitable, sweete and pleasant. But as touching this plaine dealing and franke speech, I will write a part of purpose in place convenient. As for the flatterer he maketh shew at the first, that he is rough, violent, and inexorable in all dealings with others: For over his servants he carieth a hard hand, and is not pleased with their service, with his familiars, acquaintance and kinsfolke he is sharpe and eager, ready to finde fault with every thing; he maketh no reckoning nor account of any man but himselfe; he despiseth and disdaineth all the world besides; there is not a man living that he will pardon and forgive; he blameth and accuseth every one; and his whole studie is to win the name & reputation of a man that hateth vice, & in that regard careth not whom he doth provoke, and whose displeasure he incur: as who, for no good in the world would he hired to hold his tongue, nor willingly forbare to speake plainly the truth; who with his good will would never speake or do any thing to sooth up and please another: Then will he make semblance as though he neither saw nor tooke knowledge of any great and grosse finnes indeed: but if peradventure there be some light and small outward faults, he will make foule a doo thereat, he will keepe a woonding and crying out upon them: then shall you have him in good earnest exclaime and reprove the delinquent with a loud and founding voice: As for example, if hee chance to espie the implements or any thing else about the house lie out of order; if a man be not well and neatly lodged; if his beard be not of the right cut, or his haire grow out of fashion; if a garment sit not handsomly about him, or if a horse or hound be not so carefully tended as they should be. But say that a man set nought by his parents, neglect his owne children, misuse his wife, disdain and despise his kinned, spend and consume his goods; none of all these enormities touch and moove him: Heere he is mute and hath not a word to say; he dares not reprove these abuses: much like as if a Master of the wrestling schoole, who suffreth a wrestler that is under his hand to be a drunkard and a whooremonger, should chide and rebuke him sharply about an oile cruse or curry-combe; or as if a Grammarian should finde fault with his scholar and chide him for his writing tables or his pen, letting him goe away cleere with solacismes, incongruities and barbarismes, as if he heard them not. Also I can liken a flatterer to him, who will not blame an ill authour, or ridiculous Rhetorician in any thing as touching his oration it selfe; but rather reproveth him for his utterance, and sharply taketh him up for that by drinking of cold water he hath hurt his winde-pipe, and so marred his voice; or to one who being bidden to reade over and peruse a poore feely Epigram or other writing that is nothing woorth, taketh on and faret against the paper wherein it is written, for being thicke, couste or rugged; or against the writer, for negligent, slovenly or impure, otherwise. Thus the claw-backs and flatterers about king Prolemus, who would seeme to love good letters, and to be desirous of learning, used ordinarily to draw out their disputations and conferences at length, even to midnight, debating about some glosse or signification of a word, about a verse, or touching some historie: but all the while there was not one among so many of them, that would tell him of his crueltie, of his wrongs and oppressions; ne yet of his drumming, tabouring, and other enormous indignities, under the colour of religion; and scke to reforme him. Certes a foolish fellow were he, who comming to a man diseased with tumors, swellings, impostumes, or hollow ulcers, called Fistulas, should with a Chirurgians lancet, or Barbers rasor, fall to cut his haire, or pare his nailes; even so it faret with these flatterers, who applie their libertie of speeche to such things, as neither are in paine, nor yet do any hurt. Moreover, some others there bee of them, who being more cunning and craftie then their fellows, and use this plainnesse of language and reprehension of theirs, for to please and make sport withall. Thus Agis the Argive, seeing how Alexander the great, gave very great rewards and gifts to a certaine pleasant and odde fellow that was a jester, cried out for verie envie and colour of heart; O great abuse and monstrous absurditie: The King hearing it, turned about unto him in great displeasure and indignation, demanding of him what he had to say? I confesse (quoth he) indeed, that I am grieved, and I thinke it a great indignitie, when I see all you that are descended from Jupiter and his sonnes, to take pleasure in flatterers and jesters about you, for to make you merrie. For even so Hercules tooke a delight to have in his company certaine ridiculous Ceropes, and Bacchus had ever in his traine the Silenes. In your court likewise, a man may see such to be in credite and highly esteemed. When Tiberius Cesar the Emperor upon a certaine day was come into the Senate house of Rome, one of the Senators who knew how to flatter, arose and stood up, and with a good loud voice; Meete it is (quoth he) Cesar that men free borne, should likewise have the libertie of speeche, and speake their minds frankly; without dissimulating or concealing any thing which they know to be good and profitable: with this speeche of his, he stirred up the attention of the whole house, so as they gave good care unto him, and Tiberius himselfe listened what he would say. Now when all was still and in great silence; Hearken (quoth he) Cesar, what it is that we all accute and blame you for, but no man dare be so bolde as to speake it out: You neglect your selfe, and have no regard of your owne person; you consume and spoile your body with continuall cares and travels for our sake, taking no rest nor repose either day or night. Now when he had drawn out a long traine of words to this purpose, Cassius Severus a Rhetorician, stood up, and by report said thus; Such libertie of speeche as this, will be the utter undoing of this man. But these flatteries are of the lighter sort, and doe lesse hurt: there be other more dangerous, which worke the mischief and corruption of those who are not wise, and take no heed unto them; namely, when flatterers set in hand to reprove them whom they flatter, for the contrary vices to those that be in them. Thus Himerius the flatterer reproched a certaine rich man of Athens, the veriest pinching miser and the most covetous withall, that was in the whole city, with the imputations of prodigality; and negligence about his owne profit and gaine; charging him that one day he would smart for it, and both he and his children be hunger-starved for want wherwith to susteine themselves, if he looked no better to his thrift: or when they object miserable niggardie and beggerie, unto those that are known to be prodigall spenders, and consume all. After which manner, Titus Peronius reprooved Nero. Again, if they come to princes and great lords, who deale cruelly and hardly with their subjects and tenants, saying unto them, That they must lay away this overmuch lenity and foolish pity of theirs, which neither is seemely for their persons, nor yet profitable for their state. And very like to these, is he who maketh semblance to him who is a very senselesse and foolish foole, that he stands in great feare and doubt of him, lest hee should be circumvented by him, as if he were some cautelous, crafty and cunning person. He also, that doth rebuke another, who is an ordinary slanderer, who taketh pleasure (upon spite and envie) to be ever railing on all men, and backe-biting them; if hee chance any one time to breake out into the praise of some woorthy and excellent personage, saying in this manner unto him; This is a great fault that you have, and a disease that followeth you, thus to praise men of no woorth: What is he (I pray you) whom you thus commend? what good parts be in him? hath hath he at any time done any doughty deed, or delivered any singular speeche that might deserve such praises? But in amorous and love matters they passe: there you shall have them most of all to come over those whom they flatter and lay on load; to them they will joine close, and let them on a flaming fire. For if they see brethren at some variance, or setting nought by their parents, or els to deale unkindly with their owne wives, and to set no store by them, or to be jealous and suspitious of them; they never admonish, chastise or rebuke them for it, that they may amend; but rather they will kindle more coales betweene, and encrease their anger and discontentment on both sides: Nay, it is no great matter (will they say,) it is even well enough; you will never see and know who you are; you are the cause of all this your owne selfe; and selfe do, selfe have; you evermore have borne your selves so pliable, submisive and lowly toward them, that you are but rightly served. But say there be some itching heat of love, or smart anger upon jealousy, in regard of a courtisan or married wife, whom the party is amorous of; then shall you see a flatterer ready at hand to display his cunning openly, and to speake his minde freely unto him, putting fire to fire and feeding his love; you shall have him to lay the law upon this lover, accusing and entering proceffe against him in these termes: You have broken the lawes of love; you have done and said many things not so kindly as befecemed a true lover, but rather deale hardly with your love, and enough to lose her heart, and incurre her hatred for ever;

For kisses so many of thy sweet hart.

Thus the flattering friends of Antonius, when he burned in love of the Aegyptian queene Cleopatra, would perswade and make him beleve, that she it was who was enamoured upon him, and by way of opprobrious imputation they would tell him to his face, that he was proud, disdainfull, hard hearted, and void of all kinde affection. This noble queene (would they say) for-faking so mighty and wealthy a kingdom, so many pleasant palaces, and stately houses of blessed abode, such meanes and opportunities of happinesse, for the love of you pinch away, and consumeth herselfe, trudging after your campe and to firo, for to doe your Honour content and pleasure with the habit and title of your Concubine;

Whiles you in brest do cary an hart

Which will not be wrought by any art.

neglecting her (good lady) and suffering her to perish for sorow and hearts grieve. Whereupon he being well enough pleased to heare himselfe thus charged with wrong doing to her, and taking more pleasure in these accusations of theirs, than if they had directly praised him, was so blinde that he could not see how they that seemed thus to admonish him of his due tie, perverted and corrupted him thereby so much the more. For this counterfeit liberty of plaine dealing and plaine speeche, may be very well likened to the wanton pinches and bitings of luxurious women, who tickle and stirre up the lust and pleasure of men by that which might seeme to cause their paine. For like as pure wine, which otherwise of it selfe is a sure remedy against the poison of hemlocke, if a man doe mingle it with the juice of the said hemlocke, doth mightily enforce the poison thereof, and make it irremediable, for that by means of the heat it conveieeth the same more speedily unto the heart; even so these lewd and mischievous flatterers, knowing full well that franke speeche is a singular helpe and remedy against flattery, abuse it to flatter withall. And therefore it seemeth that Bias answered not so well as he might have done, to one that asked of him, which was the shrewdest and most hurtfull beast of all other: If (quoth he) your question be of wilde and savage, a Tyrant is worse; if of tame and gentle, a Flatterer. For hee might have said more truly; that of Flatterers some be of a tame kinde, such (I meane) as these parasites are who haunts the baines and stoupes; those also that follow good cheere and keepe about the table. As for him, who (like as the Pourcuttle fish stretcheth out his claws like branches) reacheth as farre as to the secret chambers and cabinets of women, with his buisie intermedling, with his calumniation and malicious demeanors, such a one is savage, fell, intractable and dangerous to be approached.

Now one of the meanes to beware of this flatterie, is to know and remember alwaies, that our soule consisteth of two parts, whereof the one is addicted to the truth, loving honestie and reason; the other more brutish, of the owne nature unreasonable, given to untruth and withall passionate. A true friend assisteth evermore the better part, in giving counsell and comfort, even as an expert and skilfull Physitian, who hath an eye that aimeth alwaies at the maintenance and encrease of health: but the flatterer doth apply himselfe, and setteth to that part which is voide of reason and full of passions: this he scratcheth, this he tickleth continually, this he stroketh and handleth in such sort, by devising some vicious and dishonest pleasures, that he withdraweth and turneth it away quite from the rule and guidance of reason. Moreover, as there be some kind of viands, which if a man eat, they neither turne unto blood, nor engender spirits, ne yet adde vigor and strength to the nerves and the marrow; but all the good they do, is haply to cause the flesh or genitall parts to rise, to stirre and loose the belly, or to breed some foggie, fantom and halfe rotten flesh, which is neither fast nor sound within; even so, if a man looke neerely and have good regard unto a flatterer, he shall never finde that all the words he useth, minister or procure one jot of good to him that is wise and governed by reason; but feed fooles with the pleasant delights of loves, kindle and augment the fire of inconsiderate anger; provoke them unto envie; breed in them an odious and vaine presumption of their owne wit; increase their sorrow and griefe, with moaning them and lamenting with them for companie; set on worke and exasperate their inbred naughtinesse and lowd disposition; their illiberal minde and covetous nature; their diffidence and distrustfulness of others; their base and servile timidity, making them alwaies worse, and apt to conceive ill; more fearefull; jealous and suspicious, by the meanes of some new accusations, false surmises and conjectural suggestions, which they be ready to put into their heads. For evermore it getteth closely into some vicious passion and affection of the minde, and there lurketh; the same it nourisheth and feedeth fat, but anon it appeareth like a botch, rising uppone the corrupt, diseased or inflamed parts of the soule. Art thou angry with one? punish him (saith he): Hast thou a minde to a thing? buy it, and make no more ado: Art thou never so little afraid? let us fite and be gon: Suspectest thou this, or that? belevee it confidently (saith he.) But if peradventure, he can hardly be seene and discovered about these passions, for that they be so mightie and violent, that oftentimes they chase and expell all life of reason, he will give some vantage to be sooner taken in others that be not so strong and vehement, where we shall finde him alwaies the same and like himselfe. For say, a man do suspect that he hath taken a surfeit, either by over liberal feeding or drinking headie wine, and upon that occasion make some doubt to bathe his bodie, or to cate presently againe and lay gorge upon gorge (as they say): A true friend will advice him to forbear & abstaine; he will admonish him to take heed to himselfe and looke to his health: In comes a flatterer, and he will draw him to the baine in all haste; he will bid him to call for some noveltie or other to be set upon the boord, willing him to fall fresh to it againe, and not to punish his body and do himselfe injurie, by fasting and refusing his meate and drinke: Also if he see him not disposed to take a journey by land or voyage by sea, or to go about any enterprize whatsoever it be, slowly and with an ill will, he will say unto him; either that there is no such great need, or the time is not so convenient, but it may be put off to a farther daie, or it will serve the turne well enough to send others about it. Now if it fall out so, that he having made promise to some familiar friend, either to lend or let him have the use of some money, or to give him it freely, do change his minde and repent of his promise; but yet be somewhat abashed and ashamed thus to breake his word; the flatterer by and by will put himselfe to the worse and lighter end of the balance, and make it weigh downe on the purse side, soone excluding and cutting off all shame for the matter: What man! (will he say) Spare your purse and save your silver; you are at a great charge; you keepe a great house, and have many about you which must be maintained and have sufficient; in such sort, that if we be not altogether ignorant of our selves, and wilfully blinde, not seeing that we be covetous, shamelesse, timorous and base minded, we cannot chooſe but start and finde out a flatterer; neither is it possible that he should escape us. For surely he will evermore defend and maintaine these imperfections, and frankly will he speake his minde in favour thereof, if he perceive us to over passe our selves therein. But thus much may suffice as touching these matters.

Let us come now to the uses and services that a flatterer is employed in: For in such offices he doth confound, trouble, and darken much the difference betweene him and a true friend; shewing himselfe in appearance, alwaies diligent, ready and prompt in all occurrences, without seeking any colourable pretences of shifiting off, and a refusing to do any thing. As for a faithfull friend, his whole carriage and behaviour is simple, like as be the words of truth, as saith Euryides, without welts and gards, plaine without plaits, and nothing counterfeit: whereas the conditions of a flatterer to say a truth,

By nature are diseased much,

And medicines needfull are for such,

not only with wisdom to be ministered and applied, but also many in number, and those (I assure you)

you) of a more exquisite making and composition than any other. And verily as friends many times when they meet one another in the street, passe by without good-morrow or god speed, or any word at all betweene them; onely by some light some looke, cheerefull smile, or amiable regard of the eie reciprocally given and taken, without any other token els, there is testified the good-will and mutual affection of the heart within: whereas the flatterer runneth toward his friend to meet him, followeth apace at his heeles, spreadeth forth both his armes abroad, and that a farre off, to embrace him: and if it chance that he be saluted and spoken to first, because the other had an eie on him before, he will with brave words excuse himselfe, yea, and many times call for witnesses, and bind it with great oathes good store, that he saw him not. Even so likewise in their affaires and negociations abroad in the world, friends omit and overslip many small and light things, not searching narrowly into matters, not offering or expecting againe any exquisite service; nothing curious and busie in ech thing, ne yet putting themselves forward to everie kinde of ministerie: but the flatterer is herein double diligent, he will be continually employed and never rest, without seeming at any time to be weary, no place, no space nor opportunity will he give the other to do any service; he looketh to be called unto and commanded; and if he be not bidden, he will take it ill and be displeased; nay you shall have him then out of heart and discouraged, complaining of his ill fortune, and protesting before God and man, as if he had some great wrong done unto him. These be evident marks and undoubted arguments to such as have wit and understanding, not of a friendship sound, sober & honest, but rather smelling of wanton and whorish love, which is more ready to embrace and clip, than is decent and seemely. Howbeit, to examine the same more particularly, let us consider what difference there is betweene a flatterer and a friend, as touching the offers and promises that they make. They who have written of this theme before us, say very well, that a friends promise goeth in this forme,

If that I can, or if it may be done,

Fulfill I will your minde, and that right soone.

but the offer of a flatterer runneth in this manner,

What would you have? say but the word to me,

Without all doubt, effected it shall be.

For such franke promisers and braggers as these, the Poets also use to bring unto the Stage in their Comedies, after this sort;

Now of all loves, Nicomachus, this I crave,

Set me against this souldier here so brave,

I will so swing his coat, you shall it see,

I that like a pompon his flesh shall tender be:

His face, his head I shall much softer make,

Than is the sponge that growes in sea or lake.

Moreover, you shall not see a friend offer his helping hand or aide in any action, unlesse he were called before to counsell, and his opinion asked of the enterprize, or that he have approved and set downe the same upon good advisement, to be either honest or profitable: whereas the flatterer, if a man should do him so much credit, as to require his consent and approbation, or otherwise request him to deliver his opinion of the thing, he, not onely upon a desire to yeeld unto others and to gratifie them; but also for feare to give any suspicion that he would seeme to draw backe and avoid to set his hand to any worke or businesse whatsoever, is ready with the formost to apply himselfe to the appetite and inclination of another, yea and withall, pricketh and inciteth him forward to enter upon it. And yet lightly you shall finde even of rich men and kings, but few or none who can or will come forth with these words;

Would God some one that needy is and poore,

Yea, worse than he that begs from doore to doore,

Would come to me (so that he were my friend)

Without all feare, and speake to me his mind.

But now adates it is rare otherwise; for they are much like unto composers of Tragedies, who will be provided of a quire or dance of their friends to sing with them, or desire to have a Theatre of purpose to give applause and clap their hands unto them. And verily whereas Astrophe in a certaine Tragedie giveth these sage and wise advertisements;

Take those for friends, I need, and holde them so,

Whose speech is sound, and waves not to and fro:

But those thus please thy minde in word and deed,

Count lewd, and such Locke forth of doore with speed.

Our Potentates and Grand Seigneurs doe cleane contrary; for such as will not follow their humors, and foote them up at every word, but gain-say their courses, in making remonstrance of that which is more profitable and expedient; such they disdaine and will not vouchsafe them a good looke. But for those wicked wretches, base minded varlets, and cooensing impostors, who can curry favor, they not only let their doores wide open for such, and receive them into their houses, but they admit them also to conferences with their inward affections and the very secrets of their heart. Among whom you shall have one more plaine perhaps and simple than the rest, who will say, that it is not for him, neither is he woorthy to deliberate and consult of so great affaires; may he could be content, and would take upon him, to be a poore servitour and minister, to execute whatsoever were concluded and enjoined him to doe: another more craftie and cunning than his fellowes, is willing enough to be used in counsell, where he will heare all doubts and perils that be cast; his eie-browes shall speake if they will, his head and eies shall nod and make signes, but his tongue shall not speake a word: Say that the partie whom he mindeth to flatter, do utter his minde and what he thinketh good to do: then will he crie out aloud and say, By Heracles I sweare, it was at my tongues end to have said as much, had you not prevented me and taken the word out of my mouth, I would have given you the verie same counsell. For like as the Mathematicians do affirme, that the superficial and outward extremities, the limmes also of the Mathematicall bodies, doe of themselves and in their owne nature, neither bend nor stretch, ne yet move at all: for that they be intellectuall onely or imaginarie, and not corporal, so but according as the bodies do bow, reach or stirre, so do they; so you shall ever finde that a flatterer, will pronounce, opine, thinke and be mooved to anger, according as he seeth another before him. And therefore in this kind, most easie it is to observe the difference between a flatterer and a friend. But yet more evident you shall see it in the manner of doing service. For the offices and kindnes which come from a friend, are ever best, and (as living creatures) have their most proper vertues inwardly, carrying least in shew, and having no outward ostentation of glorious pompe. And as it falleth out many times a Physitian cureth his patient, and saith little or nothing at all unto him, but doth the deed ere he be aware; even so, a good friend whether he be present or departed from his friend, doth him good still, and taketh care for him when he full little knoweth of it. Such a one was Arcefilas the Philosopher, who beside many other kind parts which he shewed unto his friend Apelles, the painter of Chios, comming one day to visite him when he was sicke, & perceiving how poore he was, went his way for that time: and when he returned againe, brought twentie good drachmes with him: and then sitting close unto Apelles by his beds side: Here is nothing here (quoth he) I see well, but these foure bare Elements that Empedocles writeth of,

Hot Fire gold Water, heere and sofe:

Grosse Earth pure Aire that spreads aloft.

But me thinkes you lie not at your ease; and with that he remooved the pillow or bolster under his head, and so conveyed underneath it privily, the small pieces of coine aforesaid. The old woman his nourie and keeper, when she made the bed, found this money: whereat she marvelled not a little, and told Apelles thereof, who laughing thereat: This is (quoth he) one of Arcefilas his theevish casts. And for that it is a Maxime in Philosophie, that children are borne like their parents, one Lacydes a schollar of Arcefilas aforesaid, being assistant with many others to attend of his named Cephisferates, when he came to his triall in a case of treason against the State: in pleading of which cause, the accuser his adversarie called for Cephisferates his ring, a pregnant evidence that made against him, which he had cleane slipped from his finger & let it fall to the ground; whereof the laid Lacydes being advised, set his foote presently over it, and so kept it out of sight: for that the maine proove of the matter in question lay upon that ring. Now after sentence passed on Cephisferates his side, and that he was cleere acquit of the crime, he went privately to everie one of the judges for to give them thanks: One of them who (as it should seeme) had scene what was done, willed him to thanke Lacydes: and with that told how the case stood, and how it went with him as it did: but all this while Lacydes himselfe had not said a word to any creature. Thus I thinke verily, that the gods themselves doe bestow many benefits and favours upon men secretly, and whereof they be not aware; being of this nature to take joy and pleasure in bountifullnesse and doing good. Contrariwise, the office that a flatterer seemeth to performe, hath nothing in it that is just, nothing true, nothing simple, nothing liberal: onely you shall see him sweat at it; you shall have him runne up and downe; keepe a loude crying crying & a great ado, and set his countenance upon the matter, so as that he maketh right good semblance & shew that he doth especiall service, taketh much care & paines about his busines: & maketh hast to dispatch it: and much like are all his doings to a curious picture, which with strange colours, with broken plaits, wrinkles and angles, affecteth and striveth (as it were) to shew some lively resemblance. Moreover, much ado he maketh, & is troublesome in telling how he went to and fro, wandering here and there about the matter; also what a deale of care he tooke therein; how he incurred the evill wil & displeasure of others; and a thousand hinderances, troubles & dangers, as besides he reckoneth up; inso much as a man that heareth, would say, All that ever he did was not worth so much as the twittle twattle that he maketh. For surely a good turne that is upbraided in that wise, becometh burthen some, odious, & not thankfully accepted, but intollerable. In all the offices & services of a flatterer, you shall find these upbraidings and shameful reports, that would make one blush to heare them, and those not onely after the deed done, but at the verie instant when he is about it. But in steed hereof, a true friend, if it fall out so, that he be forced and urged to relate what is done, maketh a plaine report and narration in modest manner; but of himselfe he will never say word. After which sort did the Lacedæmonians in times past, when they had sent come unto the Smyrnaens, which, in their extreme necessitie they craved at their hands: For at what time as the men of Smyrna magnified, and wonderfully extolled this liberalitie of theirs, they returned this answer againe: This is not so great a matter that it should deserve so highly to be praised or wondered at: for (say they) gathered we have thus much, and made this supply of your necessities, onely by cutting our selves and our labouring beasts short of one daies pittance and allowance. Bountie in this wise performed, is not onely gentleman-like and liberrall indeed, but also more welcome and acceptable to the receivers: in as much as they thinke it was no great damage, nor much out of their way that did it. Furthermore, not onely this odious fashion of doing any service with such paine and trouble, or the readinesse to make offer and promise so quickly, doth principally bewray the nature of a flatterer: but herein also much more he may be discovered: for that a friend is willingly employed in honest causes: but a flatterer in shameful and dishonest: as also in the divers ends that they purpose; for the one seeketh to profit his friend, the other to please only a friend; as Gorgias was wont to say, will never require that his friend should do him a pleasure, but in just things onely: whiles a flatterer serveth his tyme in many things that are unjust: For why?

To do good deeds friends should be joine,

But not to sinne in any point.

whereas he should endeavour to avert and withdraw him from that which is not decent, or seemly: Now if it happen that the other will not be perswaded by him, then were it not amisse to say unto him, as Antipater once answered Phocion; You cannot have me to be a friend and flatterer too (that is to say) a friend, and no friend. For one friend is to stand to another, and to assist him in doing, and not in misdoing, in consulting, and not in complotting and conspiring, in bearing witnesse with him of the truth, and not in circumventing any one by falshood, yea and to take part with him in suffering calamitie, and not to beare him company in doing injurie: For say that we may chance to be privie unto some shamefull and reprochfull deeds of our friend; yet we ought not to be partie unto them therein, nor willing to aide them in any undecent action. For like as the Lacedæmonians being defeated in battell by king Antipater, and treating with him about the capitulations and articles of peace, made request unto him, That he would impose upon them what conditions he would himselfe, were they never so chargeable and disadvantageous unto them, but in no wise enioine them to do any shamefull indignitie; even so a faithful friend ought to be so disposed, that if his friends occasions do require any matter of experience, danger, or travaile, he shew himselfe at the first call and holding up of his finger, ready to come, and cheerefully to take his part and undergo the same, without any shifting off, or allegation of any excuse whatsoever: may, if there be never so little shame or dishonor that may so accrew thereby, he shall then refuse and pray him to hold him excused; he shall request pardon and desire to have leave for to be dismissed and depart in peace. The flatterer is quite contrary; for in painfull, difficult and dangerous affaires, which require his helpe and assistance, he draweth backe, and is ready to plucke his necke out of the collar: if (I say) in this case you seeme to triall sake to knocke (as it were upon a pot) to see whether he be right, he will not ring cleere; but you shall see by the dead sound of his pretended and forged excuses, that he is full of cracks and flaws: contrariwise, in dishonest, vile, base and shamefull ministeries, I am for you (will he say) I am yours to command; doe with me what you will, tread me under your foot, abuse me at your your pleasure : to be short, he will thinke nothing to be an ignominious indignity unto him. See you not the ape? good he is not to keepe the houle and to give warning of thieues, as dogs do; cary upon his backe any burdens he can not, like the horse; neither yet is he fit to draw or to plough the ground, as the ox doth; and therefore he beareth all kinde of abuse and misusing, all wrongs, all unhappy sports and trickes that can be devised, serving onely as an instrument of mockerie, and a meere laughing stocke. Even so it fareth with a flatterer, being not meet to plead at the barre for a friend, to assitt him in counsell, to lay his hand to his purse and supply his wants that way, nor to fight as his champion in maintenance of his quarrell, as one that can away with no labour, no paines taking, or serious employment; and in one word, fit for nothing, that good is: many in such affaires as may be done under the arme, that is to say, which be close 10 secret and filthy services, he is the forwardest man in the world, and maketh no excuses. A trustie currier he is betwene, in love matters, in finding favour with a bawd and bringing a wench or harlot to your bedde, he is excellent, and hath a marvellous gift; to make the shot, and cleere the reckoning of any sumptuous feast or banquet hee is ready and perfect; in providing for a great dinner or supper, and setting the same forth accordingly, he is nothing slow, but nimble enough. To give entertainment unto concubines he is very handsome, obsequious and serviceable; if one bid him to speake audaciously and malapertly against a father in law, a guardian, tutor, or any such, or to put away his true espoused wife, like as he seeth his good matter do before him, he is without all shame & mercy: so that even here in also it is no hard matter to see what kinde of man he is, and how much he differeth from a true friend: For com- 20 mand him to commit what villanie and wickednesse you will, ready he is to execute the same, and so he may gratifie and pleasure you that set him on worke, he careth not to do any injurie to himselfe.

There is moreover another meanes not of the least consequence, whereby a man may know how much a flatterer differeth from a friend indeed, namely, by his disposition and behaviour towards his other friends: for a true friend findeth contentment in nothing so much as to love many, and likewise to be loved of many; and herein he labourerth especially with his friend to procure himselfe many others to love and honor him: for being of this opinion, that among good friends all things are common, he thinketh that nothing ought to be more common than friends themselves. But the supposed, false and counterfeit friend, being privie to his owne confidence, that he doth great injurie to true amitie and friendship, which he doth cor- 30 rupt in manner of a base piece of money: as he is by nature envious, so he exerciseth that envie of his, upon such as be like himselfe, striving with a kinde of emulation to surpass them in scurrile speech, giving of taunts and garrulitie, but before such as he knoweth better than himselfe, he trembleth and is afraid, and in truth dare not come neere nor shew his face to such an one, no more (I assure you) than a footman to go and keepe pace (according to the Proverb) with a Lydian chariot, or rather (as Simonides saith,

He hath not so much as lead so grosse.*

Being compared with true, found and grave friendship, which (as they say) will endure the hammer, he cannot chooseth but finde himselfe to be but light, falsified and deceitfull: seeing then that he must needs be detected and knownen, for such an one as he is, what doth he thinke you? Surely he plaierth like an unskilfull painter, who had painted certaine cockes, but verie badly: For like as he gave commandement to his boy for to keepe away naturall and living cockes in deed, farre ynough off from his pictures; so a flatterer will doe what he can to chafe away true friends, and not suffer them to approach neere; or if he be not able so to do, than openly and in publicke place, he will seeme to currie favour with them, to honor and admire them, as farre better than himselfe: but secretly, underhand, and behinde their backs, he will not let to raise some privie calumniation, & some slanderous reports tending to their discredit: but if he see that by such privie girds and pinches which will fret and gall the sore, he cannot at the first bring his purpose about: yet hee remembreth full well and observeth the saying of Medius. This 40 Medius was the chiefe captaine of the troupe, or the master rather of the quire (if I may so say) of all those flatterers that used the court of king Alexander the great, & came about his person; the principall Sophister also that opposed himselfe and banded against all good men, and never rested to slander and backbite them: This rule and lesson he taught his scholars and quirksters that were under his hand, To cast out slanders boldly, and not to spare, therewith to bite others: For (quoth he) although the sore may heale up againe, yet the scarre will remaine 45 and and be ever seene. By these cicatrices and scarres of false imputations, or (to speake more properly and truly) by such gangrenes and cankerous ulcers as these, Alexander the king being corroded and eaten, did to death Calisthenes, Parmenion, and Philotas, his fast & faithfull friends: but to such as Agnon, Bagoas, Agefius and Demetrius were, he abandoned and gave himselfe wholly to be supplanted and overthrowen at their pleasure, whiles he was by them adored, adorned, arrayed gorgeously with rich robes, and set out like a Barbarian image, statue or idoll. Lo what is the force and power of flatterie to win grace and favor; and namely in those, who would be reputed the mightiest monarches and greatest potentates of the world, it beareth most sway: For such are perswaded, and desirous also, that the best things should be in themselves; and this 10 is it, that giveth both credite and also boldnesse unto a flatterer. True it is I must confesse, that the highest places and forts situate upon the loftiest mounts, are least accessible and most hard to be gained by those who would surpris and force them; but where there is an high spirit and haughtie minde by nature, not guided by the same judgement of reason, but lifted up with the favors of fortune, or nobilitie of birth, it is the easiest matter in the world even for most base and vile persons to conquer such, and the avenues to them lie ready and open, to give the vantage of easiest entrance. And therefore as in the beginning of this Treatise I gave warning; so now I admonish the Readers againe in this place; That every man would labour and strive with himselfe to roote out that selfe-love and overweening that they have of their owne good parts and worthinesse: For this is it that doth flatter us within, and possesseth our minds before 20 hand, whereby we are exposed and lie more open unto flatterers that are without, finding us thus prepared already for to worke upon. But if we would obey the god Apollys, and by acknowledging how much in all things we ought to esteeme that oracle of his, which commandeth us To know our selves, search into our owne nature, and examine withall our nouriture and education: when we finde there an infinite number of defects, and many vanities, imperfections and faults, mixed untowardly in our words, deeds, thoughts and passions, we would not so easily suffer these flatterers to tread us under their feet, and make a bridge of us as they do at their pleasure. King Alexander the great was wont to say; that two things there were especially which mooved him to have lesse beleefe in them, who saluted and greeted him by the name of a God: The one was Sleepe, & the other the use of Venus: in both which he found that he was 30 worse than himselfe, that is to say, subject to infirmities and passions more than in any thing else. But if we would looke into our selves and ever and anon consider, how many grosse vices, troublesome passions, imperfections and defects we have, surely we shall finde that we stood in great neede, not of a false friend to flatter us in our follies, and to praise and extoll us; but rather of one that would frankly finde fault with our doings, and reproove us in those vices that ech one privately and in particular doth commit. But very few there be among many others; who dare freely and plainly speake unto their friends, but rather sooth them up and seeke to please them in every thing: And even in those, as few as they be, hardly shall you find any that know how to do it well, but for the most part they thinke that they speake freely, when they do nothing but reproove, reproch and raile. Howbeit, this libertie of speech whereof I speake, is 40 of the nature of a medicine, which if it be not given in time convenient and as it ought to be, besides, that it doth no good at all, it troubleth the body, worketh grievance, and in stead of a remedie prooveth to be a mischief: For even so, he that doth reprehend and find fault unseasonably, bringeth forth the like effect with paine, as a flatterer doth with pleasure. For men are apt to receive hurt and damage, not onely by overmuch praise; but also by inordinate blame when it is out of due time: for it is the only thing that of all others maketh them soonest to turne side unto flatterers, and to be most easily surprisid by them; namely, when from those things that stand most opposite and highest against them, they turne aside like water, and run downe those waies that be more low, easie, and hollow. In which regard it behooveth that this libertie in fault finding, be tempered with a certaine amiable affection, and accompanied with 50 the judgement of reason, which may take away the excessive vehemencie and force of sharpe words, like the over-bright shining of some glittering light, & for feare lest their friends being dazed as it were and frighted with the flashing beames of their rebukes, seeing themselves so reprooved for ech thing, and blamed every while, may take such a griefe and thought thereupon, that for sorrow they be ready to flie unto the shadow of some flatterer, and turne toward that which will not trouble them at all. For we must avoid all vice, (so Philopappus) and seeke to correct the same by the meanes of vertue (& not by another vice contrary unto it) as some do; who for to shun foolish and rusticall bashfulnessse, grow to be overbold and impudent; for to elchew 55 rude

rude incivillitie, fall to be ridiculous jesters and pleafants; and then they thinke to be farthest off from cowardise and effeminate tendernesse, when they come neereft to extreme audacitie and boasting braverie. Others there be, who to proove themselves not to be superstitious, become meere Atheists; and because they would not be thought and reputed idiots and fooles, proove artificiall conny-catchers. And surely in redressing the enormities of their maners, they do as much as those, who for want of knowledge and skill to set a peece of wood streight that twined and lieth crooked one way, do curbe and bend it as much another way. But the most shamefull means to avoid & shun the suspition of a flatterer, is to make a mans selfe odious & troublefome without profit; and a very rude and rustical fashion this is, of seeking to win favor, and that with favour of no learning, skill, and civillitie, to become unpleasant, harsh, and fowre to a friend, for to shunne that other extreame, which in friendship seemeth to be bale and servile; which is as much, as if a freed slave newly franchised, should in a Comedie thinke that he could not use and enjoy his libertie of speech, unless he might be allowed licenciously to accuse another without controlment. Considering then, that it is a foule thing to fall to flatterie, in studying to please, as also for the avoiding of flatterie; by immoderate libertie of speech, to corrupt and marre, as well the grace of amitie and winning love, as the care of remedying and reforming that which is amiffe: and seeing that we ought to avoid both the one and the other: and as in all things else, so free speaking, is to have the perfection from a meane and mediocritie; reason would, and by order it were requisite, that toward the end of this Treatise, we should adde somewhat in manner of a corollarie and complement, as touching that point.

Forasmuch as therefore we see that this libertie of language and reprehension hath many vices following it, which doe much hurt: let us assay to take them away one after another, and begin first with blinde selfe-love and private regards: where we ought especially to take heed that we be not seene to do any thing for our owne interest, and in respect of our selves; and namely, that we seeme not, for wrong that we have received our selves, or upon any griefe of our owne, to reproch, upbraid, or revile other men: for they will never take it as done for any love or good will that we beare unto them, but rather upon some discontentment and heart-burning that we have, when they see that our speech tendeth unto a matter wherein we are interested our selves; neither will they repute our words spoken by way of admonition unto them, but rather interpret them as a complaint of them. For surely the libertie of speech whereof we treat, as it respecteth the welfare of our friend, so it is grave and venerable; whereas complaints favour rather of selfe-love and a base minde. Hereupon it is that we reverence, honour and admire those who for our good deliver their minds frankly unto us: contrariwise, we are so bolde as to accuse, challenge and charge reciprocally, yea, and contemne those that make complaints of us. Thus we reade in Homer, That Agamemnon, who could not beare and endure Achilles, when he seemed to tell him his minde after a moderate maner; but he was well enough content to abide and suffer Ulysses, who touched him neere, and bitterly rebuked him in this wise:

*Ah wretch, would God some abject host beside us, by your hand Conducted were; so that in field
you did not us command.*

As sharpe a checke as this was, yet being delivered by a wife man, proceeding from a carefull minde, and tendering the good of the common weale, he gave place thereto, and kicked not againe: for this Ulysses had no private matter, nor particular quarell against him, but spake frankly for the benefit of all Greece: whereas Achilles seemed to be offended and displeased with him principally, for some private matter betweene them twaine. And even Achilles also himselfe, although he was never known for to be a man of a gentle nature and of a milde spirit,

*But rather of a stomack full,
and one who would accuse
A guiltlesse person for no cause, and him full (some abuse).*

endured Patroclus patiently, and gave him not a word againe, notwithstanding he taunted and tooke him up in this wise:

*Thou mercilesse and cruell wretch,
for Peleus valiant knight
Was never (sure) by father true,
ne yet dame Thetis bright*

Thy mother kinde: but sea so greene, or rocks so sleepe and hard Ther bare, (thy heart of pittie hush so small or no regard.)

For like as Hyperides the Oratour required the Athenians (who complained that his orations were bitter) to consider of him, not onely whether he were sharpe & eager simply, but whether he were so upon no cause, nor taking any fee; even so, the admonition and reprehension of a friend, being fervent and cleafed pure from all private affection, ought to be revered: it carrieth (I say) authoritie with it, and no exceptions can well be taken, nor a man dare lift up an eie against it: in such sort, as if it appeare that he who chideth freely, and blameth his friend, doeth let passe and reject all those faults which hee hath committed against him, and maketh no mention thereof, but toucheth those errors & misdemeanors only which concerne others, and they spare him not, but pierce & bite to the quicke: the vehemency of such free speech is invincible, and can not be challenged, for the mildnes & good will of the chastiser, doth fortifie the austeritie & bitternes of the chastisement. Well therefore it was said in old time; That whensoever we are angry, or at some jarre & variance with our friends, then most of all we ought to have an eie unto their good, and to study how to do somewhat that is either profitable unto them, or honorable for them. And no lesse materiall is this also to the maintenance of friendship, if they that thinke themselves to be despised and not well regarded of their friends, do put them in mind, and tell them frankly of others, who are neglected by them, and not accounted of as they should be. Thus dealt Plato with Demys, at what time he was in disgrace, and saw how he made no reckoning at all of him: For he came unto the Tyrant upon a time, and requested that he might have a day of audience and leave to conferre with him: Demys granted his request, supposing verily that Plato had a purpose to complaine and expostulat with him in his owne behalfe, and thereupon to discourse with him at large: But Plato reasoned and debated the matter with him in this manner: Sir (quoth he) Demys, if you were advertised and knew that some enemy or evil willer of yours were arrived and landed in Sicilie, with a full intention to do you some displeasure, although he had no opportunitie or meanes to execute and effect the same, would you let him faile away againe & depart from Sicilie, with impunity, and before he were talked withall?

I to not Demys (quoth Demys) but I would looke to him well enough for that: For we ought to hate & punish not the actions onely, but the verie purposes and intentions also of enemies. But how and if (quoth Plato againe) on the contrarie side; some other being expressly and of purpose come for meere love and affection that he beareth unto you, and fully minded to doe you some pleasure, or to advice you for your good, you will give him neither time nor opportunitie therfore; is it meet (think you) that he should be thus unthankfully dealt withall, or hardly entreated at your hands? With that Dionysius was somewhat mooved, and demanded who that might be? Aeschines (quoth Plato) is he, a man faire conditioned, and of as honest carriage and behaviour, as any one that ever came out of Socrates schoole, or daily and familiarly conversed with him; sufficient and able by his eloquence and pithie speech to reforme the maners of those with whom he keepeth companie: This Aeschines (I say) having taken a long voyage over sea and arrived here, intending for to conferre with you philosophically is nothing regarded, nor set by at all. These words touched Demys so to the verie quicke, that presently he not onely tooke Plato in his armes, embracing him most lovingly, and yielding him great thanks for that kindnesse, & highly admiring his magnanimity; but also from that time forward, entreated Aeschines right courteously, and did him all the honor that he could.

Secondly, this libertie of speech which now is in hand, we ought to cleere and purge cleane from all contumelious and injurious words, from laughter, scoffes, and scurrile taunts, which are the hurtfull and unholysome fauces (as I may say) wherewith many use to season their free language. For like as a Chirurgicalian, when he maketh incision and cutteth the flesh of his patient, had need to use great dexteritie, to have a nimble hand and an even; yea and every thing neat and fine belonging to this worke and operation of his: as for all dauncing, gesticulations besides of his fingers, to yish motions, and superfluous agitation thereof, to shew the agilitie of his hand, he is to forebare for that time: So this libertie of speech unto a friend, doth admit well a certaine kind of elegancie and civillitie, provided, alwaies that the grace thereof retaine still a decent and comely gravitie, whereas if it chaunce to have audacious braverie, saucie impuritie, and insolencie, to the hurt or hinderance of credit, it is utterly marred and looseth all authoritie. And therefore it was not an unproper and uneleagant speech, wherewith a musician upon a time stopped stopped King Philips mouth that he had not a word to say againe: For when he was about to have disputed and contested against the slide minstrell, as touching good fingering, and the sound of the severall strings of his instrument: Oh sir (quoth he) God forbid that ever you should fall to so low an estate, as to be more cunning in these matters than I. But contrariwise Epicharmus spake not so aptly and to the purpose in this behalfe: For when King Hiero who a little before had put to death some of his familiar acquaintance, invited him not many daies after to supper. Yea marie sir, but the other day when you sacrificed, you bad not your friends to the feast. And as badly answered Antiphon, who upon a time when there was some question before Dennys the Tyrant, what was the best kinde of brasse: Marie that (quoth he) whereof the Athenians made the Statutes of Harmodius and Aristogiton. Such speeches as these, are tart, and biting, and no good can come thereof, neither hath that scurrilite and scoffing manner any delight, but a kinde of intemperance it is of the tooing mingled with a certaine maliciousnes of minde, implying a will to do hurt and injurie, and shewing plaine enmitie, which as many as use, worke their owne mischief and destruction, dauncing (as the Proverb saith) a daunce untowardly about a pits brinke, or jesting with edged tooles. For surely it cost Antiphon his life, who was put to death by the said Dennys. And Timagenes lost for ever the favour and friendship of Augustus Cæsar, not for any franke speech and broad language that ever he used against him; but onely because he had taken up a foolish fashion at everie feast or banquet, whereunto the Emperour invited him, and whensoever he walked with him, estoones and to no purpose he would come out with these verses in Homer,

*For naught else but to make some sport
Among the Greekes he did resort.*

pretending that the cause of that favour which he had with the Emperour, was the grace and gift that he had in flouting and reviling others: and even the verie comical Poets in old time, exhibited and represented to the Theaters, many grave, austere and serious remonstrances, and those pertaining to policy & government of State: but there be scurrile speeches intermingled among, for to moove laughter, which (as one unfavorable dish of meate among many other good viands) marre all their libertie of speech and the benefit thereof; so as it is vaine and doth no good at all: And even to the Authors and Actors of such broad jests get nothing thereby, but an opinion and imputation of a malicious disposition and impure scurrilite: and to the hearers there accreth no good nor profit at all. At other times and in other places, I hold well with it, and grant, that to jest with friends and moove laughter is tolerable enough; but surely the libertie of speech then, ought to be serious and modest, shewing a good intention without any purpose to gall or sting. And if it do concerne weightie affaires indeed, let the words be so set and couched, the affection so appeere, that all concurring together may win credite to the speech, and be effectual to moove. But as in all things els, fit opportunity overlit and neglected doth much hurt; so especially it is the occasion that the fruit of free speech is utterly lost, in case it be omitted and forgotten. Moreover this is evident, that we must take heed how we speake broad at a table where friends be met together to drinke wine liberally and to make good cheere: for he that amid pleasant discourses and mery talke mooveth a speech that causeth bending and knitting of browes, or others, maketh men to frowne and be frowning; he doth as much as overcast faire weather with a blacke and darke clouds; opposing himselfe unto that God * Lyam, who by good right hath that name, as Pindarus the Poet saith,

*For that the cord he doth untie
Of cares that breed anxietie.*

Besides, this neglect of opportunitie bringeth with it great danger; for that our minds and spirits, kindled once with wine, are easie enflamed with cholar; yea and oftentimes it falleth out, that a man after he hath taken his drinke well, when he thinketh but to use his freedome of tongue for to give some wholesome advertisement and admonition, ministreth occasion of so great enmitie. And to say all in few words, it is not the part of a generous, confident, and resolute heart, but rather of a craven kind and unmanly, to forbear plaine speech when men are sober, and to keepe a barking at the boord, like unto those cowardly cur dogs who never snarle but about a bone under the table. And now of this point, needlesse it is to discourse any longer.

But forasmuch as many men neither will nor dare controll and reforme their friends when they do amisse, so long as they be in prosperitie; as being of opinion that such admonition can not have access nor reach into a fortunate state that standeth upright; and yet the same persons when men are falling, are ready to lay them along, and being once downe, to make a football of them, or tread them under feet, or else keepe them so when they be once under the hatches, giving their libertie of speech full scope to run over them all at once; as a brooke-water which having bene kept up perforce against the nature and course thereof, is now let go, and the flood-gates drawn up; rejoicing at his change and infortunite of theirs, in regard as well of their pride and arrogancie, who before did disdain and despised them; as also of themselves, who are but in meane and low estate: it were not impertinent to this place for to discourse a little of this matter, and to answer that verse of Euripides,

When fortune doth upon men smile,

What need have they of friends the while?

10 Namely, that even then when as they seeme to have fortune at command, they stand in most necessitie, and ought to have their friends about them, to plucke downe their plumes and bring under their haughtinesse of heart, occasioned by prosperitie: for few there be who with their outward felicitie continue wise and sober in mind, breaking not forth into insolence; yea & many there are who have need of wit, discretion and reason to be put into them from without, to abate and deprime them being set a gog and puffed up with the favors of fortune: But say, that the Divine power do change and turne about, and overthrow their state, or clip their wings and diminish their greatnesse and authoritie, then these calamities of themselves are courages sufficient, putting them in minde of their errors, and working repentance: and then in such distress there is no use at all either of friends to speake unto them frankly, or of pinching and biting speeches, to molest, and trouble them, but to say a truth, in these mutations

It greatly doth content our minds

To see the face of pleasant friends.

who may yeeld consolation, comfort and strength to a distressed heart, like as Xenophon doth write, that in battailes and the greatest extremities of danger, the amiable visage and cheerefull countenance of Clearchus being once seene of the souldiors, encouraged them much more to play the men and fight lustily: whereas he that useth unto a man distressed, such plaine speech as may gall and bite him more, doth as much as one who unto a troubled and inflamed eye applyeth some quicke eie-salve or sharpe drug that is proper for to cleere the sight: by which 30 meane he cureth not the infirmite before said, neither doth he mitigate or alay the paine, but unto sorrow and griefe of minde already addeth anger moreover, and doth exasperate a wounded heart. And verily so long as a man is in the latitude of health, he is not so testie, froward, and impatient; but that he will in some sort give care unto his friend, and thinke him neither rough nor altogether rude and uncivill, in case he tell him of his loosenesse of life, how he is given too much either unto women or wine; or if he finde fault with his idleness and sitting still, or contrariwise his excessive exercise; if he reprove him for haunting so often the baines or hot-houses, and never lying out of them, or blame him for gourmandise and belly cheere, or eating at undue houres. But if he be once sicke, then it is a death unto him and a griefe insupportable, which doth aggravate his maladie, to have one at his bedside founding ever in his 40 cares: See what comes of your drunkenesse, your idleness, your surfeiting and gluttony, your wenching and lecherie, these are the causes of your diseale. But what will the sicke man say againe: Away good sir with these unseasonable words of yours: you trouble me much, and do me no good iwis: I am about making my last will and testament; my Physicians are busie preparing and tempering a potion of Scammonie, or a drinke of Castorium for me: and you come preaching unto me with your Philosophicall reasons and admonitions to chaffele me: I have no need of them now, nor of such friends as you. Semblably it fareth with those who are fallen to decay & be downe the winde; for capable they be not of sententious sawes; they have no need as the case now stands of free reprehensions: then lenitie and gentle usage, aide and comfort are more meet for them. For even so, kinde wives when their little babes and infants 50 have caught a fall, run not by and by to rate or chide them, but to take them up, wash and make them cleane where they were berayed, and to still them by all means that they can; afterwards, they rebuke and chastise them for looking no better to their feet. It is reported of Demetrius the Phalerian, when being banished out of his country, he lived at Thebes in meane estate and very obscurely, that at the first he was not well pleased to see Crates the Philosopher, who came to visit him, as looking ever when he would begin with some rough words unto him, according to that libertie of speech which those Cynicke Philosophers then used; but when he heard Crates once speake kindly unto him, and discoursing after a milde maner, of the state of his banishment: namely, That there was no miserie fallen unto him by that meanes, nor any calamitie at all, for which he should weare and torment himselfe; but rather that he had cause to reioice, in that he was sequestred and delivered from the charge and management of such affaires as were ticklish, mutable and dangerous; and withall exhorting him to plucke up his heart, and be of good cheere, yea, and repose all his comfort in his owne selfe and a cleere conscience. Then Demetrius being more lightsome, and taking better courage, turned to his friends and said, Shame take those affaires and busineses; our upon those troublefome and restless occupations, which have kept me from the knowledge and acquaintance of such a worthy man: For

*If men be in distresse and grife,
Sweet words of friends do bring reliefe:*

But foolish sots in all their actions,

Have need of shames or sharpe corrections.

And verily this is the manner of generous and gentle friends; but other base minded and abject fellows, who flatter and fawne whiles fortune doth smile; like unto olde ruptures, spaines and cramps (as Demosthenes saith) do then stirre and shew themselves, when any new accident happeneth unto the bodie, so they also stick close to every change and alteration of fortune, as being glad thereof, and taking pleasure and contentment therein. For, say that a man afflicted, were to be put in mind of his fault and misgovernment of himselfe, by reason that he hath taken lewd courses and followed ill counsell, and so fallen into this or that inconvenience, it were sufficient to say thus unto him,

*You neuer tooke by mine advice this course,
Against the same howsoft did I discourse?*

In what cases and occurrences then, ought a friend to be earnest and vehement? and when is he to use his libertie of speech, and extend it to the full? even then, when occasion is offered, and the time ferveth best to repress excessive pleasure, to restraine unbridled choler, to restraine intollerable pride and insolencie, to stay insatiable avarice, or to stand against any foolish habitude and inconsiderate motion. Thus Solon spake freely unto king Croesus, when hee saw how he was cleane corrupted, and grown beyond all measure arrogant upon the opinion that he had of his felicitie in this world, which was vncertaine, advertising him to looke unto the end. Thus Socrates clipped the wings of Alcibiades, and by convincing his vice and error, caused him to weepe bitterly, and altered quite the disposition of his heart. Such were the remonstrances and admonitions of Cyrrus to Cyaxares, and of Plato to Dion, even when he was in his greatest ruffe, in the very height of his glory: when (I say) all mens eyes were upon him, for his worthie acts and great successe in all affaires, willing him even then to take heed and beware of arrogancie and selfe-conceit, as being the vice that dwelleth in the same house together with solitude, (that is to say) which maketh a man to live apart from the whole world. And to the same effect wrote Seneca also unto him, when he had him looke to himselfe, and not take a pride and presume much vpon this: That there was no talke among women and children, but of him; rather that he should have a care so to adorne Sicilie with religion and pietie towards the gods, with justice and good lawes in regard of men, that the schoole of the Academic might have honour and credit by him. Contrariwise, Eutamus and Eulamus, two minions and favourites of king Perseus, who followed his yeine and pleased his humor in all things, like other courtiers of his, all the while that he flourished, and so long as the world went on his side: but after he had lost the field in a battell against the Romans, fought neere the citie Pydna, and was fled, they let flie at him grosse tearmes and reprochfull speeches, bitterly laying to his charge all the misdeameors and fautes that he had before committed, casting in his dish those persons whom he had evil intreated or despised; which they ceased not to doe so long, untill the man (partly for sorrow, and partly for anger) was so mooved, that he stabbed them both with his dagger, and slew them in the place. Thus much in general may suffice, to determine and define as touching the opportunity of free speech to friends: meane while a faithfull and carefull friend must not reject such occasions as many times are presented unto him by them, but to take hold thereof quickly, and make good use of them: for otherwhiles it falleth out, that a demand or question asked, a narration related, a reprehension or commendation of like things in other persons, open the doore and make way for us to enter, and giveth us leave to speake frankly. After this manner it is said, that Demetrius tooke his vantage to utter his minde freely: who coming upon a time from Corinth to Macedonie, when as King Philip was in some termes of disension with his wife and sonne, was friendly received by Philip and bidden kindly welcome. Now after salutations and other other complements passed betweene; the King asked him whether the Greekes were at accord and unitie one with another? Demetrius, as he was a friend verie inward with him, and one that loved him hartly, answered thus; It becommeth you well in deed first to enquire of the concord and agreement betweene the Athenians and the Peloponnesians, when in the meane while you suffer your owne house to be full of domestical quarrels and debates. Well did Dionenes likewise, who being come into the campe of King Philip, when he had an expedition or journey against the Greekes, was taken and brought before the King, who not knowing what hee was, demanded of him, If hee were not a spie: Yes marie (quoth he) and come I am to spie out your inconsiderate folly (o Philip) and want of foresight, who being not urged nor compelled by any man, are come thus farre to hazard in one hower the State of your kingdome and your owne life, and to lay all upon the chance and cast of a die. But some man peradventure will say, This was a speech somewhat with the sharpest, and too much biting. Moreover, another fit time and occasion there is of admonition, when those whom we minde to reprove, having beene reproched and taunted already by others for some faults which they committed, are become submisive and cast downe to our hands. Which opportunitee a wife and skilfull friend will not omit, but make especial good use of: namely, by seeming in open place to check those that thus have slandered them, yea and to repulse and put backe such opprobrious imputations; but privately he will take his friend apart by himselfe, and put him in minde to live more warily and give no such offence, if for no other thing else; yet because his enemies should not take vantage, and beare themselves insolently against him: For how shall they be able to open their mouths against you, & what mischief word can they have to say unto you, if you would leave these things and cast them behinde you, for which you heare ill and are grown to some obloquie? In this sort if the matter be handled, all the offence that was taken shall light upon the head of the first slanderer, and the profit shall be attributed unto the other that gave the friendly advertisement, and he shall goe away with all the thanks.

Some there be moreover who after a more cleanly and fine maner in speaking of others, admonish their owne familiar friends: for they will accuse strangers in their hearing for those faults which they know them to commit, and by this meanes reclaim them from the same. Thus Ammonius our master perceiving when he gave lecture in the after-noon that some of us his scholars, had taken a larger dinner, and more than was meet for students, commanded a servant of his a franchised, to take up his owne sonne and to beate him, and why so? He cannot forsooth make his dinner (quoth he) but he must have some vinegar to his meat. And in saying so, he cast his eye upon us, in such sort, that as many as were culpable, tooke themselves to be rebuked, & thought that he meant them. Furthermore, this good regard would be observed, that we never use this fashion of free speech, and reproofing our friend in the presence of many persons, but we must remember that which befell unto Plato: for when upon a time, Socrates in a disputation held at the table, inveighed somewhat too bitterly against against one of his familiars before them all: had it not beene better (quoth Plato) to have told him of this privately, but thus to shame him before all this companie? But Socrates taking him presently therewith, And you also might have done better to have saide this to my selfe, when you had found me alone. Pythagoras by report gave such hard tearmes by way of reproofe to one of his scholars, and acquaintance in the hearing of many, that the young man for very griefe of heart was weary of his life and hanged himselfe. But never would Pythagoras after to his dying day, reprove or admonish any man if another were in place. And to say a truth, as well the detection as the correction of a sinne ought to be secret, and not in publick place, like as the discoverie and cure also of some filthie and foule disease: it must not I say be done in the view of the world (as if some shew or pompe were to be exhibited unto the people) with calling witnesses or spectators thereto. For it is not the part of a friend, but a trick of some Sophister, to seeke for glorie in other mens faults, and affect outward shew and vaine ostentation in the presence of others: much like to these Mount-bank Chirurgians, who for to have the greater practise, make shew of their cunning casts, and operations of their art in publick Theatres, with many gesticulations of their handy-worke. Moreover, besides that there should no infamie grow to him that is reprovved (which in deed is not to be allowed in any cure or remedie) there ought also to be some regard had of the nature of vice and sinne, which for the most part of it selfe is opinionative, contentious, stubborn and apt to stand to it, and make means of defence. For as Euripides saith,

*We daily see, not onely women love
Doth presse the more, when one doth it reprove.*

But any vice whatsoever it be and everie imperfection, if a man do reprove it in publike place before many, and spare not at all, putteth on the nature of impudence and turneth to be shamelesse: like as therefore Plato giveth a precept, that elder folke, if they would imprint shame and grace in their yong children, ought themselves first to shew shamefast behavior among them; even so, the modest and bashfull libertie of speech which one friend useth, doth strike also a great shame in another. Also to come and approach by little and little unto one that offendeth, and after a doubting maner with a kind of feare to touch him, is the next way to undermine the vice that he is prone and given unto, and the same, whiles he can not chooseth but be modestly disposed, who is so modestly and gently entreated. And therefore it would be alwaies verie good in those reprehensions to observe what he did, who in like case reprooving a friend,

Held head full close unto his eare,

That no man els but he might heare.

But lesse seemly and convenient it is for to discover the fault of the husband before his wife; of a father in the presence of his sonnes; of a lover before his love; or of a schoolmaster in the hearing of his scholars: that were enough to put them beside their right wits, for anger and griefe when they shall see themselves checked and discredited before those of whom they desire to be best esteemed. And verily of this mind I am, that it was not the wine so much that set king Alexander in such a chafe & rage against Clitu when he reproved him, as for that he did it in the presence and hearing of so many. Aristomenes also, the master and tutor of king Ptolomeus, for that in the sight of an embassador he awaked him out of a sleepe, & willed him to give eare unto the 20 embassage that was delivered, ministred unto his evil-willers and the flatterers about the court great vantage, who thereupon tooke occasion to seeme discontented in the kings behalfe, and thus to say: What if after so many travels that your Majestie doth undergo, and your long watching for our sakes, some sleep do overtake you otherwhiles; our part it were to tell you of it privately, & not thus rudely to lay hand as it were upo your person in the presence of so many men. Whereupon Ptolomeus being moved at these suggestions, sent unto the man a cup of poison, with comendement that he should drinke it off. Aristophanes also, catcheth this in Cleon his teeth,

For that when strangers were in place

The towne with termes he did disgrace,

and thereby provoke the Athenians & bring their high displeasure upon him. And therefore this 30 regard would be had especially above all others, that when we would use our libertie of speech, we do it not by way of ostentation in a vaine glorie to be popular, and to get applaus, but onely with an intention to profit and do good, yea and to cure some infirmities thereby. Over and besides that which Thucydides reporteth of the Corinthians, how they gave out of themselves and not unfully, that it belonged unto them, and meet men they were to reprove others; the same ought they to have in them that will take upon them to be correctours of other persons. For like as Lyander answered to a certeine Megarian who put himselfe forward in an assemblie of associates and allies to speake frankly for the libertie of Greece: These words of yours (my friend) would be seeme to have beene spoken by some puissant State or citie; even so it may be said to every one that will seeme freely to reprehend another, that he had need himselfe to be in 40 maners wel reformed. And this most truly ought to be inferred upon all those that will seeme to chastice and correct others, namely, to be wiser and of better government than the rest: for thus Plato protested that he reformed Speusippus by example of his owne life: and Xenocrates likewise casting but his eie upon Polemon, who was come into his schoole like a Russian, by his very looke onely reclaimed him from his loose life: whereas on the contrary side, if a light and lewd person, one that is full of bad conditions himselfe, would seeme to finde fault with others and be busie with his tongue, he must be sure alwaies to heare this on both sides of his eares,

Himselfe all full of sores impure

Will others seeme to heale and cure.

Howbeit, forasmuch as oftentimes the case standeth so, that by occasion of some affaires we be 50 driven to chastice those with whom we converse, when we our selves are culpable and no better than they: the most cleanly & least offensive way to do it, is this, To acknowledge in some sort that we be likewise faulty and to include and comprehend our owne persons together with them: after which maner is that reproofe in Homer,

Sir Diomedes what aileth us?

how is it come about?

That we should thus forget to fight,

who

who earst were thought so stout?

Also in another place:

And now we all unworthy are

With Hector onely to compare.

Thus Socrates mildly and gently would seeme to reprove yong men, making semblance as if himselfe were not void of ignorance, but had need also to be instructed in vertue, and professing that he had need with them to search for the knowledge of truth: for such commonly do win love and credit, yea and sooner shall be beleaved, who are thought subject to the same faults, and seeme willing to correct their friends like as they do their owne selves; whereas he 10 who spreadeth and displaith his owne wings, in clapping other mens, justifying himselfe as if he were pure, sincere, faultlesse, and without all affections and infirmities, unlesse he be much elder than we, or in regard of some notable and approved vertue in farre higher place of authority and in greater reputation than our selves, he shall gaine no profit nor do any good, but be reputed a bulke body and troublesome person. And therefore it was not without just cause that good Phanix in speaking to Achilles alleged his owne misfortunes, and namely how in a fit of choler he had like one day to have killed his owne father, but that sodeinly he bethought himselfe and changed his minde,

Least that among the Greekes I should be nam'd

A patricide and ever after sham'd:

20 which he did no doubt to this end, because he would not seeme in chiding him to arrogate this praise unto himselfe, that he was not subject to anger, nor had ever done amiss by occasion of that infirmity and passion. Certes such admonitions as these enter and pierce more effectually into the heart, for that they are thought to proceed from a tender compassion; and more willing are we to yeeld unto such as seeme to have suffered the like, than to those that despise and contemne us. But forasmuch as neither the eie when it is inflamed can abide any cleere and shining light, nor a passionate minde endure franke speech, or a plaine and bare reprehension, one of the best and most profitable helps in this case, is to intermingle therewith a little praise, as we read thus in Homer,

Now (sure) me thinks you do not well,

thus for to leave the field,

Who all are knownen for doughty knights,

and best with speare and shield.

A coward if I saw to flee,

him would I not reprove:

But such as you, thus for to shrinke,

my heart doth greatly movee.

Likewise,

O Pandar, where is now thy bowe,

where are shine arrows flight:

40 Where is that honour, in which none
with thee dare strive in fight?

And verily such oblique reprehensions also as these, are most effectuell and woonderfull in reclaiming those that be ready to run on end, and fall to some grosse enormities: as for example,

What is become of wise Oedipus,

In riddles areeading who was so famous.

Also,

And Hercules, who hath endur'd such paine,

Speakes he these words, so foolishly and so vaine?

For this kinde of dealing doth not onely a swage and mitigate the roughnesse and commanding power that is in a reprehension and rebuke, but also breedeth in the partie in such sort reprov'd, a certeine emulation of himselfe, causing him to be abashed and ashamed for any follies and dishonest pranks, when he remembreth and calleth to minde his other good parts and commendable acts, which by this meanes he setteth before his eies, as examples, and so taketh himselfe for a paterne and president of better things: But when we make comparison betweene him and others, to wit, his equals in age, his fellow-citizens, or kinsfolks; then his vice, which in the owne nature is stubburne and opinionative enough, becometh by that meanes more froward and exasperate, and often times he will not sticke in a fume and chafe to fling away away, and grumble in this wife, Why goe you not then to those that are so much better than I? why can you not let me alone, but thus trouble me as you do? And therefore we must take heed especially, that whiles we purpose to tel one plainly of his faults, we do not praise others, unless liaply they be his parents: as Agamemnon did unto Diomedes,

Unlike himselfe, and much grown out of kinde.*

And Ulysses in the Tragedie entituled Seyrij,

*You sir, whose father was a knight,
The best that ever drew*

*A sword, of all the Greeks, in field,
and many a captaine slew,*

*Sit you heere carding like a wench,
and spinning wooll on rocks,*

*Thereby the glorious light to quench
of your most noble stocke?*

But most unfcemely it were and undecent of all other, if when one is admonished by his friend, he should fall to admonish him againe; and being tolde freely of his fault, serve him the like, and quit him with as much: for this is the next way to kindle coales, and to make variance and discord; and in one word verily, such a rejecting & spurning againe as this, may seeme in effect to bewray not a reciprocall libertie of rendering one for another, but rather a peevish minde that 20 can abide no maner of reproofe. Better therefore it is, to endure patiently for the time, a friend that telleth us plainly of our faults; and if himselfe afterwards chance to offend and have need of the like reprehension, this after a fort giveth free libertie unto him that was rebuked afore, to use the same libertie of speech againe unto the other: For calling to minde by this occasion, without any remembrance of old grudge and former injurie, that himselfe also was wont not to neglect his friends when they did amisse and forgot themselves, but tooke paines to reprove, redresse, and teach them how to amend, he will the sooner yeeld a fault, and receive that chastisement and correction, which he shall perceive to be a retribution of like love and kinnesse, and not a requital of complaint and anger. Moreover, like as Thucydides saith, That the man is wife and well advised, who incurth the envie of men for matters of greatest weight and impor- 30 tance; even so we say: That if a friend will adventure the danger and heavy load and ill will for blaming his friends, hee must make choise of such matters as be of great moment and much consequence: for if he will take exceptions at every trifle and little thing indifferent; if he will seeme evermore to be finding fault, and cary himselfe not like a kind and affectionate friend, but a precise, severe and imperious schoole-master, to spie all faults, and correct every point and tittle; certes he shall finde afterwards, that his admonitions even for the greatest offences, shall not be regarded, nor any whit effectuall: for that he hath used already to no purpose, his franke reprehension (the soveraigne remedie for grosse and maine faults) in many others that are but slight, and not woorthy reproofe: much like unto a Physician, who hath employed and spent a medicine that is strong and bitter, howbeit, necessary and costly, in small infirmities, and of no 40 reckoning to speake of. A friend therefore is to looke unto this; That it be not an ordinary matter with him to be alwaies quarrellsome, and desirous to finde one fault or other. And if peradventure he meet with such a companion as is apt to search narrowly into all light matters, to cavill and wrangle for every thing, and ready to raise calumnies like a petty Sycophant for toies and trifles, he may take the better advantage and occasion thereby for to reprove him againe, in case he chance to faile in greater and more grosse faults.

Philotimus the Physician answered pretily unto one, who having an impostume grown to suppuration about his liver, shewed unto him a finger that was sore, and troubled with some blister or whitflaw, and desired his counsell for the same: My good friend (quoth he) the disease that you are to looke unto, is not a whitflaw nor about your naile roote; even so, there may be 50 occasion and opportunitie offered unto a friend, to say unto one that ever and anon is finding fault, and reprooving small errors not woorth the noting, to wit, sports and pastimes, feasting and merrie meeting, or such like trifling trickes of youth: Good sir, let us finde the means rather, that this man whom you thus blame, may cast off the harlot that he keeps, or give over his dice playing; for otherwise, he is a man of excellent and woonderfull good parts. For he that perceiveth how he is tolerated or winked at, yea and pardoned in small matters, will not be unwilling, that a friend should use his libertie in reprooving his greater vices: whereas he that is evermore evermore urgent upon one, pressing and lying hard unto him; alwaies bitter and unpleasant, prying and looking into everie corner, and taking knowledge of all things: such an one (I say) there is neither childe nor brother will endure; nay, he is intolerable to his verie servants: But like as Euripides saith,

*All is not naught that old age brings,
We may in it finde some good things.*

No more is the folly of friends so bad but that we may picke some goodnes out of them: we ought therefore to observe diligently, not onely when they do amisse, but also when they doe well: and verily at the first to be willing and most readie to praise: but afterwards we must doe as the Smithes who temper yron: For when they have given it a fire, and made it by that means soft, loofe and pliable, they drench and dip it in cold water, whereby it becommeth compact and hard, taking thereby the due temperature of stiffe Steele; even so, when we perceive that our friends be well heat and relaxed (as it were) by hearing themselves praised by us, then we may come upon them by little and little with a tincture (as I may so say) of reproofe, and telling them of their faults. Then will it be a fit time to speake unto a friend thus: How say you, are these pranks woorthie to be compared with those parts? See you not the fruits that come of vertue? Loe what we your friends require of you: these are the duties and offices which are becoming your person: for these hath nature made and framed you. As for those lewd causes, sic upon them,

*Send such away, confine them farre,
unto the mountaine wild,
Or into roaring sea from land
let them be quite exil'd.*

For like as an honest minded and discreet Physitian, will choofe rather to cure the maladie of his patient by rest and sleepe, or by good nutriture & diet, than by Cassorium or Scammanium: even so, a kinde & courteous friend, a good father and gentle schoolemaster, taketh pleasure and joy- 10 eth more to use praises than reproofes, in the reformation of manners. For there is nothing that maketh the man, who boldly findeth fault with his friends to bee so little offensive unto them, or to do more good and cure them better, than to be voide of anger, and to seeme after a 30 milde sort in all love and affectionate good will to addresse himselfe unto them, when they doe amisse. And therefore neither ought he to urge them overmuch, and seeme too eagerly to convince them if they denie the thing, ne yet to debarre them of libertie to make their answer and cleere themselves: but rather to helpe them out, and after a sort to minister unto them some honest and colourable pretences, to excuse and justifie their facts: and when a man seeth them do amisse by reason of some woofe cause indeed, to lay the fault upon another occasion that is more tolerable: As Hector when he said unto Paris,

*Unhappy man, alas, you do not well
To beare in brest a heart so fell.*

As if his brothers retire out of battell and refusall to combat with Menelaw, had not beene a 40 meere flight and running away, but verie anger and a curst stomake. Likewise Nestor unto Agamemnon,

*But you gave place unto your haughty mind;
And seeds those fits which come to you by kind.*

For in mine advice a more milde reprehension is this than to have said: This was injuriously done of you, or this was a shamefull and vilanous part of yours; As also to say unto one, You could not tel what you did; you thought not of it; or you were altogether ignorant what would come thereof, is better and more civill, than bluntly to charge him and say: This was a meere wrong, and a wicked act of yours. Also thus, Do not contest and quarrell in this wife with your brother, is lesse offensive than to say: Deale not thus enviously and spitefully against your bro- 50 ther: Likewise it were a more gentle manner of reproofe to say unto a man: Avoid this woman that spoileth and abuseth you; than thus: Give over this woman, spoile and abuse her no more. Thus you see what means are to be used in this libertie of speech, when a friend would cure a maladie.

But for to prevent the same, there would be practised a cleane contrarie course: for when it behooveth to avert and turne our friends from committing a fault, whereto they are prone and inclined; or to withstand some violent and disorderly passion, which carrieth them a cleane contrarie way; or when we are desirous to incite and stirre them forward unto good things, be- 115

ing of themselves slow and backward: when, I say, we would give an edge unto them, who are otherwise dull, and heat them being cold, we ought to transerre the thing or act in hand to some absurd causes, and those that be unseemely and undecent. Thus Ulysses pricked on Achilles in a certaine Tragedie of Sophocles, when he said thus unto him: It is not for a supper Achilles that you are so angry, but

*For that you have already scene
The wals of Troy, your fearfull teene.*

And when upon these words Achilles tooke greater indignation, and chafed more and more, saying, that he would not faile forward but be gone backe againe, he came upon him a second time with this rejoynder:

*I wote well why you gladly would depart:
Tis not because at checks or taunts you chafe,
But Hector is not far: he kills your hart;
For dread of him to stay it is not safe.*

By this means when we fear a valiant and hardy man with the opinion of cowardise; an honest, chaste and civill person, with the note of being reputed loose & incontinent; also a liberall and sumptuous Magnifico, with the feare to be accounted a niggard or a mechanall micher; we do mightily incite them to wel doing, and chafe them from bad waies. And like as when a thing is done and past, and where there is no remedie, there should be borne a modest and temperate hand, in such sort that in our libertie of speech we seeme to shew more commiseration, pittie and fellow-griefe of minde for the fault of a friend, than eager reprehension; so contrariwise where it stands upon this point that he should not fault, where (I say) our drift is to fight against the motion of his passions, there we ought to be vehement, inexorable and never to give over nor yeeld one jot unto them. And this is the very time when we are to shew that love of ours and good will which is constant, settled, and sure, and to use our true libertie of speech to the full. For to reprove faults already committed, we see it is an ordinary thing among arrant enemies. To which purpose said Diogenes very well; That a man who would be an honest man ought to have either very good friends, or most shrewd and bitter enemies: for as they do teach and instruct; so these are ready to finde fault and reprove. Now far better it is for one to abstaine from evil doing, in beleiving and following the found counsell of his friends, than to repent afterwards of ill doing, when he seeth himselfe blamed and accused by his enemies. And therefore if it were for nothing els but this, great discretion and circumspection would be used in making remonstrances & speaking freely unto friends: and so much the rather, by how much it is the greater and stronger remedie that friendship can use, and hath more need to be used in time and place convenient, and more wisely to be tempered with a meane and mediocrity. Now forasmuch as I have said sundry times already, that all reprehensions whatsoever are dolorous unto him that receiveth them; we ought in this case to imitate good Physicians and Chirurgeons: for when they have made incision or cut any member, they leave not the place in paine and torment still, but use certaine fomentations and lenitive infusions to mitigate the anguish: No more do they that after a civill maner have chid or rebuked, run away presently so soone as they have bitten and pricked the partie, but by changing their maner of speech, entertaine their friends thus galled and wounded, with other more mild and pleasant discourses; to aswage their griefe and refresh their hart againe that is cast downe and discomforted: and I may well compare them to these cutters and carvers of images, who after they have rough hewen and scabbled over certaine peeces of stone for to make their statues of, do polish and smoothe them faire, yea and give them a lightsome lustre. But if a man be stung and nipped once, or touched to the quicke by some oburgatorie reprehension, and so left rough, uneven, disquieted, swelling and puffing for anger, he is ever after hardly quieted or reclaimed, and no consolation will serve the turne to appease and comfort him againe. And therefore they who reprove

& admonish their friends, ought to observe this rule above all others; Not to forsake them immediately when they have so done, nor to breake off their conference sodainly, or to conclude their speech with any word that might greeve and provoke them.

A TREATISE IN MANER of a Dialogue.

The persons that be the Speakers:
SYLLA and FUNDANUS.

The Summarie of the Dialogue.

After we are taught how to discerne a flatterer from a friend, it seemeth that this Treatise, as touching Mildnesse and how we ought to bridle Anger, was set beere in his proper place. For like as we may soone erre grossly in choise of those whom we are willing and well content to have about us, and in that respect are to be circumspect, and to stand upon our guard; so we have no lesse cause to consider how we should converse among our neighbours. Now of all those vices and imperfections which defame mans life, and cause the race & course thereof to be difficult & wondrous painfull to passe, anger is one of those which are to be ranged in the first ranke; in such sort, that it booteeth not to be provided of good friends, if this furious humor get the mastery over us: like as contrariwise flatterers & such other pestilent plagues have not so easie entrance into us, nor such ready means to be possessed of us, so long as we be accompanied with a certaine wise and prudent mildnesse. In this discourse then, our author doing the part of an expert Physician, labourerth to purge our mindes from all choler, and would traine them to modestie and humanitie, so farre forth as Philosophie morall is able to performe. And for to attaine unto so great a benefit, he sheweth in the first place, that we ought to procure our friends for to observe and marke our imperfections, that by long continuance of time we may accustom our selves to holde in our judgements by the bit of reason. After certaine proper similitudes serving for this purpose, and a description of the inconveniences and harmes that come by wrath, he proveth, that it is an easie matter to restraine and repress the same: to which purpose he setteth downe divers means, upon which he discourseth after his usual manner, that is to say, with reasons and inductions, enriched with notable similitudes and examples: afterwards, having spoken of the time and maner of chastising and correcting those who are under our power and governance, he propoeth aswell certaine remedies to cure choler, as preventives to keepe us from relapse into it againe: Which done, he representeth lively, as in a painted table, to the end that those who suffer themselves to be surprised therewith, may be ashamed and ashamed of their unhappy state: and therewith he giveth five notable advertisementes for to attaine thereto, which be as were preventives: by means whereof we should not feeble our selves attaine anymore with this maladie.

OF MEEKENES, OR HOW A man should refraine choler.

A TREATISE IN MANNER of a Dialogue.

SYLLA.

T seemeth unto me (ô Fundanus) that painters doe verie well and wisely, to view and consider their workes often and by times betwene, before they thinke them finished and let them go out of their hands: for that by setting them so out of their sight, and then afterwards having recourse thither againe to judge thereof, they make their eies (as it were) new judges, to spie and discern the least fault that is, which continuall looking thereupon, and the ordinarie view of one and the same thing doth cover and hide from them. But forasmuch as it is not possible that a man should depart from himselfe for a time, and after a certaine space returne againe; nor that he should breake, interrupt and discontinue his understanding and sense within (which is the cause that each man is a worse judge of himselfe than of others.) A second meanes and remedie therefore in this case would be used: namely, to review his friends sundrie times, and effectuously likewise to yeld himselfe to be seene and beheld by them; not so much to know thereby whether he aged apace and growe soone old; or whether the constitution of his bodie be better or worse than it was before, as to survey and consider his manners and behaviour, to wit, whether time hath added any good thing, or taken away ought that is bad and naught. For mine owne part, this being now the second yeere since I came first to this citie of Rome, and the fifth month of mine acquaintance with you, I thinke it no great wonder, that considering your towardsnes and the dexteritie of your nature, those good parts which were already in you, have gotten so great an addition and be so much increased, as they are: but when I see how that vehement inclination, and ardent motion of yours to anger, whereunto by nature you were given, is by the guidance of reason become so milde, so gentle and tractable, it cometh into my minde to say thereunto, that which I read in Homer,

*O what a woonderous change is here?
Much milder are you than you were.*

And verily this gentleness and meekenes of yours is not turned into a certaine sloth, and general dissolution of your vigour: but like as a peece of ground well tilled, lieth light and even, and besides more hollow than before, which maketh much for the fertilitie thereof; even so, your nature hath gotten in stead of that violent disposition and sudden propension unto choler, a certaine equalitie and profunditie, serving greatly to the management of affaires, whereby also it appeareth plainly that it is not long of the decaying strength of the bodie, by reason of declining age; neither yet of the owne accord, that your hastinesse and cholerick passion is thus faded, but rather by meanes of good reasons and instructions well cured. And yet verily (for unto you I will be bold to say the truth) at the first I suspected and could not well beleve Eros our familiar friend, when he made this report of you unto me; as doubting that he was readie to give this testimonie of you in regard of affection and good will, bearing me in hand of those things which were not indeed in you, but ought to be in good and honest men: and yet (as you know well ynough) he is not such a man, as for favour of any person, and for to please, can be easily perswaded and brought to say otherwise than he thinketh. But now as he is freed and acquit from the crime of bearing false witness: so you (since this journey and travell upon the way affordeth you good leisure) will (I doubt not) at my request, declare and recount unto us the order how you did this cure upon your selfe; and namely what medicines and remedies you used, to make that cholerick nature of yours, so gentle, so tractable, so soft and supple, so obedient (I say) and subject wholly to the rule of reason?

FUNDANUS.

But why do you not your selfe (ô Sylla) my dearest and most affectionate friend, take heed, that that for the amitie and good will which you beare unto me, you be not deceived and see one thing in me for another? As for Eros, who for his owne part hath not alwaies his anger stedfastly staid with the cable and anchor of Homer's Peisa (that is, obedient and abiding firme in one place) but otherwhiles much mooved and out of quiet, for the hatred that he hath of vice and vicious men it may verie well be, and like it is that unto him I seeme more milde and gentle than before: like as we see in changing and altering the notes of prick-song, or the Gam-ut in musicke, certaine Netae or notes which are the base in one S, being compared which other Netae more low and base, become Hypatae, that is, the Trebles.

SYLLA.

It is neither so nor so (ô Fundanus) but of all loves, do as I desire you, for my sake.

FUNDANUS.

Since it is so (Sylla) among many good advertisements of Majonius which come to my minde, this is one; That whosoever would live safe and in health, ought all their life time to looke to themselves, and be as it were in continuall Physicke. For I am not of this minde, neither doe I thinke it convenient that like as Elleborus, after it hath done the deed within a sick mans bodie and wrought a cure, is cast up againe together with the maladie; so reason also should be sent out after the passion which it hath cured, but it ought to remaine still in the mind for to keepe and preserve the judgement. For why? reason is not to be compared with medicines and purgative drugs, but rather to wholesome and nourishing meates, engendring mildly in the minds of them unto whom it is made familiar, a good complexion and fast habit together with some perfect health: whereas admonitions and corrections applied or ministred unto passions when they swell and rage, and bee in the height of their heat and inflammation, hardly and with much adoe worke any effect at all, and if they doe, it is with much paine. Neither differ they in operation from those strong odors which well may raise out of a fit those who are fallen and be subject to the Epilepsy or falling sickness; but they cure not the disease, nor secure the patient for falling againe: True it is that all other passions of the minde, if they be taken in hand at the very point and instant when they are in their highest furie, do yeld in some sort, and they admit reason comming from without into the minde for to helpe and succour, but anger not only, as Melancthus saith,

*Commits lewd parts, and reason doth displace
Out of her seat, and proper resting place.*

but also turneth her cleane out of house & home, shutteth and locketh her out of doores for all together; nay it fareth for all the world like to those who let the house on fire over their owne heads, and turne themselves and it together: it filleth all within full of trouble, smoke, and confused noises, in such sort that it hath neither eie to see, nor care to listen unto those that would, & might assist and give aide: and therefore sooner will a ship abandoned of her master in the mids of the sea, and there hulling dangerously in a storme and tempest receive a pilot from some other ship without; than a man tossed with the waves of furie and anger, admit the reason and remonstrance of a stranger; unlesse his owne reason at home were before-hand well prepared:

But like as they who looke for no other but to have their citie besieged, gather together and lay up safe their owne store and provision, and all things that might serve their turne, not knowing nor expecting any aide or reliefe abroad during the siege; even so ought we to have our remedies ready and provided long before, and the same gathered out of all parts of Philosophie and conveyed into the minde for to withstand the rage of choler: as being assured of this, that when neede and necessitie requireth to use them, wee shall not easily admit the same, and suffer them to have entrance into us. For surely at such a time of extremitie, the soule heareth not a word that is said unto it without, for the trouble and confusion within, unlesse her owne reason be assistant ready both to receive and understand quickly every commandement and precept, and also to prompt the same accordingly unto her. And say that she doth heare: looke what is said unto her after a milde, calme, and gentle maner, that she despiseth; againe, if any be more instant, and do urge her somewhat roughly, with those she is displeased, and the worse for their admonitions: for wrath being of the owne nature proud, audacious, unruly, and hardly suffering it selfe to be handled or stirred by another, much like unto a tyrant attended with a strong guard about his person, ought to have something of the owne which is domestically, familiar, and (as it were) in-bred together with it, for to overthrow and dissolve the same. Nowe the continuall custome of anger and the ordinary or often falling into a chafe, breedeth in the minde an ill habit called wrathfulness, which in the end groweth to this passe, that it maketh a man cholericke and hasty, apt to be mooved at every thing; and besides, it engendreth a bitter humor of revenge, and a tellnesse implacable, or hardly to be appeased; namely, when the mind is exulcerate once, taking offence at every small occasion, quarreling and complaining for toies and trifles, much like unto a thin or a fine edge that entrencheth with the least force that the graver putteth it to. But the judgement of reason opposing it selfe straightwaies against such motions and fits of choler, and readie to suppress & keepe them downe, is not onely a remedie for the present mischief, but also for the time to come doeth strengthen and fortifie the mind, causing it to be more firme and strong to resist such passions when they arise. And now to give some instance of my selfe: The same hapned unto me after I had twice or thrice made head against choler, as befell sometimes to the Thebanes; who having ones repelled and put to flight the Lacedæmonians (warriors thought in those daies invincible) were never in any one battell afterward defeated by them. For from that time forward I tooke heart and courage, as seeing full well, that conquered it might be with the discourse of reason. I perceived moreover, that anger would not onely be quenched with cold water powred and cast upon it, as Aristotle hath reported unto us, but also that it would go out and be extinguished, were it never so light a fire before, by presenting neere unto it some object of feare: nay (I assure you) by a sudden joy comming upon it unlooked for, in many a man, according as Homer saith, choler hath melted, dissolved & evaporated away. And therefore this resolution I made, that anger was a passion not incurable, if men were willing to be cured: for surely the occasions and beginnings thereof are not alwaies great and forcible; but we see that a jest, a scoffe, some sport, some laughter, a winke of the eye, or nod of the head, and such small matters, hath set many in a pelting chafe: even as Lady Helena saying no more but thus unto her niece or brothers daughter at their first meeting,

Electra virgin, long time since I you saw &c.

drave her in such a fit of choler, that therewith she was provoked to breake off her speech with this answer,

*Wife now at last, though all too late,
you are I may well say,
Who whilom left your husbands house,
and ran with flame away.*

Likewise Cathartes mightily offended Alexander with one word, who when a great boile of wine went round about the table, refused it as it came to his turne, saying: I will not (I trow) drinke so to your health Alexander, that I shall have need thereby of Asclepius (i. a Physician.) A fire that newly hath caught a flame with haies or conies haire, drie leaves, hurds and light straw, (tubble and rakings, it is an easie matter to put out and quench; but if it have once taken to found fewell and such matter as hath solidity, substance and thickeesse in it, soone it burneth and consumeth as Asclepius saith:

*By climbing up and mounting high
The stately works of Carpentrie.*

Semblably, he that will take heed unto choler at the beginning, when he seeth it once to smoke or flame out by occasion of some merry speech, flouting scoffes, and foolish words of no moment, needs not to strive much about the quenching of it: for many times if he do no more but hold his peace, or make small account or none at all of such matters, it is enough to extinguish and make it go out. For he that ministrerth not fewell to fire, putteth it out; and whoe soever feedeth not his anger at the first, and bloweth not the coales himselfe, doth coole and repress the same. And therefore Hieromus the Philosopher, although otherwise he have taught us many good lessons and instructions; yet in this point he hath not pleased and satisfied me, when he saith: That a man is not able to perceive in himselfe the breeding of anger, (so quick and sudden it is) but onely when it is bred, then it may be felt: for surely, there is no vice or passion in us, that giveth such warning, or hath either so evident a generation or so manifest an augment whiles it is stirred and mooved, as anger, according as Homer himselfe right skilfully, so and as a man of good experience, giveth us to understand, who bringeth in Achilles fore mooved to sorrow and griefe of heart, even with a word, and at the very instant, when he heard the speeches of Agamemnon: for thus reporteth the Poet of him:

*Out of the king his sovereigns mouth,
The word no sooner past,
But straight a blacke and mistie cloud
Of ire him overcast.*

But of Agamemnon himselfe, he saith, that it was long ere he was angry; namely, after he had bene kindled with many hard speeches, that were dealt to and fro, which if any third person stepping betweene, would have staied or turned away, certes their quarrell and debate had not growen to such reavnes of extremity as it did. And therefore Socrates so often as he felt himselfe somewhat declining and more mooved than he should, against any one of his friends, and avoiding as it were a rocke in the sea, before the tempest came and the billowes arose, would let fall his voice, shew a smiling countenance, and compose his looke and visage to mirth and lenitie, and thus by bending and drawing another away to that whereunto his affection enclined, and opposing himselfe to a contrary passion, he kept upright on his feet, so that he fell not, nor was overthrowen. For there is (my good friend) a ready way in the very beginning, to breake the force of choler, like as there is a way to dissolve a tyrannicall rule and dominion, that is to say, not to obey at the first, nor to give eare and be ruled by her commandement, when she shal bid thee to speake & cry out aloud, or to looke with a terrible countenance, or to knocke or beat thy selfe; but to be still and quiet, and not to re-enforce and encrease the passion, as men do exasperate a sicknesse with strugling, striving, tossing and roaring out aloud. For those things which ordinary lovers and amorous yong men practise, that is to say, to go in a wanton and merry masque, to sing and daunce at the doores of their sweet hearts and mistresses, to bedeck their windowes with coronets & floure-garlands, bring some ease and alleviation (such as it is) of their passions, and the same not altogether undecent and uncivill, according to that which we read in the Poet:

*And when I came, aloud I cried not,
And asked who she was, or daughter whose?
But kiss my love full sweetly, that I wot:
If this be mine? but mine I can not choof.*

Also that which we permit those to doe who are in sorrow, namely, to mourne, to lament and weepe for losses or mishaps; certainly with their sighs which they letch, & teares that they shed, they do lend out and discharge a good part of their griefe and anguish. But it is not so with the passion of anger: for surely, the more that they stirre and speake who are surprised therewith, the more hote it is, and the flame burneth out the rather; and therefore the best way is, for a man to be quiet, to lye and keepe him out of the way, or els to retire himselfe into some haven of fury and repose, when he perceiveth that there is a fit of anger toward, as if he felt an access of the falling evill comming. This (I say) we ought to do, for feare lest we fall downe, or rather runne and rush upon some one or other. But who be they that we run upon? Surely our very friends, for the greatest part, & those we wrong most. As for our affection of love, it standeth not to all things indifferently, neither do we hate ne yet feare we every thing alike: But what is it that ire setteth not upon? nothing is there but it doth affaile and lay hands on; we are angry with our enemies; we chafe with our friends; with children, with parents are we wrath; nay, the very gods themselves we forbear not in our cholericke mood; we flie upon dumbe and brute beasts; we spare not so much as our utensile vessels and implements which have neither sense nor life at all, if they stand in our way, we fare like Thamyris the Musician,

*Who brake his cornet, finely bound
And tipt with golde: his late he bent,
Well strung and swifd to pleasant sound,
And it anon to fitters rent.*

Thus did Pandarus also, who cursed, and betooke himselfe to all the fiends in hell, if he did not burst his bowe and arrowes with his owne hands, and throw them into the fire when he had so done. As for Xerxes, he stucke not to whip, to lash and scourge the sea, and to the mountaine Athos he sent his minatorie letters in this forme: Thou wretched and wicked Athos, that bearest up thy head aloft into the skie; see thou bring forth no great craggie stones, I advise thee, for my works, and such as be hard to be cut and wrought: otherwise, if thou doe, I shall cut thee through and tumble thee into the maine sea. Many fearefull and terrible things there be that are done in anger, and as many for them againe, as foolish and ridiculous, and therefore of all passions that trouble the minde, it is both hated and despised most. In which regards expedient it were, to consider diligently awell of the one as the other: for mine owne part, whether I did well or ill, I know not; but surely, when I began my cure of choler in my selfe, I did as in olde time the Lacedæmonians were wont to do by their Ilotes, men of base and servile condition: For as they taught their children what a foule vice drunkennesse was, by their example when they were drunke, so I learned by observing others, what anger was, and what beastly effects it wrought. First and formost therefore, like as that maladie according to Hippocrates, is of all others, woofst and most dangerous, wherein the visage of the sicke person is most disfigured and made unlike it selfe; so, I seeing those that were possessed of choler, and (as it were) beside themselves thereby, how their face was changed, their colour, their countenance, their gate and their voice quite altered, I imagined thereupon unto my selfe a certaine forme and image of this maladie, as being mightily displeased in my minde, if haply at any time I should be seene of my friends, my wife and the little girles my daughters, so terrible and so farre mooved and transported beside my selfe: not onely fearefull and hideous to beholde, and farre otherwise than I was wont, but also unpleasant to be heard; my voice being rough, rude and churlish: like as it was my hap to see some of my familiar friends in that case, who by reason of anger could not reiteine and keepe their ordinary fashions and behavior, their force of visage, nor their grace in speech, ne yet that affability and pleasantnesse in company and talke as they were wont.

This was the reason that Caim Gracchus the Oratour, a man by nature blunt, rude in behavior, and withall over-earnest and violent in his manner of pleading, had a little flute or pipe made for the nonce, such as Musicians are wont to guide and rule the voice gently by little and little up and downe, betwene base to treble, according to everie note as they would themselves, teaching their scholars thereby to have a tunable voice. Now when Gracchus pleaded at the barre at any time, he had one of his servants standing with such a pipe behinde him: who observing when his master was a little out of tune, would sound a more mild and pleasant note unto him, whereby he reclaimed and called him backe from that loude exclaiming, and so taking downe that rough and swelling accent of his voice,

*Like as the Neat-heards pipes so will made of the marrish reeds so light;
The joints whereof with waxe they fill,
resound a tune for their delight:
Which while the heard in field they keepe,
Brings them at length to pleasant sleepe.*

dulced and allayed the cholericke passion of the orator. Certes my selfe, if I had a pretie page to attend upon me, who were diligent, necessarie and handsome about me, would not be offended but verie well content, that when he saw me angrie he should by and by present a mirror or looking glasse unto me, such a one as they use to bring and shew unto some that newly are come out of the baine, although no good or profit at all they have thereby. But certainly for man to see himselfe at such a time, how disquieted he is, how farre out of the way and beside the course of nature, it were no small meanes to checke this passion, and to set him in hatred therewith for ever after. They who are delighted in tales and fables, doe report by way of merrie speech and pastime, that once when Minerva was a piping, there came a Satyre and admonished her, that it was not for her to play upon a flute; but she for the time tooke no heed to that advertisement of his, notwithstanding he spake thus unto her:

*This forme of face becomes you not,
lay up your pipes, take armes in hand:
But first this would not be forgot,
your cheekes to lay that puff now stand.*

But afterwards when she had seene her face in a certaine river, what a paire of cheekes she had gotten with her piping, she was displeased with her selfe and flung away her pipes: And yet this art and skill of playing well upon the pipe, yeeldeth some comfort and maketh amends for the deformitie of a disfigured visage, with the melodious tune and harmonie that it affoordeth; yea and afterwards, Marsyas the Minstrell (as it is thought) devised first with a certaine hood and muzzle fastened round about the mouth, as well to restraine and keepe downe the violence of the blast enclosed thus by force, as also to correct and hide the deformitie and undecent inequality of the visages;

*With glittering gold both cheekes as farre
as temples he did binde:
The tender mouth with his bones likewise, fast knit the necke behind.*

But anger contrariwise, as it doth puffe up and stretch out the visage after an unseemely manner, so much more it sendeth out undecent and unpleasant voice,

And

*And stirrs the strings at secret note of heart
Which touched should not be hurt by a part.*

The sea verily, when being troubled and disquieted with blustering winds, it casteth up mofse, reits, and such like weeds (they say) it is cleansed and purged thereby: but the dissolute, bitter, scurrile, and foolish speeches, which anger sendeth out of the minde when it is turned upside downe, first pollute and defile the speakers themselves, and fill them full of infamy, for that they be thought to have their hearts full of such ordure and filthinesse at all times; but the same lurketh there, untill that choler discovereth it: And therefore, they pay most dearly for their speech, the lightest matter of all others (as Plato saith) in that they suffer this heave and grievous punishment, to be held and reputed for malicious enemies, cursed speakers, and ill conditioned persons. Which I seeing and observing well enough, it falleth out that I reason with my selfe, & alwaies call to mind, what a good thing it is in a fever, but much better in a fit of choler to have a tongue faire, even and smooth: For in them that be sicke of an ague, if the tongue be not such as naturally it ought to be, an ill signe it is, but not a cause of any harme or indisposition within. Howbeit, if their tongues who are angry, be once rough, foule, and running dissolutely at random to absurd speeches, it casteth forth outrageous and contumelious language, the verie mother and work-mistresse of irreconcilable enmitie, and bewraeth an hidden and secret maliciousnesse. As for wine, if a man drinke it, of it selfe undelayed with water, it putteth forth no such wantonnesse, no disordinate and lewd speeches, like to those that proceed of ire. For drunken talke serveth to make mirth, and to procure laughter rather than any thing else: but words of choler are tempered with bitter gall and rankor. Moreover, he that sitteth silent at the table when others drinke merrily, is odious unto the companie and a trouble: whereas in choler there is nothing more decent and becoming gravitie, than to be quiet and say nothing: according as Sappho doth admonish,

*When furious choler once is up,
disperst and spread in brest,
To keepe the tongue then apt to barke,
and let it lie at rest.*

The consideration of these things collected thus together, serveth not onely to take heede alwaies unto them that are subject to yre and therewith possessed, but also besides to know thoroughly the nature of anger: how it is neither generous or manfull, nor yet hath anie thing in it that favoereth of wisdom and magnanimitie. Howbeit the common people interpret the turbulent nature thereof to be active and meet for action: the threats and menaces thereof, hardinesse and confidence, the peevish and froward unrulinesse to be fortitude and strength. Nay some there be who would have the crueltie in it, to be a disposition and dexterity to achieve great matters; the implacable malice thereof to be constancie and firme resolution: the morositie and difficultie to be pleased; to be the hatred of sinne and vice; howbeit herein they do not well but are much deceived, for surely the very actions, motions, gestures, and countenance of cholerike persons do argue and bewray much basenesse and imbecillitie: which we may perceive not onely in these brain-sicke fits that they fall upon little children, and them pluck, twitch, and misuse; lie upon poore seely women, and thinke that they ought to punish and beat their horses, hounds and mules, like unto Cressphon that famous wrestler and professed champion, who sticke not to spurne and kicke his mule; but also in their tyrannicall and bloodly murders, wherein their crueltie and bitterness which declareth their pusillanimity & base minds; their actions which shew their passions & their doing to others, bewraying a suffering in themselves, may be compared to the stings and bitings of those venomous serpents which be very angrie, exceeding dolorous and burne most themselves when they do inflict the greatest inflammation upon the patients, and put them to most paine: For like as swelling is a symptome or accident following upon a great wound or hurt in the flesh: even so it is in the tenderest and softest minds, the more they give place and yeeld unto dolor and passion, the more plentie of choler and anger they utter forth as proceeding from the greater weaknes. By this you may see the reason why women ordinarily be more waspish, curst and shrewd than men; sicke folke more restlesse than those that are in health; old people more waiward and froward than those that be in the floure and vigor of their yeeres; and finally such as be in adversity and upon whom fortune stowneth, more prone to anger than those who prosper and have the world smiling upon them. The covetous mizer and pinching peni-father is alwaies most angrie with his steward: that laith forth his monie; the glutton is ever more displeased with hiscooke and cater; the jealous husband quickly falleth out and brawleth with his wife; the vaine glorious foole is soonest offended with them that speake any thing amisse of him; but the most bitter and intollerable of all others; are ambitious persons in a citie, who lay for high places and dignities, such also as are the heads of a faction in a sedition; which is a trouble and mischiefe (as Pindarus saith) conspicuous and honorable. Loe, how from that part of the mind which is wounded, greeved, suffreth most and especially upon infirmite and weaknesse, ariseth anger, which passion remembereth not (as one would have it) the finewes of the foule, but is like rather to their stretching preines and spasmatick convulsions, when it streineth and striveth overmuch in following revenge.

Well, the examples of evil things yeeld no pleasant sight at all, onely they be necessary and profitable, and for mine owne part supposing the precedents given by those who have caried themselves gently and mildly in their occasions of anger, are most delectable, not onely to behold, but also heare: I begin to contemne and despise those that say thus:

To man thou hast done wrong: be sure

At mans hand wrong for to endure.

Likewise

Downe to the ground with him, spare not his coare,

Spurne him and let thy foot upon his throat,

and other such words which serve to provoke wrath and whet choler; by which some go about to remoove anger out of the nurcery, and womens chamber into the hall where men do sit and keepe; but herein they do not well: For prowess and fortitude according in all other things with justice, and going fellow-like with her, me thinks is at strife and debate with her about meeknesse and mildnesse onely, as if the rather became her, and by right appertained unto her: For otherwhiles it hath beene knowne that the worst men have gone beyond and surmounted the better. But for a man to erect a Trophee and set up a triumphall monument in his owne foule against ire (with which as Heraculus saith the conflict is hard and dangerous: for what a man would have he bueth with his life) it is an act of rare valour and victorious puiſſance, as having in tueth the judgement of reason, for finewes, tendons, and muskles to encounter and resist passions. Which is the cause that I studie, and am desirous alwaies to reade and gather the sayings and doings, not onely of learned clearks and Philosophers; who as our Sages and wise men say, have no gall in them, but also and much rather of Kings, Princes, Tyrants, and Potentates: As for example, such as that was of Antigonus, who hearing his souldiours upon a time revile him behinde his pavilion, thinking that he heard them not, put forth his staffe from under the cloth unto them and said: A whorson knaves, could you not go a little farther off, when you meant thus to raile upon us. Likewise when one Arcadian an Argive or Achean never gave over reviling of King Philip, and abusing him in most reprochfull tearmes, yea and to give him warning

So far so fite, unwill be thither come

Where no man knew nor heard of Philips name.

And afterwards the man was seene (I know not how) in Macedonia; the friends and courtiers of king Philip were in hand with him to have him punished, and that in any wise he should not let him go and escape: Philip contrariwise having him once in his hands, spake gently unto him, used him courteously, sending unto him in his lodging gifts and presents, and so sent him away. And after a certaine time he commanded those courtiours of purpose to enquire what words he gave out of him unto the Greekes; but when everie one made report againe and testified that he was become another man, and ceased not to speake woonderfull things in the praise of him; Lo (quoth Philip) then unto them: Am not I a better Physician than all you, and can I not skill how to cure a foule tongued fellow? Another time at the great solemnitie of the Olympian games, when the Greekes abused him with verie bad language, his familiar friends about him said they deserved to be sharply chastised and punished, for so miscalling and reviling him, who had beene so good a benefactor of theirs: what would they doe and say then (quoth he) if I should deale hardly by them and doe them shrewd turnes? Semblably, notable and excellent was the carriage of Pisistratus to Thrasibulus: of king Perseus to Mutius; and of Magas to Philemon, who in a publique and frequent Theatre, had mocked and scoffed at him in this manner,

Magas, there are some letters come unto you from a king

But

But letter Magas none can reade, nor write for any thing.

Now it chanced afterwards that by a tempest at sea he was cast upon the Port-towne Paratonium, whereof Magas was governor, and so fell into his hands, who did him no other harme, but commanded one of his guard or officers about him, onely with his naked sword to touch his bare necke, and so gently to goe his waies and do no more to him: marie afterwards, he sent unto him little bones for cock-all, and a pretie ball to play withall, as if he had bene a childe that had no wit nor discretion, and so sent him home againe in peace. King Protemus upon a time getting and scoffing at a simple and unlearned Gramarian, asked him, who was the father of Peleus: I will answere you sir (quoth he) if you tell me first who was the father of Lagus: This was a drie flour and touched King Protemus very neere, in regard of the meane parentage from whence he was descended: whereat, all about the King were mightily offended, and thought it was too broad a jest and frump intollerable. But Protemus, if it be not seemely for a King to take and put up a scorne: surely as little decent it is for his person to give a scorne *

Alexander the Great was more bitter and cruell (than otherwise his ordinarie manner was to others) towards Callisthenes and Chytus. But King Perseus being taken prisoner by him in a battell, besought that he would use him royally, or like a King. And when King Alexander demanded moreover what he had more to say, and what he would have else? No more (quoth he) for under this word Royally is comprised all. And therefore I suppose it is, that the Greeks call the King of the gods, by the name of Melchius, that is to say, Milde and sweete as honie. And the Athenians named him Mumaces, which is as much as, Readie to helpe and succour: For to punish and torment, pertaineth to divels and the furious fiends of hel: there is no celestially divine, and heavenly thing in it. And like as one said of King Philip, when he had rated & destroyed the citie Olynthus: Yea marie, but he is notable to set up such another citie in the place: even so, a man may well say unto Anger; Thou canst overthrow, demolish, marre and pull downe: but to reare and erect againe, to save, to pardon, and to endure; be the properties of meeknesse, clemencie, mildnes, patience, and moderation: they be the parts (I say) of Camillus, Metellus, Aristides and Socrates: whereas to sticke close unto the flesh, to pinch, pricke and bite, are the qualities of pismires, flies and mice. Moreover and besides, when I looke unto Revenge, and the manner thereof, I finde for the most part, that if men proceede by way of choler, they misse of their purpose: for commonly all the heat & desire of revenge is spent in biting of lips, gnashing and grating of teeth, vaine running to and fro, in railing words with foolish threats and menaces among, that favour of no wit at all: By which means it fareth with them afterwards, as with little children in running of a race, who for feeblenesse being not able to hold out, fall downe before they come unto the goale, whereunto they made such ridiculous and foolish haste. And therefore in my conceit, it was not an improper answer which a certaine Rhodian made unto one of the Licitors and officers of a Romane Generall or Lord Praetor, who with wide mouth bailed at him, and made a glorious bragging and boasting. I passe not (quoth he) one whit what thou saist; I care rather for that which he thinketh there, that saith nothing. In like manner Sophocles when he had brought in Eurpylus and Neopolemus all armed, speaketh bravely in their commendation thus,

They dealt no threats in vaine, no taunts

they made, nor boasting words:

But to't they went and on their shields

they laid on load with swords.

And verily, some barbarous nations there are who use to poison their swords, & other weapons of iron; but valour hath no need at all of the venom of choler, for dipped it is in reason & judgement; whereas whatsoever is corrupted with ire and furie is brittle, rotten, and easie to be broken into pieces. Which is the reason that the Lacedaemonians doe allay the choler of their souldiours, when they are fighting with the melodious sound of flutes and pipes; whose manner is also before they goe to battell, to sacrifice unto the Muses, to the end that their reason and right wits may remaine in them still, and that they may have use thereof: yea, and when they have put their enemies to flight, they never pursue after nor follow the chafe, but reclaine and hold their furious anger within compasse, which they are able to weld and manage as they list; no lesse than these daggers or courtlances which are of a meane size and reasonable length. Contrariwise, anger hath bene the cause that many thousands have come thort of the execution of vengeance, and miscarried by the way. As for example, Cyrus and Pelopidas the Thebane among the rest. But Agathocles endured patiently to heare himselfe reproched and reviled, by those whom hee besieged: and when one of them said: You Potter there? Heare you? Where will you have silver to pay your mercenarie fouldiers and strangers their wages? Hee laughed againe and made answer; Even out of this citie when I have once forced it. Some there were also that mocked and scorned Antigonus from the verie wallis, and twitted him with his deformitie and evill favoured face. But he said no more than thus, Why! And I tooke my selfe before to have bene verie faire and well favoured. Now when he had woon the towne he fold in open port-fale those that had so flouted him, protesting wishal unto them, that if from that time forward they mocked him any more, he would tell their masters of them and call them to account.

Moreover, I doe see that hunters, yea, and oratours also commit many faults in their choler. And Aristotle doth report, that the friends of Satyrus the Oratour, in one cause that he had to plead for them, stopped his eares with waxe, for feare lest that he, when he heard his adversaries to raile upon him in their pleas, should marre all in his anger. And do not (I pray you) we our selves many times misse of punishing our servants by this meanes, when they have done some faults: for when they heare us to threaten, and give out in our anger, that we will doe thus and thus unto them, they be so frightened that they runne away farre enough off from us. Like as nurses therefore, are wont to say unto their little children: Crie not, and you shall have this or that; so we shall do very wel, to speake unto our choler in this wise; Make no such haste, lofe and faile, keepe not such a crying, make not so loud a noyse, be not so eager and urgent upon the point; so shall you see every thing that you would have, sooner done and much better. And thus a father, when he seeth his child going about to cut or cleave any thing with a knife or edge tooke, taketh the tooke or knife out of his hand, and doth it himselfe; even so he that doth take revenge out of the hands of choler, punisheth not himselfe, but him that deserveth it: and thus he doth surely, putting his owne person in no danger, without damage and losse, nay, with great profit and commodity. Now, whereas all passions whatsoever of the minde had need of use and custome, to tame (as it were) and vanquish by exercise, that which in them is unruly, rebellious and disobedient to reason: certes, in no one point besides had we need to be more exercised, (I meane as touching those dealings that we have with our household servants) than in anger: for there is no envy & emulation that ariseth in us toward the, there is no feare that we need to have of them, neither any ambition that troubleth or pricketh us against them; but ordinary and continuall fits of anger we have every day with them, which breed much offence and many errors, causing us to tread awry, to slip and do amisse sundry waies, by reason of that licentious libertie unto which we give our selves, all the whiles that there is none to controll, none to stay, none to forbid and hinder us: and therefore being in so ticklish a place, and none to sustaine and holde us up, soone we catch a fall, and come downe at once. And a hard matter it is (I may say to you) when we are not bound to render an account to any one, in such a passion as this, to keepe our selves upright, and not to offend; unless we take order before-hand to restraine and empale (as it were) round about, so great a libertie with meeknesse and clemencie, unless (I say) we be well inured and acquainted to beare and endure many shrewd and unhappy words of our wives, much unkinde language of friends and familiars, who many times do challenge us for being too remisse, over-gentle, yea, and altogether carelesse and negligent in this behalfe. And this in trueth, hath bene the principall cause that I have bene quicke and sharpe unto my servants, for feare lest they might prove the woofe for not being chastised. But at the last, though late it were, I perceived; First, that better it was by long sufferance and indulgence, to make them somewhat woofe, than in seeking to reforme and amend others, to disorder and spoile my selfe with bitterness and choler: Secondly, when I saw many of them often-times, even because they were not so punished, feare and shame to do evil, and how pardon and forgiveness was the beginning of their repentance and conversion, rather than rigour and punishment; and that I assure you, they would serve some more willingly with a nod or winke of the eie, and without a word spoken, than others with all their beating and whipping: I was at last perswaded in my minde and resolved, that reason was more woorthy to command and rule as a master, than ire and wrath. For true it is not that the Poet saith:

Where ever is feare,
Shame also is there:

but cleane contrary: Looke who are bashfull and ashamed; in them there is imprinted a certaine feare that holdeth them in good order: whereas continuall beating and laying on without mercy, mercy, breedeth not repentance in servants for evil doing, but rather a kinde of forecast and providence, how they should not be spied nor taken in their evil doing. Thirdly, calling to remembrance, and considering evermore with my selfe, that he who taught us to shoot, forbade us not to draw a bowe or to shoot an arrow, but to misse the mark: no more will this be any let or hinderance, but that we may chastise and punish our servants, if we be taught to do it in time and place, with moderation and measure, profitably, and decently as it apperteineth. And verily I do enforce my selfe, and strive to master my choler and subdue it principally, not denying unto them who are to be punished, the libertie and meanes to justifie themselves, but in hearing them to speake what they can for their excuse. For as time and space doeth in the meane time finde the passion occupied another way, and withall bring a certaine delay, which doeth slacke and let downe (as it were) the vehemencie and violence thereof; so judgement of reason, all the while meeteth both with a decent maner and also with a convenient meane and measure of doing punishment accordingly. And besides, this course and maner of proceeding, leaveth him that is punished, no cause, occasion or pretence at all, to resist and strive againe, considering that he is chastised and corrected not in choler and anger, but being first convinced, that he had well deserved his correction: and (which were yet woofe than all the rest) the servant shall not have vantage to speake more justly and to better reason than his master. Well then, like as Phocion after the death of Alexander the great, having a care not to suffer the Athenians to rise over-foone, or make any insurrection before due time, ne yet to give credit rashly unto the newes of his death: My masters of Athens (quoth he) if he be dead to day, he will be dead to morrow also, and three daies hence to; even so should a man (in mine opinion) who by the impulsion and instigation of anger, maketh haste to take punishment, thus suggest and secretly say to himselfe: If this servant of mine hath made a fault to day, it will be as true to morrow, and the next day after that he hath done a fault; neither will there be any harme or danger at all come of it, if hee chauce to be punished with the latest: but beleieve me, if he be punished over-soone, it will be alwaies thought that he had wrong, and did not offend: a thing that I have knowen to happen full often. For which of us all is so curst & cruel, as to punish and scourge a servant, for burning the roast five or ten daies ago? or for that so long before he chanced to overthrow the table? or was somewhat with the slowest in making answer to his Master; or did his errand or other business not so soone as he should? and yet we see these & such like be the ordinary causes for which (whiles they be fresh and new done) we take on, we stampe and stare, we chafe, we frowne, we are implacable and will heare of no pardon: And no marvaile, for like as any bodies seeme bigger through a mist; even so every thing appeareth greater than it is, through anger. And therefore at these and such like faults, we should winke for the time, and make as though we saw them not, and yet thinke upon them neverthelesse, and beare them in minde. But afterwards when the storme is well overblowne, we are with out passion, & do not suspect our selves, then we may do well to consider thereof: and then if upon mature deliberation, when our mind is staid and our senses settled, the thing appeere to be naught, we are to hate and abhor it, and in no wise either to for-let and put of, or altogether to omit and forbear correction, like as they refuse meats who have no stomack nor appetite to eat. For certainly it is not a thing so much to be blamed, for to punish one in anger, as not to punish when anger is past and alaid, and so to be retchlesse and desolure: doing as idle mariners, who so long as the sea is calme and the weather faire, loiter within the harbor or haven, but afterwards when a tempest is up, spread sailes and put themselves into danger. For even so we, condemning and neglecting the remissenesse and calmnesse of reason in case of punishment, make haste to execute the same during the heat of choler, which no doubt is a blustering and turbulent winde. As for meat he calleth for in deed, and taketh it naturally who is a hungrie: but surely he executeth punishment best, who neither hungrerth nor thirsteth after it: neither hath he need to use choler as a sauce or deintie dish for to get him a stomack and appetite to correct: but even when he is far off from desire of revenge, then of necessity he is to make use of reason and wisdom to direct him: for we ought not to do, as Aristotle writeth in his time the maner was in Turkney; To whip servants with sound of flutes and hauboyes; namely to make a sport and pastime of punishing men, and to solace our selves with their punishment for pleasures sake, and then afterwards when we have done, repent us of it: for as the one is brutish and beastlike; so the other is as womanish and unmanly: but without griefe and pleasure both, at what time as reason and judgement is in force, we ought to let justice take punishment, and leave none occasion at all for choler to get advantage. But peradventure some one will say, that this is not properly the way way to remedie or cure anger; but rather a putting by or precaution that we should not commit any of those faults which ordinarily follow that passion: unto whom I answer thus; That the swelling of the Spleene is not the cause but a symptome or accident of a fever: howbeit if the said humour be fallen and the paine mitigated, the feaver also will be much eased, according as Hieronymus saith. Also when I consider by what meanes choler is engendred: I see that one falleth into it upon this cause, another upon that: but in all of them, it seemeth this generall opinion there is, that they thinke themselves to be despised and naught set by. And therefore we ought to meet with such as seeme to defend and mainteine themselves, as being angry for just cause, and to cure them after this maner; namely, by diverting and remooving from them, as far as ever we can, all suspition of contempt and contumacie in those that have offended them and mooved their anger; in laying the fault upon inconsiderate follie, necessitie, sickness, infirmities and miserie, as Sophocles did in these verses,

*For those my Lords whose state is in distresse,
Have not their spirits and wits as heretofore:
As fortune frownes, they waxen ever lesse,
Nay gone are quite, though fresh they were before.*

And Agamemnon, albeit he laid the taking away of Briſeu from Achilles upon Ate (that is to say) some fatal infortunacie, yet

*He willing was and prest him to consent,
And unto him rich gifts for to present.*

For to beseech and intreat, are signes of a man that despiseth not, and when the partie who hath given offence becometh humble and lowly, he remooveth all the opinion that might be conceived of contempt. But he that is in a fit of choler must not attend and waite until he see that, but rather helpe himselfe with the answer of Diogenes. These fellows here said one unto him, do deride thee Diogenes; but I (quoth he againe) do not finde that I am derided: even so ought a man who is angry not to be perswaded that he is contemned of another, but rather that himselfe hath just cause to contemne him, and to thinke that the fault committed did proceed of infirmities, error, heady rashnesse, sloth and idlenesse, a base and illiberal minde, age or youth. And as for our servants and friends we must by all meanes quit them hereof, or pardon them at leastwise: For surely they cannot be thought to contemne us, in regard that they thinke us unable to be revenged, or men of no execution if we went about it: but it is either by reason of our remissnes and mildnesse, or else of our love and affection that we seeme to be smally regarded by them, whiles our servants presume of our tractable nature, easie to be pacified, and our friends of our exceeding love that cannot be soone shaken off. But now we are provoked to anger, not only against our wives, or servants and friends, as being contemned by them; but also many times in our choler we fall upon In-keepers, Mariners and Muliters, when they be drunke, supposing that they despise us. And that which more is, we are offended with dogs when they bay or bark at us; and with asses if they chance to sting out and kicke us. Like unto him who lifted up his hand to strike and beat him that did drive an asse; and when the man cried that he was an Athenian: But thou I am sure art no Athenian (quoth he) to the asse, and laid upon the poore beast as hard as he could, and gave him many a blow with his cudgell. But that which chiefly causeth us to be angrie, and breedeth a continuall disposition thereto in our minds, causing us so often to breake out into fits of choler, which by little and little was engendred and gathered there before, is the love of our owne selves, and a kinde of froward furdinesse hardly to be pleased, together with a certaine daintinesse and delicacie, which all concurring in one, breed and bring forth a swame (as it were) of bees, or rather a waipes nest in us. And therefore there cannot be a better meanes for to carrie our selves mildly and kindly, towards our wives, our servants, familiars and friends, than a contented minde; and a singlenesse or simplicitie of heart, when a man reſteth satisfied with whatsoever is present at hand, and requireth neither things superfluous nor exquisite,

*But he that never is content
With roſt or ſod, but cooke is ſhent:
How ever he be ſerv'd, I meane
With more, with leſſe, or in a meane:
He is not pleas'd, nor one good word
Can give of viands ſet on board,
Without ſome ſnew who drinks no draughts,*

*Nor eateth bread in market bought.
Who taſtes no meate, b't never ſo good,
Serv'd up in diſh of earth or wood:
And ſhakes no bed, nor pillow ſoft,
Unleſſe with downe like ſea aloft
Sitt from beneath it ſtrut and ſwell;
For otherwiſe he ſleepes not well.*

who with rods and whips plieeth and halsteth the ſervitors at the table, making them to runne untill they ſweat againe, crying and bawling at them to come away apace, as if they were not carrying diſhes of meat, but plasters and cataplasmes for some inflammation or painfull impostume: subjecting himselfe after a slavish manner to a servile kinde of diet and life, full of discontentment, quarrels and complaints: little knoweth such an one how by a continuall cough, or many concussions & distemperatures, he hath brought his soule to an ulcerous and rheumaticke disposition about the seat and place of anger. And therefore we must use the body by frugalitie to take up and learne to be content with a competent meane (forasmuch as they who desire but a little, can never be disappointed nor frustrated of much) finding no fault, nor keeping any stir at the beginning about meat, but standing satisfied without saying a word, with that which God sendeth whatsoever it be, not fretting, vexing and tormenting our selves at the table about everie thing, and in so doing, serving both ourselves and our companie about us of friends, with the most unfavorable meſſe of meat, that is to wit, choler:

*A ſupper worſe than this I do not ſee
How poſſibly one can deſerve bee.*

Namely, whiles the servants be beaten, the wife chidden and reviled for the meat burnt, for smoke in the parlor, for want of salt, or for the bread over stale and drie. But Arceſilaus upon a time with other friends of his, feasted certaine strangers and hostis of his abroad, whose guest he had beene; and after the supper was come in, and meat set upon the boord, there wanted bread, by reason that his servants had forgotten and neglected to buy any: for such a fault as this, which of us here would not have cried out that the walles should have burst withall, and beene ready to have thrown the house out of the window? And he laughing at the matter: He had need be a wife man (quoth he) I see well, that would make a feast and set it out as it should be. Socrates also upon a time, when he came from the wrestling schoole, tooke Euthydemus home with him to supper: but Xantippe his wife ſet a chiding and scoulding with him at the boord, reviling him with most bitter rearmes, so long, until at last in an anger downe went table and all that was upon it: Whereupon Euthydemus arose, and was about to depart; but Socrates: Will you be gone (quoth he?) Why, do you not remember that the other day as we sat at supper in your house, there flew up to the boord a hen and did as much for you? and yet were not we offended nor angrie for the matter. And in verie truth, we must entertaine our friends and guests, with courtlesie, mirth, a smiling countenance, and affectionate love: and not to brow-beat them, nor yet put the servitors in a fright, and make them quake and tremble with our frowning looks. Also we ought so to accustoine our selves that we may be content to be served with any kinde of vessels whatsoever, and not upon a daintinesse to have a minde to this, rather then to that, but to like all indifferently. And yet there be some so divers, that although there be manie cups and goblets standing upon the boord, chooſe one from the rest, and cannot drinke forth out of that one: according as the Stoicks doe report of Marinus, who loved one mazar, and could drinke out of no other. Thus they doe by their oile cruets and currying combs or rubbers, when they are at the baines or stoups, taking a fancie and affection to some one above the rest: but if it chaunce, that one of them be crackt, broken, or be lost and miserie any way when they are exceeding angrie and fall to beating of their servants. Such men therefore as find themselves to be cholericke, should do well to forbeare all rare and exquisite things, to wit, pots, cups, ſeale rings of excellent workmanship and precious stones: For that such costly jewels if they be marred or lost, breed more anger and set men out of order, more than those which be ordinarie and easie to be comely. And therefore when Nero the Emperour had caused to be made a certaine pavilion or tabernacle eight square, which was both for the beautie and cost, exceeding faire and sumptuous, and indeed an admirable piece of worke. In this Tabernacle (quoth Seneca) unto him, you have bewraied Cæſar that you are but a poore man: for if you lose this once, you shall never be able to recover and get the like againe. And so it fell out indeed, for the ship, wherein the same Tabernacle was, chanced to be cast away upon on the sea, and all was drowned. But Nero calling to minde the words of Seneca, tooke the losse more patiently.

Moreover, this contentment of mind, and easinesse to be pleased with any thing in the house, causeth a man also to be more gentle, milde, and better contented with his servants and people about him: now if it worke this effect in us toward our household servants, evident it is that we shalbe likewise affected to our friends & those that be under our government. We see also, that slaves new bought, are inquisitive as touching him who hath bought them; not whether he be superstitious and envious; but whether he be cholerike and hasty or no. And to be briefe, neither can husbands endure the pudicity and honesty of their wives; nor wives the love of their husbands; ne yet friends the mutual conversation one with another, if there doe an angry and cholerike humor goe withall. Thus we see, that neither mariage nor amity be tollerable with choler. Contrariwise, if anger be away, even drunkennesse it selfe is tollerable and we can easily abide it: for the very ferula of god Bacchus is a sufficient punishment of drunkennesse, if so be there be not choler therewith, which may cause Bacchus, that is, Strong wine, in stead of Lycum and Chorin, that is to say, The Loofer of cares and Leader of daunces (which are his surnames) to be called Omelles and Menoles, which signifie Cruell and Furious. As for simple madnesse of it selfe alone, the Elleboro growing in Amyreia, is sufficient to cure: but if it be mingled with choler, it causeth Tragical fits; and those so strange, that a man would repute them for meeke fables. And therefore we must not give place to anger, neither in sport and pastime; for in lieu of good will it breedeth enmitie: nor in conference and disputations; for it turneth the love and desire of knowledge into debate and contention: nor in deciding and judging causes; because to authority it addeth violence and insolency: nor in the teaching and instruction of our children; for it maketh them desperate and haters of learning: nor in prosperity; for it encreaseth the envy and grudge of men: ne yet in adversity, because it taketh away pity and compassion, when they who are fallen into any misfortune, shew themselves testie, froward and quarrellous to those who come to moane and mourne with them. This did Priamus, as we read in Homer:

Avant (quoth he) you chiding guests;

you odious mates be gone:

Have you no sorrowes of your owne,

but you come me to moane?

On the other side, faire conditions and milde behaviour, yeeldeth succour and helpe in some cases, to compoeth and ordereth matters aright in others; dulceth and alaieth that which is tart and fowre: and in one word, by reason of that kinde, meeke and gentle quality, it overcommeth anger and all wayward testinesse whatsoever. Thus it is reported of Euclides in a quarrell or variance betweene him and his brother: For when his brother had contested and said unto him; I would I might die, if I be not revenged of thee: he inferred againe; Nay, let me die for it, if I perswade thee not otherwise before I have done; by which one word he presently woon his brothers heart, so that he changed his mind, and they parted friends. Polemon likewise, at a certaine time, when one who loved precious stones, & was sicke for faire & costly rings & such like curious jewels, did raile at him outrageously; answered not a word againe, but looked very wistly up on one of the signets that the other had, and well considered the fashion and workmanship thereof: which when the party perceived, taking as it should seeme no final contentment, and being very well pleased that he so perused his jewell; Not so Polemon (quoth he againe) but looke upon it thus, betweene you and the light, and then you will thinke it much more beautiful. Aristippus fell out upon a time (I know not how) with Aeschines, and was in a great choler and fit of anger: How now Aristippus (quoth one who heard him) so high & at such hot words) where is your anity & friendship all this while? Mary, asleepe (quoth he) but I wil waken it anon. With that he stoode close to Aeschines, and said: Thinke you me so unhappy every way and incurable, that I deserved not one admonishment at your hands? No marvell (quoth Aeschines againe) if I thought you (who for naturall wit in all things els excel me) to see better in this case, so also than I, what is meet and expedient to be done. For true it is that the Poet saith;

The boare so wilde, whose necke with bristles strong

Is thicke best, the tender hand and soft

Of woman nice, yea and of infant young

By stroking faire, shall bend and turne (full oft)

Much sooner furre, and that with greater ease

Than wrestlers strong with all their force and peise.

And

And we our selves can skill how to tame wilde beasts, we know how to make yong wooves gentle, yea, and lions whelps other-whiles we cary about with us in our armes: but see, how we againe afterwards in a raging fit of choler, be ready to sling from us and cast out of our sight, our owne children, our friends and familiars, and all our household servants, our fellow citizens and neighbours, we let loose our ire like some savage and furious beast, and this rage of ours we disguise and cleke forthwith with a colourable and false name, calling it Hatred of vice. But herein (I suppose) we doe no otherwise than in the rest of our passions and diseases of the minde; rearming one, Providence and forecast; another Liberality; and a third Pietie and religion: and yet for all these pretenses of goodly names, we can not be cured of the vices which they palliate; to wit, Timoroufnesse, Prodigality and Superstition.

And verily, like as our naturall seed (as Zeno said) is a certeine mixture and composition, derived and extracted from all the powers and faculties of the soule; even so, in mine opinion, a man may say that choler is a miscellane seed (as it were) and a dregge, made of all the passions of the mind: for plucked it is from paine, pleasure and insolent violence: Of envie it hath this qualitie to joy in the harmes of other men: it standeth much upon murder, but worse it is simply than murder: for the wrathfull person striveth and laboureth not to defend and save himselfe from taking harme; but so he may mischief and overthrow another, he careth not to come by a hurt and throwd turne himselfe. It holdeth likewise of concupiscence and lust, and taketh of it the worse and more unpleasant part, in case it be (as it is indeed) a desire and appetite to greeve, vex, and harme another. And therefore when we approach and come neere to the houses of luxurious and riotous persons, we heare betimes in the morning a minstrel-wench, founding and playing the Morrow-watch by breake of day: we see the muddy-grounds and dregs (as one was wont to say) of the wine, to wit, the vomits of those who cast up their stomachs: we behold the peeces and fragments of broken garlands and chaplets: and at the dore we finde the lackies and pages of them who are within, drunken and heave in the head with tipling strong wine. But the signes that tell where hastie, cholerike, and angry persons dwell, appeere in the faces of their servants, in the marks and wales remaining after their whipping, and in their clogs, yrons, and fetters about their feete. For in the houses of hastie and angry men, a man shall never heare but one kind of musicke; that is to say, the heave note of wailing groanes and piteous plaints; whiles either the stewards within are whipped and scourged, or the maidens racked & put to torture, in such sort that you would pitee to see the dolours & paines of yre which she suffreth in those things that she lusteth after & taketh pleasure in. And yet as many of us as happen to be truly & justly surprisid with choler oftentimes, for the hatred & detestation that we have of vices, ought to cut off that which is excessive therein and beyond measure, together with our over-light beleefe and credulitie of reports concerning such as converse with us: For this is one of the causes that most of all doth engender and augment choler; when either he whom we tooke for an honest man prooveeth dishonest, and is detected for some naughtinesse, or whom we reputed our friend is fallen into some quarrell and variance with us: as for my selfe, you know my nature and disposition, what small occasions make me both to love men effectually, and also to trust them confidently; and therefore (just as it falleth out with them who go over a false floore where the ground is not fast, but hollow under their feete) where I leane most and put my greatest trust for the love that I beare, there I offend most and soonest catch a fall: there (I say) am I grieved most also, when I see how I was deceived: As for that exceeding inclination and frowardnes of mind, thus to love and affect a man, could I never yet to this day weane my selfe from, so inbred it is and settled in me: may to stay my selfe from giving credit over-hastily and too much, I may peradventure use that bridle which Plato speaketh of, to wit, wary circumspection: for in recommending the Mathematician Helicon, I praise him (quoth he) for a man, that is as much to say, as a creature by nature mutable and apt to change. And even those who have bene well brought up in a citie, to wit, in Athens, he saith that he is so afraid likewise of them, lest being men, and coming from the seed of man, they do not one time or other bewray the weaknesse and infirmities of humane nature: and Sophocles when he speaketh thus,

Who list to search through all deeds of mankind

More bad; then good he shall be sure to find.

seemeth to clip our wings, and disable us wonderfully. Howbeit this difficultie and caution in judging of men and pleasing our selves in the choise of friends, will cause us to be more tractable and moderate in our anger: for whatsoever commeth sodainly and unexpected, the same

foone

soone transporteth us beside our selves. We ought moreover as Panatin teacheth us in one place to practise the example of Anaxagoras, and like as he said when newes came of his sons death; I know well (quoth he) that I begat him a mortall man; so in every fault of our servants or others that shall whetten our choler, each one of us may sing this note to himselfe: I knew well that when I bought this slave, he was not a wise Philosopher: I wist also, that I had gotten for my friend not one altogether void of affections and passions: neither was I ignorant when I tooke a wife, that I wedded a woman. Now if withall a man would evermore when he seeth others do amisse, adde this more unto the dittie as Plato teacheth us, and sing thus: Am not I also such an other? turning the discursion of his judgement from things abroad, to those which are within himselfe, and among his complaints and reprehensions of other men, come in with a certaine caveat of his owne, and feare to be reproved himselfe in the like; he would not haply be so quicke & forward in the hatred and detestation of other mens vices, seeing that himselfe hath so much need of pardon. But on the contrary side, every one of us when he is in the heat of choler and punisheth another, hath these words of severe Aristides and precise Cato ready enough in his mouth: Steale not Sirha: Make no more lies: Why art thou so idle then? &c. To conclude (that which of all others is most unseemely and absurd) we reprove in anger, others for being angry; and such faults as were committed in choler, those our selves will punish in choler; not verily as the Physicians use to do, who

*A bitter medicine into the body poure,
When bitter choler they mean to purge and scoure.*

But we rather doe encrease the same with our bitterness, and make more trouble than was before. And therefore when I thinke and discourse with my selfe of these matters, I endeavour withall and assay to cut off somewhat from needlesse curiositie. For surely this narrow searching and freight looking into everie thing, for to spie and find out a fault; as for example to sift thy servant and call him into question for all his idle houres; to prie into every action of thy friend; to see where about thy sonne goeth, and how he spendeth all his time; to listen what whispering there is betweene thy wife and another, be the verie meanes to breed much anger, daily brawles, and continuall jares, which grow in the end to the height of curtnesse and throwardnes, hard to be pleased with any thing whatsoever. For according as Euripides saith in one place, we ought in some sort to do:

*All great affaires God as himselfe directeth,
But matters small, to Fortune he committeth.*

For mine owne part, I do not thinke it good to commit any busines to Fortune; neither would I have a man of understanding to be retchlesse in his owne occasions: But with some things to put his wife in trust; others to make over unto servants, and in some matters to use his friends. Herein to beare himselfe like a Prince and great commaunder, having under him his Deputies, Governours, Receivers, Auditors, and Procurators; reserving unto himselfe and to the disposition of his owne judgement, the principall affaires, and those of greatest importance. For like as little letters or a small print do more offend and trouble the eyes then greater, for that the eyes be verie intensive upon them; even so, small matters doe quickly moove choler, which thereupon soone getteth an ill custome in weightier matters. But above all, I ever reckon that saying of Empedocles to be a divine precept and heavenly oracle, which admonisheth us To fast from sin. I commended also these points and observations, as being tight honest, commendable, and becoming him, that maketh profession of wisdom and philosophie, which we use to vow unto the gods in our prayers: Namely, To forbear both wine and women, and so to live sober and chaste a whole yeere together, and in the meane while to serve God with a pure and undefiled heart: Also, to limit and set out a certaine time, wherein we would not make a lie, observing precisely not to speake any vaine and idle word, either in earnest or in bowd. With these and such like observations also, I acquainted and furnished my soule, as being no lesse affected to religion and godlines, than studious of learning and philosophie: Namely, first enjoined my selfe to passe a certaine few Holy daies without being angry, or offended upon any occasion whatsoever; no lesse than I would have vowed to forbear drunkennesse, and abstaine altogether from wine, as if I sacrificed at the feast Nephthalis [wherein no wine was spent] or celebrated the solemnitie Melispoda, [in which Honie onely was used.] Thus having made an entrance; I tried afterwards a moneth or two by little and little what I could do, and ever I gained more and more time, exercising my selfe still to forbear sinne with all my power and might. Thus I proceeded and went forward daily, blessing my selfe with good words and striving to be milde, quiet and voide of malice;

lice, pure and cleane from evill speeches and lewd deeds: but principally from that passion which for a little pleasure, and the same not verie lovely, bringeth with it great troubles and shauelfull repentance in the end. Thus with the grace of God, assisting me somewhat (as I take it) in this good resolution and course of mine, experience it selfe approved and confirmed my first intent and judgement, whereby I was taught, That this mildnesse, clemency, and debonaire humanitie, is to none of our familiars who live and converse daily with us, so sweete, so pleasant and agreeable, as to our selves who have these vertues and good qualities within us.

The Summarie.

THE former Treatise hath shewed unto us, how many mischiefs and inconveniences Anger causeth, teaching us the meanes how to beware of it. Now Plutarch dealeth with another vice, no lesse dangerous than it, which bendeth to the opposite extremity. For where as ire doth so bereave a man of the use of reason during the access and fit thereof, that the cholericke and furious persons suffer not one from another, but in the space of time. This curiositie which now is in hand, being masked under the name of wisdom and habilitie of spirit is (to say a trueth) a covert and hidden furie, which carrieth the minde of the curious person past himselfe, for to gusher and heape from all parts the ordure and filthinesse of another, and afterwards to bring the same into himselfe, and to make thereof a verie store-house, for to infect his owne selfe first, and then others, according as the malignitie and malice, the follies, backbiting, and slanders of these curious folke do sufficiently declare. To the ende therefore that everie man who loveth vertue, should divert from such a maladie, our author sheweth that the principall remedie for to preserve us from it, is to turne this curiositie to our owne selves; namely, to examine our owne persons more diligently than others. Which point he amplifieth by setting downe on the contrary side, the blindness of those who are over-busie and curious. Then cometh he to declare, why a curious person goeth forth alwaies out of his owne house for to enter into another mans; to wit, because of his owne filthinesse, which by that meanes he cannot smell and perceive; but whiles he will needs go to stirre and rake into the life of others, he snarcth and entangleth himselfe, and so perissheth in his owne folly and indiscretion. Afterwards proceeding to prescribe the remedies for the cure of curiositie, when he had deciphered the villanies and indignities thereof, together with the nature of curious persons, and the enormous vices which accompanie them, he requireth at our hands, that we should not be desirous to know things which be vile, base, lewd or unprofitable; that we should hold in our eyes, and not cast them at random and adventure within the house of another, that we should not seeke after the brute and ravenous things that are spread in meetings and companies; that we otherwhiles should forbear even such things, whereof the use is lawfull and permitted: also to take heed that we doe not enter nor sound so deepe into our owne affaires; Finally, not to be rash and heady in those things that we do, be they never so small. All these points premised, he adorneth with inductions, similitudes and choise examples, and kisseth up all with one conclusion, which prooveth, that curious folke ought to be ranged among the most mischievous and dangerous persons in the world.

OF CVRIOSITIE.

The best way haply it were altogether to avoid an house and not therein at all to dwell, which is close without fresh aire, darke, standing bleake and colde, or otherwise unhealthfull: Howbeit, if a man by reason that he hath beene long used to such an house, delight in that feat, and will there abide, he may either by altering the prospects and remooving the lights, or by changing the staires into another place, or else by opening the dores of one side, & shutting them upon another, make the house more lightsome, better exposed to the wind for to receive fresh aire, & in one word more holsome than before. And verily some have much amended whole cities by the like alterations: as for example, men say that one Charon in times past turned my native citie and place of nativitie Charones to lie eastward, which before looked toward the westerne winde Zephyrus, and received the sunne setting from the mount Parnassus. And Empedocles the naturall Philosopher, by stopping up the mouth or deepe chinke of a certaine mountaine between two rocks, which breathed out a noisome and pestilent southerne winde upon all the champion country and plaine underneath, was thought to have put by the plague, which by occasion of that wind reigned ordinarily before in that countrie. Now forasmuch as there be certaine hurtfull and pestiferous passions, which send up into our soule tempestuous troubles and darknesse, it were to be wished, that they were chased out quite, and throwne downe to the very ground; whereby we might give our selves a free prospect, an open and cleere light, a fresh and pure aire; or if we be not so happie, yet at leastwise endeavour, we ought by all meanes possible to change, alter, translate, transpose and turne them so about, as they may be found more fit and commodious to serve our times. As for example, and to go no farther for the matter, Curiositie, which I take to be a desire to know the faults and imperfections in other men, is a vice or disease which seemeth not cleere of envie and maliciousnesse: And unto him that is infected therewith may very well be said,

*Most sightfull and envious man,
why dost thou ever finde
With piercing eyes thy neighbours faults, and in thine owne art blinde?*

avert thine eyes a little from things without, and turne thy much meddling and curiosity to those that be within. If thou take so great a pleasure and delight to deale in the Knowledge and Historie of evil matters, thou shalt worke enough iwis at home, thou shalt finde plentie thereof within to occupie thy selfe;

*For looke what water runn's along an Ithra or Ise we see,
Or leaves lie spread about the Oke, which numbred cannot be.*

Such a multitude shalt thou finde of finnes in thy life, of passions in thy soule, and of oversights in thy duties. For like as Xenophon saith, That good stewards of an household have one proper roome by it selfe for those utensiles or implements which serve for sacrifice; another for vessel that cometh to the table; in one place he lieth up the instruments & tooles for tillage and husbandry, and in another apart from the rest, he bestoweth weapons, armour, and furniture for the wars; even so shalt thou see within thy selfe a number of manifold vices how they are digested: some proceeding from envie, others from jealousy; some from idleness, others from nigardise: take account of these (I advise thee) survey and peruse them over well: (but all the dores and windows that yeeld prospect unto thy neighbors: stop up the avenues that give access and passage to Curiositie: But set open all other doores that lead into thine owne bed-chamber, and other lodgings for men, into thy wives cabinet & the nurserie, into the roomes where thy servants keepe: There shalt thou meet wherewith to amuse and busie thy selfe: there may curiositie and desire to know every thing be employed in exercises, neither unprofitable nor malicious: nay, in such as be commodious, holsome and tending to salvation: namely, whiles every one calleth himselfe to account, saying thus,

Where

*Where have I beene, what good I have done,
or what have I misdone?
Where have I slept, what duty begun is left by me undone?*

But now according as fables make report, that Lamia the Witch whiles she is at home is starke blind, & doth nothing but sing, having her eyes shut up close within a little boxe; but when she meanes to go abroad, she takes them forth, and setteth them in their right place, and seeth well enough with them; even so, every one of us when we go forth, set unto that evil meaning and intention which we have to others, an eye to looke into them, and that is curiosity and overmuch meddling; but in our owne errors, faults and trespasses we stumble and faile through ignorance, as having neither eyes to see, nor light about them whereby they may be seene. And therefore it is, that a busie fellow and curious medler, doth more good to his enemies than to himselfe; for their faults he discovereth & bringeth to light, to them he sheweth what they ought to beware of, and what they are to amend: but all this while he overseeth, or rather seeth not the most things that are done at home, so deeply amused he is and busie in spying what is amisse abroad. Howbeit wise Ulysses would not abide to speake and confer with his owne mother, before he had enquired of the Prophet those things for which he went downe into hel; and when hee had once heard them, then he turned to his mother and other women also, asking what was Tyro? what was Chloris? and for what was the occasion and cause that Eperaste came by her death?

And so from beame of lofty house did bring.*

But we quite contrary, sitting still in sapine idleness and ignorance, neglecting and never regarding that which concerneth our selves, goe to search into the genealogie and pedigrees of others; and we can tell readily, that our neighbours grandfather was no better than a base and servile Syrian; that his nourse came out of barbarous Thracia; that such an one is in debt, and oweth three talents, and is behinde hand besides, and in arrears for non-payment of interest for the use thereof. Inquisitive also we are in such matters as these: From whence came such a mans wife? what it was that such a one and such a one spake when they were alone together in an odde corner? Socrates was cleane of another quality; he would goe up and downe enquiring and casting about what were the reasons wherewith Pythagoras perswaded men to his opinion. Aristippus likewise, at the solemnities of the Olympian games, falling into the companie of Iscnomachus, asked of him, what were the perswasions that Socrates used to yong folk, whereby they became so affectionate unto him; and after he had received from him some small seeds (as it were) and a few samples of those reasons & arguments, he was so moved and passionate therewith, that presently his body fell away, he looked pale, poore and leane, untill he having failed to Athens in this woonderfull thirst and ardent heat, had drunke his fill at the fountaine and well-head it selfe, knownen the man, heard his discourses and learned his Philosophie; the summe and effect wherof was this: That a man should first know his owne maladies, and then the meanes to be cured and delivered of them. But some there be, who of all things can not abide to see their owne life, as being unto them the most unpleasant sight of all others; neither love they to bend and turne their reason as a light to their owne selves: but their minde being full of all sorts of evil, fearing and ready to quake for to beholde what things are within, leape forth (as one would say) out of doores, and goeth wandering to and fro, searching into the deeds and words of other men, and by this meanes feedeth and fatteth (as it were) her owne malicious naughtinesse. For like as a hen many times having meat enough within house set before her, loveth to go into some corner, and there keepeth a pecking and scarping of the ground,

*To finde perhaps one seely barley corne
As she was wont on downy hill beertoorme;*

so even so these busie Polypragmons, passing by those ordinary speeches and matters which are exposed and open for every man; not regarding (I say) the reports and narrations which are free for each one to discourse of, and which neither any man hath to doe, to forbid and warne them for to aske and enquire of, nor will be displeased if peradventure hee should be demanded and asked the question of them, goe up and downe in the meane time to gather and learne all the secret and hidden evils of every house. Certes, a pretie answer it was of an Aegyptian, and pertinent to the purpose, who when one asked him, what it was that he caried covered all over, and so enwrapped within a cloth: Mary (quoth he) covered it is even for this cause, that thou shouldst not know what it is : And thou likewise, that art so busie, why doest thou intermeddle in that which is concealed ? Be sure, that if there were no evil therein, kept close it should not be. And verily, it is not the maner and custome for any body to enter boldly into the house of another man, without knocking at the doore; for which purpose we use Porters in these daies; whereas in olde time there were rings and hammers which served the turne, and by rapping at the gates, gave warning to those within, to the end that no stranger might meet the mistresse at unawares in the hall or mids of the house; or come suddenly upon a virgin or yong damosell her daughter, and find her out of her chamber; or take some of the servants a beating, or the wenches and chambermaids chiding and scoulding aloud : whereas a busie fellow loveth a life to step secretly into a house, for to see and heare such disorders; and you shall never know him willingly to come and see an honest house and well governed (though one should call and pray him never so faire,) but ready he is to discover and set abroad in the view of the whole world such things; for which we use locks, keies, bolts, barres, portals and gate-houses. Those windes (saith Ariston) are we most troubled and offended with, which drive open our cloaks and garments that cover us, or blow and whiske them over our heads: but busie Polypragmons doth lay abroad and display not the cloaks of their neighbours nor their coats; but discovereth their walles, setteth wide open their doores, and like a winde, pierceth, creeperth and entrencheth so farre, as to the tender bodied and soft skinned maiden, searching and inquiring in every bachelinall, in all dauncings, wakes and night feasts, for some matter to raise flanders of her. And as one Cleon was noted by an olde Comicall Poet upon the Stage,

Whose hands were both in Aetolie,

But heart and minde in Clodipides;

Even so the spirit of a curious and busie person, is at one time in the stately palaces of rich and mighty men, in the little houses of meane and poore folke, in Kings Courts, and in the bed-chambers of new wedded wives; it is inquisitive in all matters, searching awell the affaires of strangers and travellers, as negotiations of Lords and Rulers, and other while not without danger of his owne person. For much like as if a man upon a kinde of wanton curiositie, will needs be tasting of Aconite or Libard-baine, to know (forsooth) the quality of it, commeth by a mischiefe, & dieth of it before he can know any thing thereof; so they that love to be prying into the faults of great persons, many times overthrow themselves before they come to any knowledge. For such as can not be content with the abundant raies and radiant beames of the Sunne which are spread fo cleere over all things, but will needs strive and force themselves impudently to looke full upon the circle of his body, and audaciously will presume and venture to pierce his brightnesse, and enter into the very minds of his inward light, commonly dazzle their eyes, and become like blinde. And therefore well and properly answered Philippides the writer of Comedies upon a time when King Lysimachus spake thus unto him; What wouldst thou have me to impart unto thee of my goods, Philippides? What it pleaseth your Maiesty (quoth he) so it be nothing of your secrets. For to say a truth, the most pleasant and beautifull things simply, which belong to the estate of Kings, do shew without, and are exposed to the view and sight of every man; to wit, their sumptuous feasts, their wealth and riches, their magnificent port and pompe in publike places, their bountifull favours, and liberall gifts: But is there any thing secret and hidden within. Take heed I advise thee how thou approach and come neere, beware (I say) that thou do not stirre and meddle therein.

The joy and mirth of a Prince in prosperitie can not be concealed; hee cannot laugh when he is disposed to play and be merry but it is seene; neither when he mindeth and doth prepare to shew some gracious favour or to be bountifull unto any is his purpose hidden; but marke what thing he keepeth close and secret, the same is terrible, heavey, tearne, unpleasant, yea ministring no access nor cause of laughter: namely the treasure house (as it were) of some rancor and festered anger; a deepe designe or project of revenge; Jealousie of his wife, some suspicion of his owne sonne; or diffidence and distrust in some of his minions, favorites and friends. Flie from this blacke cloud that gathereth so thicke; for when soever that which is now hidden shall breake forth, thou shalt see what cracks of thunder and flashes of lightning will ensue thereupon. But what be the meanes to avoid it? many (even as I said before) to turne and to withdraw thy curiositie another way; and principally to set thy minde upon matters that are more honest and delectable: Advise thy selfe and consider curiously upon the creatures in heaven, in earth, in the aire, & in the sea. Art thou delighted in the contemplation of great or final things? if thou take pleasure to behold the greater, busie thy selfe about the Sunne; seeke where he goeth eth downe, and from whence he riseth? Search into the cause of the mutations in the Moone, why it should fo change and alter as it doth, like a man or woman? what the reason is that the loofeth so conspicuous a light? and how it commeth to passe that she recovereth it againe?

How is it, when she hath bene out of sight

That fresh she seemes and doth appeere with light?

First yong and faire whiles that she is but new

Till yound and full we see her lovely hew:

No sooner is her beutie at this height

But fade she doth anon, who was so bright,

And by degrees she doth decrease and waine

Unill at length she comes to naught againe.

And these truly are the secrets of nature, neither is she offended and displeased with those who can find them out. Distrustest thou thy selfe to attaine unto these great things? then search in to smaller matters, to wit, what might the reason be that among trees and other plants, some be alwaies fresh and Greene, why they flourish at all times, and be clad in their gay clothes, shewing their riches in every season of the yeere; why others againe be one while like unto them in this their pride and glorie; but afterward you shall have them againe like unto an ill husband in his house; namely, laying out all at once, and spending their whole wealth and substance at one time, untill they be poore, naked, and beggerly for it? Also what is the cause that some bring forth their fruit long-wise, others cornered, and others round or circular? But peradventure thou hast no great mind to busie thy selfe and meddle in these matters, because there is no hurt nor danger at all in them. Now if there be no remedie, but that Curiositie should ever apply it selfe to search into evil things after the maner of some venomous serpent, which loveth to feed, to live and converse in pestilent woods, let us lead & direct it to the reading of histories, and present unto it abundance and store of all wicked acts, leawd and sinfull deeds. There shall Curiositie finde the ruines of men, the wasting and consuming of their state, the spoile of wives and other women, the deceitfull traines of servants to beguile their masters, the calumniations and slanderous surmises raised by friends, poisoning calts, envie, jealousie, shipwracke and overthrow of houses, calamities and utter undoing of princes and great rulers: Satisfie thy selfe herewith to the full, and take thy pleasure therein as much as thou wilt; never shalt thou trouble or grieve any of thy friends & acquaintance in so doing. But it should seeme that curiositie delighteth not in such naughtie things that be very old and long since done; but in those which be fresh, fire new, hot and lately committed, as joying more to beholde new Tragedies. As for Comedies and matters of mirth, she is not greatly desirous to be acquainted with such. And therefore, if a man do make report of a mariage, discourse of a solemne sacrifice, or of a goodly shew or pompe that was set forth, the curious busie-bodie (whom we speake of) will take small regard thereto and heare it, but coldly and negligently. He will say that the most part of all this he heard already by others, and bid him who relateth such narrations, to passe them over or be brieve, and cut off many circumstances. Marie if one that sits by him chance to set tale on end, and begin to tell him there was a maiden despoiled, or a wife abused in adulterie: if he recant of some proceffe of law or action commenced, of discord and variance betwene two brethren; you shall see him then not to yawne and gape as though hee had list to sleepe; you shall not perceive him to nod; hee will make no excuse at all that his leisure will not serve to heare out the tale,

But bids say on, and tell us more:

And close he holds his eare therefore.

So that this sentence,

How sooner much are ill newes under stood,

And heard by men (alas) than tidings good!

is so well and truly verified of these curious Polypragmons. For like as cupping glasses, boxes, and ventoses, draw the worst matter out of the flesh; even so, the eares of curious and busie folke, are willing to receive and admit the most lewd and haughtiest speeches that are: or rather, to speake more properly, as townes and cities have certaine cursed and unluckie gates, at which they send out malefactors to execution, carrie and throw forth their dung, ordure, filthines, and cleanings whatsoever, but never commeth in or goeth out that way, any thing that pure is and holy; temblably, the eares of these curious intermeddles be of the same nature: for there entrench and passeth into them nothing that is honest, civill and lovely; but the brut and rumours of cruell murders have acceſſe unto them, and there make aboard, bringing therewith wicked, abominable, profane and curſed reports: and as one ſaid:

The onely bird that in my houſe doth ever ſing

Both night and day, in dolefull moane, much ſorrow and wailing.

So this is the Muſe, Syrene, & Mere-maid alone, that Buſie folke have; neither is there any thing that they hearken to more willingly: for Curioſitie is an itching deſire to heare ſecrets and hidden matters: and well you wot that no man will lightly conſeale any good thing that he hath; conſidering that manie times we make ſemblance of good parts that be not in us. And therefore the buſie intermedler who is ſo deſirous to know and heare of evils, is ſubject to that which the Greekes call δὲρκαυσις, a vice, cooſen germaine or ſiſter rather to envie and eie-biting. For as much as envie is nothing elſe, but the griefe for another mans good: and the foreſaide δὲρκαυσις the joy for his harme: and verily both theſe infirmities proceed from an untoward roote, even another untamed vice and ſavage diſpoſition, to wit, malignitie or malice. And this we know well, that ſo ikeſome and odious it is to envie man for to bewray and reveale, the ſecrets, evils and vices which he hath, that many men have choſen to die, rather than to diſcover and open unto Phyſicians any of their hidden maladies, which they carrie about them. Now ſuppoſe that Hieracium or Eroſiſtratus the phyſicians; nay Aeſculapius himſelfe whiles he was a mortall man, ſhould come to an houſe furniſhed with drugs, medicines and instruments requiſite for the cure of diſeaſes, and aſke whether any man their had a Fiſtula in Ano, that is, an hollow and hidden ulcer within his fundament: Or if ſhe be a woman, whether ſhe have a cancerous ſore within her matrice: (albeit in this art ſuch inquiſitive curioſitie is a ſpeciall meanes, making for the good and the health of the ſicke) each one I ſuppoſe would be readie to hunt and chaſe away from the houſe ſuch a Phyſician, who unſent for, and before any neede required, came upon his owne accord and motion in a braverie to enquire and learne other folks maladies. What ſhall we ſay then to theſe buſie medlers, who enquire of another the ſelfe ſame infirmities and worſe too? Not of any minde at all to cure and heale the ſame, but onely to detect and ſet them abroad; In which reſpect they are by good right the moſt odious perſons in the world. For we hardly can abide Publicanes, Cuſtomers, and Tol-gatherers, but are mightily offended with them, not when they exact of us, and cauſe us to pay toll for any commodities or wares that are openly brought in; but when they keepe a ſtetting and ſearching for ſuch things as be hidden, and meddle with the wares and carriages of other men: notwithstanding that law granteth and publike authoritie alloweth them ſo to do; yea and if they doe it not, they ſuſtaine loſſe and damage themſelves. But contrariwiſe, theſe curious fellows let their owne buſineſſe alone, and paſſe not which ende go forward, caring not to hinder themſelves, whiles they be intente to the affaires of other men. Seldome go they into the cuntry, for that they cannot endure the quietnes and ſtill ſilence of the wilde and ſolitarie fields. But if haply after long time they make a caſt thither, they caſt an eie to their neighbours vines, rather than to their owne; they enquire how many beeves or oxen of his died? or what quantity of wine ſowed under his hand? and no ſooner are they full of theſe newes, but into the citie they trudge and make haſte againe. As for the good farmer and painefull husbandman indeed, he is not verie willing to give eare unto theſe newes, which without his hearkning after come from the citie of the owne accord, and are brought unto him, for his ſaying is:

My ditcher will anon both tell and talke

upon what points concluded was the peace,

For now the knave about ſuch newes doth walke,

And buſie he ſo liſten doth not ceaſe.

But in truth, theſe buſie-bodies, avoiding cuntry life and husbandrie, as a vaine trade and fooliſh occupation, a cold maner of living, which bringeth forth no great and tragical matter, intrude and thruſt themſelves into the high courts of juſtice, the tribunall ſeats, the market place and publike pulpits where ſpeeches be made unto the people, great aſſemblies, and the moſt frequented quarter of the haven where the ſhipſide at anchor, what: No newes? ſaith one of them. How now? Were you not this morning at the market or in the common place? What then? How thinke you, is not the citie mightily changed and transformed within theſe three houres? Now if it chauce that ſome one or other make a overture, and have ſomething to ſay as touching theſe points, downe he alights on foot from his horſe, he embraceth the man, kiſſeth him, and there ſtands attending and giving eare unto him. But ſay that the partie whom he thus encountreth and meeteth upon the way, tell him that he hath no newes to report: what ſaith ſaith thou? (will he infer againe and that in diſpleaſure and diſcontentment:) Wert not thou in the market place of late? Didſt not thou paſſe by the Princes court? Hadſt thou no talke or conference at all with thoſe that came out of Italie? In regard of ſuch therefore as theſe, I hold well with the Magiſtrates of the citie Loer, and commend a law of theirs: That if any citizen had bene abroad in the cuntry, and upon his returne home demanded what newes? he ſhould have a fine ſet on his head. For like as Cookes pray for nothing, but good ſtore of fatlings to kill for the kitchen, and Fiſhmongers plenty of fiſhes; even ſo curious and buſie people with for a world of troubles and a number of affaires, great newes, alterations and changes of State: to the ende that they might evermore be provided of gaine, to chaſe and hunt after, yea and to kill. Well and wiſely therefore did the Law-giver of the Thurians, when he gave order and forbade expreſſely, That no citizen ſhould be taxed, noted by name, or ſcoffed at upon the Stage in any Comedie, ſave onely adulterers and theſe buſie perſons. For ſurely adulterie may be compared well to a kinde of curioſitie, ſearching into the pleaſures of another: ſeeking (I ſay) and enquiring into thoſe matters which are kept ſecret, and conſealed from the view of the whole world. And as for curioſitie, it ſeemeth to be a reſolution or looſenes, like a pallie or corruption, a detection of ſecrets and laying them naked: For it is an ordinarie thing with thoſe who be inquisitive and deſirous of many newes, for to be blabs alſo of their tongues, and to be prating abroad; which is the reaſon that Pythagoras enjoyned yong men five yeeres ſilence, which he called Echemychia, Abſtinenſe from all ſpeech, or holding of their tongue.

Moreover, it can not otherwiſe be choſen, but that foule and curſed language alſo ſhould accompany curioſity; for looke what thing ſoever buſie bodies heare willingly, the ſame they love to tell and blurt out as quickly; and ſuch things as with deſire and care they gather from one, they utter to another with joy: Whereupon it cometh to paſſe, that over and above other inconveniences which this vice miniſteth unto them that are given to it, an impediment it is to their owne appetite. For as they deſire to know much, ſo every man obſerveth them, is beware of them, and endeavoureth to conſeale all from them. Neither are they willing to doe any thing in their ſight, nor delighted to ſpeak ought in their hearing, but if there be any queſtion in hand to be debated, or buſineſſe to be conſidered and conſulted of, all men are content to put off the concluſion and reſolution unto another time; namely, untill the curious and buſie perſon be out of the way. And ſay, that whiles men are in ſad and ſecret conference, or about ſome ſerious buſineſſe, there chauce one of theſe buſie bodies to come in place, preſently all is huiſt, and every thing is remooved aſide and hidden; no otherwiſe than folke are wont to ſet out of the way victuals where a cat doth haunt, or when they ſee her ready to run by; inſomuch as many times theſe things which other men may both heare and ſee ſafely, the ſame may not be done or ſaid before them onely. Therefore alſo it followeth by good conſequence, that a buſie and curious perſon is commonly ſo farre out of credit, that no man is willing to truſt him for any thing; in ſuch ſort, that we commit our letters miſſive and ſigne manuall, ſooner to our ſervants and meere ſtrangers, than to our friends and familiars, if we perceive them given to this humor of much meddling. But that woorthy knight Bellerophon was ſo farre from this, that he would not breake open thoſe letters which he caried, though they were written againſt himſelfe, but forbore to touch the Kings epiſtle, no leſſe than he abſtained from the Queen his wiſe, even by one and the ſame vertue of Continence. For ſurely, curioſity is a kinde of incontinencie, aſwel as is adultery; and this moreover it hath beſides, that joined there is with it, much folly and extreme want of wit: For were it not a part (thinke you) of exceeding blockiſh ſenſeleſſeneſſe, yea, and madneſſe in the higheſt degree, to paſſe by ſo many women that be common, and every where to be had; and then to make meanes with great coſt and expenſe, to ſome one kept under locke and key, and beſides ſumptuous: notwithstanding it fall out many times that ſuch an one is as ill-favored as ſhe is foule? Sembaliſhly, and even the ſame do our curious folke: they omit and caſt behinde them many faire and goodly ſights to behold, many excellent lectures woorth the hearing, many diſputations, diſcourſes, honeſt exerciſes and paſtimes; but in other mens letters they keepe a puddering, they open and reade them, they ſtand like eaves-droppers under their neighbours walles, hearkning what is done or ſaid within, they are ready to intrude themſelves to liſten what whiſpering there is betweene ſervants of the houſe; what ſecret talke there is among ſeely women when they be in ſome odde corner, and as many times they are by this meanes not free from danger; ſo alwaies they meet with ſhame and infamie. And therefore very expedient it were for ſuch curious folke, if they would ſhift off and part by this vice of theirs, eſt ſoones to call to mind (as much as they can) what they have either known or heard by such inquisition : for if (as Simonides was wont to say) that when hee came (after some time betwene) to open his desks and coffers, he found one which was appointed for gifts and rewards alwaies full, the other ordered for thanks and the graces void and empty : so a man after a good time past, set open the store-house of curiositie, and looke into it what is therein, and see it toppe full of many unprofitable, vaine and unpleasant things ; peradventure the very outward sight and face thereof will discontent and offend him, appearing in every respect to lovelesse and toyish as it is. Goe to then : if one should set in hand to turne over leafe by leafe the books of ancient writers, and when he hath picked forth and gathered out the woofst, make one volume of all together, to wit, of those headlesse and unperfect verses of Homer, which happily beginne with a short syllable, and therefore be called disparat : or of the solæcismes and incongruities which be found in Tragedies : or of the undecent and intemperate speeches which Archilochus framed against women, whereby he defamed and shamed himselfe : were he not (I pray you) worthy of this Tragical curse :

A Soule ill take thee, thou lewd wretch, that lov'st to collect

*The faults of mortall men now dead,
the living to infect.*

but to let these maledictions alone, certes this treasuring and scoring up by him of other mens errors and misdeeds, is both unseemly, and also unprofitable : much like unto that city which Philip built of purpose, and peopled it with the most wicked, gracelesse, and incorrigible persons that were in his time, calling it Poneropolis when he had so done. And therefore these curious meddlers in collecting and gathering together on all sides the errors, imperfections, defaults, and solæcismes (as I may so say) not of verses or Poemes, but of other mens lives, make of their memorie a most unpleasant Archive or Register, and uncivill Record, which they ever carie about them. And like as at Rome, some there be who never cast eie toward any fine pictures, or goodly statues, no nor so much as make any account to cheapeen beautifull boies and faire wenches which there stand to be sold, but rather go up and downe the market where monsters in nature are to be bought, seeking and learning out where be any that want legs, whose armes and elbows turne the contrary way like unto cats ; or who have three eies apeece in their heads, or be headed like unto the Ostrich : taking pleasure (I say) to see if there be borne

*A mungrell mixt of divers sorts,
False birth, unkinde or strange aboris.*

But if a man should bring them to see such sights as these ordinarily, the very thing it selfe would soone give them enough, yea and breed a loathing in them of such ugly monsters ; even so it fareth with those who busie themselves and meddle in searching narrowly into the imperfections of other mens lives, the reproches of their stocks and kined, the faults, errors, and troubles that have hapned in other houses ; if they call to mind what like defects they have found and known before time, they shall soone finde that their former observations have done them small pleasure, or wrought them as little profit.

But the greatest meanes to divert this vicious passion, is use and custome ; namely, if we begin a great way off, and long before to exercise and acquaint our selves in a kind of continencie in this behalfe, and so learne to temper and rule our selves ; for surely use it was and custome that caused this vice to get such an head, encreasing daily by little and little, and growing from worse to worse : But how and after what maner we should be inured to this purpose, we shall see and understand as we treat of Exercise withall.

First and formost therefore, begin we will at the smallest and most slender things, and which most quickly may be effected. For what matter of difficultie is it for a man in the way as he travellet, not to enuse and busie his head in reading Epitaphes or inscriptions of Sepulchres ? or what paine is it for us as we walke along the galleries, to passe over with our eies the writings upon the wallles ; supposing thus much secretly within our selves, as a maxime or generall rule : That there is no goodnes, no pleasure, nor profit at all in such writings : for there you may read, That some one doth remember another, and make mention of him by way of hearty commendations in good parts ; or such an one is the best friend that I have, and many other such like mottoes, are there to be seene and read, full of toies and vanities, which at first seeme not to do any hurt if one reade them, but in truth, secretly they do much harme, in that they breed in us a custome and desire to seeke after needlesse and impertinent matters. For like as hunters suffer not their hounds to range out of order, nor to follow everie sent, but keepe them up and hold them in by their collars, reserving by that meanes their smelling pure and neat, altogether for their proper worke, to the end that they should be more eager and hot to trace the footing of their game, and as the Poet saith,

*With sent most quicke of noestrials after kind,
The traicts of beast so wild, in chase to find;*

even so, we ought to cut off these excursions and foolish traines that curious folke make to heare and see everie thing ; to keepe them short (I say) and turne them another way to the seeing and hearing onely of that which is good and profitable. Also, as we observe in Eagles and Lions, That whiles they go upon the ground they draw their talons and claws inward, for feare lest they should dull the sharpe edge and weare the points thereof ; so considering that curiositie hath a certaine quicke conceit and fine edge (as it were) apt to apprehend and know many things, let us take heed that we do not imploy and blunt the same in the woofst and vilsit of all others.

Secondly, we are to accustome our selves as we passe by another mans doore, not to looke in, nor to cast our eies to any thing whatsoever that there is : for that the eie is one of the hands that curiositie useth. But let us alwaies have in readinesse and thinke upon the Apothegme of Xenocrates, who was wont to say, That it skilled not, but was all one, whether we set our feet, or eies within the house of another man. For it is neither meet and just, nor an honest and pleasant sight, according to the old verse,

*My friend or stranger, what ever you be,
You shall within, all things deformed see.*

And what be those for the most part which are seene in houses ? dishes, trenchers, and such like utensils and small vessels lying on the bare ground, or one upon another disorderly : the wenches set and doing just nothing : and lightly a man shall not finde ordinarily ought of importance or delight. Now the verie cast of the eie upon such things, doth therewith turne away the minde ; the intentive looking thereupon is unseemly, and the using thereof sturke naught. Diogenes verily upon a time seeing Dioxippus, when he entred in his triumphant chariot into the citie for winning the best prize at the Olympian games, how as he rode he could not chuse but set his eie upon a certaine faire damozell, who was in place to behold this pompe and solemne entrance of his, but evermore his eie followed her, whether she were before or behinde him : Behold (quoth he) our victorious and triumphant champion, how a yong wench hath him sure enough by the necke, and doth writhe him which way she list ! Semblably, see you not how these curious folke have their neckes bended aside at everie foolish sight, and how they turne about with each vanitie that they heare and see, after once they have gotten an habit or custome, to looke everie way and to carie a rouling eie in their heads ? But in mine opinion, it is not meet that our senses should gad and wander abroad, like a wilde and untaught girtle, but when reason hath sent it forth to some businesse ; after it hath bene there employed and done the errand about which it was fer, to returne speedily againe unto her mistresse the soule, and make report how the hath sped and what she hath done ? and then afterwards to stay at home decently like a modest waiting maiden, giving attendance upon reason, and readie alwaies at her command. But now hapneth that which Sophocles saith,

*The headstrong jades that will no bit abide,
Hate him perforce who should them reine and guide.*

The senses having not met with good instructions (as I said before) not bene trained to right waies, runne before reason upon their owne accord, and draw with them many times the understanding, and send it headlong after such things as are not seemely and decent. And therefore false is that which is commonly reported of Democritus the Philosopher : namely, that willingly he dimmed and quenched (as it were) his owne sight, by fixing his eies fast upon a fiery and ardent mirror, to take the reverberation of the light from thence, to the end that they should not disturb the minde, by calling out estoones the inward intelligence, but suffer it to keepe house within, and to be employed in objects intellectuall, as if the windowes that regard to the secret and high way were shut up. Howbeit most true it is, that those who for the most part occupie their understanding have least use of their senses : which is the reason that in olde time they both builded the temples of the Muses, that is to say, houses ordained for students, which they named Musæa, as farre as they could from cities and great townes : and also called the night Euphrone, as one would say, a friend to sage advice and counsell ; as supposing that quiet rest, re-

poſe, and ſtilnes from all diſturbance make verie much for contemplation, and invention of thoſe things that we ſtudie and ſeeke for.

Moreover, no harder matter is it nor of greater difficultie than the reſt, when in the open market place or common hall, men are at high words, reproching & reviling one another, not to approach and come neere unto them. Alſo if there be any great concurſe and running of people together upon ſome occaſion, not to ſtirre at all but ſit ſtill, or if thou art not able to containe and rule thy ſelfe, to riſe up and goe thy waies. For ſurely gaine thou ſhalt no good at all by intermeddling with ſuch buſie and troubleſome perſons; but contrariwiſe, much fruit maiſt thou reape by turning away ſuch curioſitie, in repreſſing the ſame and conſtraining it by uſe and cuſtome to obey reaſon. Having made this good entrance & beginning, to proceed now unto farther and ſtronger exerciſe, it were verie good, whenſoever there is any play exhibited upon the Stage in a frequent Theater, where there is aſſembled a great audience to heare and ſee ſome woorthie matter ſor to paſſe by it, and to put backe thy friends who ſollicite thee to goe thither with them, ſor to ſee either one daunce excellent well, or to act a Comedie; nor ſo much as to turne backe when thou heareſt ſome great ſhout and outcrie, either from out of the race or the grand-cirque, where the horſe-running is held for the prize. For like as Socrates gave counſell to forbearc thoſe meates which provoke men to eat when they are not hungry, and thoſe drinks which incite folke to drinke when they have no thirſt; even ſo, we ought to avoide and beware, how we either ſee or heare any thing whatſoever, which may either draw or hold us thereto, when there is no need at all thereof. The noble Prince Cyrus would not ſo much as ſee faire Ladie Panthea, and when Araſpes one of his courtiours and minions made report unto him, that ſhe was a woman of incomparable beautie, and therefore woorthie to be looked on: Nay rather (quoth he) for that cauſe I ought to forbearc the ſight of her; for if by your perſuaſion I ſhould yeeld to goe and ſee her, it may peradventure fall out ſo, that ſhe her ſelfe might tempt and induce me againe to repaire unto her; even then haply when I ſhall not have ſuch leaſure, yea and ſit by her and keepe her company, neglecting in the meane time the weightie affaires of the State. In like manner Alexander the Great, would not come within the ſight of King Darius his wife, notwithstanding that ſhe was reported unto him ſor to be a moſt gallant and beautifull Ladie: Her mother an auncient Dame and elderly matrone he did not ſticke to viſite, but the young gentlewoman her daughter (ſreſh, faire and young) he could not be brought ſo much as once to ſee. As for us, we can caſt a wanton eie ſecretly into the coaches and horſe-litters of wives and women as they ride, we can looke out of our windowes, and hang with our bodies halfe forth, to take the full view of them as they paſſe by: and all this while we thinke that we commit no fault, ſuffering our curious eie and wandering minde to ſlide and run to everie thing.

Moreover, it is meet and expedient for the exerciſe of juſtice, otherwhiles to omit that which well and juſtly might be done; to the end that by that meanes a man may acquaint himſelfe to keepe farre off from doing or taking any thing unjuſtly. Like as it maketh much for temperance and chaſtitie, to abſtaine otherwhiles from the uſe of a mans owne wife, that thereby he might be never mooved to luſt after the wife of his neighbour; taking this courſe likewise againſt curioſity, ſtrive and endeavour ſometimes to make ſemblance as though thou didſt neither heare nor ſee thoſe things that properly concerne thy ſelfe: And if a man come and bring thee a tale of matters concerning thine owne houſholde, let it paſſe, and put it over, yea, and thoſe words which ſeeme to have bene ſpoken as touching thine owne perſon, caſt them behinde, and give no care thereto. For default of this diſcretion, it was the inquiſitive curioſity of King Oedipus, which intangled and enwrappd him in exceeding great calamities and miſeries: for when he would needs know who himſelfe was, as if he had bene not a Corinthian, but a ſtranger, and would needs goe thereto the Oracle ſor to be reſolved, he met with Laius his owne father by the way, whom he ſlew, and ſo ſpouſed his owne mother, by whose meanes he came to be King of Thebes: and even then when he ſeemed to be a moſt happy man, he could not ſtay, but proceeded further to enquire concerning himſelfe, notwithstanding his wife did what the poſſibly could to diſſwade him from it; but the more earneſt ſhe was with him that way, the more inſtant was he with an old man who was privie to all, uſing all meanes to enforce him ſor to bewray that ſecret: at length when the thing it ſelfe was ſo pregnant, that it brought him into farther ſuſpicion, and withall when the ſaid old man cried out in this manner,

T

To ſetter that which will cauſe remorse?

the king ſurprized ſtill with his humor of curioſitie, notwithstanding he was vexed at the verie heart, answered,

And I likewiſe for my part am as neere

To beare as much, but yet I muſt it beare.

So bitter ſweet is that itching ſmart humor of curioſitie, like unto an ulcer or ſore, which the more it is rubbed and ſcratched, the more it bleedeth and bloodieſh it ſelfe. Howbeit he that is delivered from this diſeaſe and beſides of nature milde and gentle, ſo long as he is ignorant and knoweth not any evill accident, may thus ſay,

O bleſſed Saint, when evils are paſt and gone

How ſage and wiſe art thou, oblivion.

And therefore we muſt by little and little accuſtome our ſelves to this, that when there be anie letters brought unto us, we do not open them preſently and in great haſte, as many do, who if their hands be not quicke enough to doe the feat, ſet their teeth to, and gnaw in ſunder the threds that ſewd them up faſt. Alſo if there be a meſſenger comming toward us from a place with any tidings, that we run not to meete him, nor ſo much as once riſe and ſtir for the matter; and if a friend come unto thee ſaying, I have ſome newes to tell you of: yea mary (muſt you ſay againe) but I had rather that you brought me ſomething indeed that were profitable, fruitfull and commodious. I remember upon a time when I declaimed and read a lecture at Rome, hapned to be there to heare me: Now in the mids of my lecture there came into the place a Soldiour with letters from the Emperour, which he delivered to Ruffius aforeſaid, whereupon there was great ſilence in the ſchoole, and I my ſelfe made ſome paule, whiles he might reade the letter, but he would not reade it then, nor ſo much as breake it open before I had made an end of my diſcourſe, and diſmiſſed the auditory: for which all the company there preſent, highly praized and admired the gravitie of the man. Now if one do feed and nourish all that he can, (beit but in lawfull and allowable things) this veine and humor of curioſitie, ſo as thereby it becommeth in the end mighty and violent, it will not be an eaſie matter to reſtraine and hold it in when it ſhall breake out & run on end to ſuch things as be unlawfull & forbidden, by reaſon that it is ſo uſed already to intermeddle & be doing. But ſuch men as theſe, breake open and unſcale letters (as I ſaid) intrude themſelves into the ſecret counſels of their friends; they will needs diſcover and ſee thoſe ſacred myſteries, which it is not lawfull for to ſee; in place wherunto there is no lawfull acceſſe they love to be walking; enquire they do into the ſecret deeds and words of kings and princes; and notwithstanding there be nothing in the world that cauſeth tyrants, who muſt of neceſſitie know all, ſo odious as this kinde of people, who be called their cares; (promoters I meane, and ſpies) who heare all and bring all unto their cares. The firſt that ever had about him theſe Otaconſtes (as a man would ſay, Princes eares) was Darius the youonger; a prince diſtruſting himſelfe, ſuſpecting alſo and fearing all men. As for thoſe which were called Proſagogidæ, that is to ſay, Courries, Spies, and Enformers, the Dionyſi, tyrants of Sicilie, intermingled ſuch among the Syracuſians: wherupon, when the State was altered, thoſe were the firſt that the Syracuſians apprehended and maſſacred. Alſo thoſe whom we call Sycophants, are of the confraternitie, houſe and lineage of theſe curious perſons, ſave onely this difference there is, that Sycophants enquire what evill any man hath either deſſigned or committed; whereas our Polypragmons hearken after and diſcover the very calamities and miſadventures of their neighbours, which happen even againſt their will and purpoſe: and when they have ſo done, ſet them abroad to the view of the whole world. Furthermore, it is ſaid, that the name Aliterius came up firſt by occaſion of this over-much meddling, called Curioſity. For when there was (by all likelihood) a great famine at Athens, they that had come, kept it in and would not bring it abroad to the market, but privily & in the night, ground the ſame into meale within their houſes: Now theſe fellows, named Aliterij, would go up and downe cloſely hearkening where the querne or mill went, and thereupon tooke the ſaid name. Semblably, as it is reported, the name of Sycophants aroſe upon the like occaſion: for when there was a law made, forbidding that any figges ſhould be carried forth out of the land, ſuch promoters as bewraied the delinquents, and gave information againſt thoſe that conveyed figges away, were alſo thereupon called Sycophants. To conclude therefore, it were not unprofitable for theſe curious Polypragmons (of whom we have diſcourſed all this while) to know thus much; That they might be ashamed in themselves to be noted for maners and profession to be like unto those who are accounted the most odious and hatefull persons in the world.

OF THE TRANQVILLITY AND CONTENTMENT OF MINDE.

The Summarie.

IN this Treatise a man may see the excellent discourses and most sound arguments of Morall Philosophie; the scope whereof is to make the scholars and students therein resolute, and to keepe them from wavering and tottering to and fro; not withstanding that either the skie were ready to fall upon their heads, or the earth to chinke and open under their feet. True it is that in this place Plutarch sheweth sufficiently what blindness there is in humane wisdom, when the question is to pronounce and speake precisely, wherein consisteth true repose and assured felicitie? For to teach a man whom he calleth vertuous, to search for contentment and quiet rest in his owne reason, were as much as to fetch light out of darkness, and life out of death it selfe. And therefore (for this time) needlesse it is to treat long upon this point, considering that we minde not to dispute or declare how insufficient humane learning and Philosophy is in comparison of true Divinity & Theology. For the present, this may suffice, that seeing he was no better than a pagan, who hath disputed of this theme, let us receive both this discourse and other such, wherein he endeavourth to withdraw us from vice, and bring us unto vertue, as written and penned by a man, guided and conducted by a divine and darke light: in which notwithstanding appeare certaine sparks of the truth, which as they are not able to shew the way sufficiently, so they give them to understand, who be farre remote from the true light, how miserable and wretched they are every way. Proovead he had before, that Flattery, Choler, and Curiosity are vices that overturne the soule up-side downe, and transport it so farre off that it is not at home, nor mistress of herselfe: and after he had taught how a man might reclaime and reduce her againe to her owne house, he treateth now of those meanes, whereby she may be kept quiet, peaceable, joyous and contented within. For the effecting hereof, at the very entry of this Treatise, he proposeth one expedient meane to attaine thereto, requiring that a man should fortifie and defend his minde with reasons against the evils and dangers to come: then he comforteth the Epicureans, who for to set a man in peace, would make him blockish, senselesse and good for nothing: he answereth likewise to those who are of opinion that a man may finde certaine kinde of vacation and impassibilitie without all trouble and molestation: which done, he sheweth that reason well ruled & ordered, is the foundation and ground of our tranquillity: and all in one and the same traine, he teacheth how a man may be furnished & assisted with this reason. Having thus sufficiently in general termes discoursed of these premisses, he doth particularise and decipher the same point by point, giving severall counsels, whereby a man may attaine to this contentment and repose of spirit; the which he have distinguished particularly, and shewed in each one the substance of them, which I thought not good to infer in this place, because the Summary should not exceed over-much. Furthermore, the said counsels be enriched with notable examples, similitudes and sentences; which (no doubt) would have bene much more forcible and effectfull, if the principall in deed had bene joined therewith, to wit, true pietie and religion: which hath bene cleane omitted by the author, who in deed never knew what was the onely true and perfect tranquillitie of the soule. Howbeit, woonderfull it is, how he should proceed so farre as he doeth, having no other helpe and meanes but his owne selfe: which may so much the better serve our turnes, considering that we have aides and guides farre more excellent to bring us so farre, as to make entrie, and take assured possession of that soveraigne good and felicity, whereof he here speaketh.

OF THE TRANQVILLITY AND contentment of minde.

PLUTARCH to PACCIVS sendeth greeting:

O Verlate it was before I received your letter; wherein you requested me to write somewhat as touching the Tranquillity of the Soule, and withall of certaine places in Platoes Dialogue Timæus, which seeme to require more exact exposition: but so it happened, that at the very same time, your friend and mine Eros, had occasion to faile with speed to Rome, upon the receipt of certaine letters from that right worshipfull gentleman Fundanus, by vertue whereof he was to depart suddenly and to repaire unto him with all expedition. By which occasion having not sufficient time and leisure to performe your request in such manner as I purposed, & yet unwilling that the man coming from me, should be seene of you emtie-handed; I have collected certaine notes, chosen out of those commentaries, which for mine owne memorie & private use I had compiled long before, concerning this argument, to wit, The Tranquillity & contentment of spirit: supposing that you also demaund this present discourse, not for any pleasure that you take to read a treatise penned curiously, and affecting or hunting after fine phrases and exquisite words; but onely in regard of some doctrine that may serve your turne and helpe you to the framing of your life as you ought; knowing withall full well (for the which I doe congratulate and rejoyce heartily on your behalfe) that notwithstanding your inward acquaintance, friendship and favor with the best and principall persons of the citie, and that for eloquence you come behind none that plead causes at the bar in open court, but are reputed a singular Oratour, yet for all that, you do not as that Tragickall Metrops, suffer your selfe foolishly and beyond the course of nature to be carried away as he was with the vaine-glorie and applaude of the multitude, when they do admire and account you happie therefore; but still you keepe in memorie that which oftentimes you have heard from us; That it is neither a rich Partitions (those that cureth the gout in the feet; nor a costly and pretious ring that healeth the whitlaw or felon in the fingers; nor yet a princely diademe that easeeth the head-ach, For what use is there at all of goods and riches to deliver the soule from griefe and sorrow, or to lead a life in rest and repose without cares and troubles? What good is there of great honors, promotions, and credit in court? unlesse they that have them know how to use the same well and honestly; and likewise if they be without them, can skill how to finde no misse of them, but be alwaies accompanied with contentment; never coveting that which is not? And what is this else but reason accustomed and exercised before hand, quickly to restraine and effronces to reprehend the passionate and unreasonable part of the soule, which is given oftentimes to breake out of her bounds; and not to suffer her to range and vague at her pleasure, and to be transported by the objects presented unto her? Like as therefore Xenophon giveth us good counsell: Alwaies to remember the gods, and most of all to worship and honor them when we are in prosperitie, to the end that whensoever we stand in neede, we may more boldly invoke and call upon them; with full assurance that they will supply our necessities, being thus before-hand made propitious and gracions unto us; even so, wise men and such as are of good conceit, ought alwaies to be furnished and well provided of reasons sufficient to serve their turne for to encounter their passions before they arise, to the end that being once laid up in store, they may doe most good when time serveth. For as curle and angrie malives by nature, which at every noise that they heare keepe an eager baying and barking as if they were affrighted, become quiet and appeased by one onely voice which is familiar unto them; and wherewith they have bene acquainted; so it is no small paine and trouble to still and compose the passions of the minde (which as they be and growne wilde) unlesse a man have ready at hand proper and familiar reasons to repress the same so soone as ever they begin to stir and grow out of order.

Now as touching those who affirme that if a man would live in tranquillity and rest, he ought not to meddle nor deale in many affaires, either in publique or private: First and formost thus I say, that they would make us pay deere for tranquillitie of minde, when they would have us buy

when he was bidden to stand up, but cavilled with him after a mocking and jesting manner, what (quoth he) and if you sold a fish would you bid it rise up? Likewise Socrates discoursed familiarly with his fellows and followers as touching Philosophie, even when he was in prison. Whereas Phaethon, notwithstanding he was mounted up into heaven, wept for anger and despight that no man would give him the rule and regiment of the chariot-fleeds belonging to the sunne his father. And as a shoe is wrested and turned according to the fashion of a crooked or play-foot, but never doth the foot writhe to the forme of a shoe; even so it is for all the world with the dispositions of mens minds; they frame their lives and make them like thereto. For it is not use and custome that causeth the best life to be pleasant also unto them that have made choise thereof, as some one haply is of opinion; but wisdom rather and discretion maketh that life which is best to be also sweetest and most pleasant. Since that therefore the source and fountaine of all tranquillitie and contentment of spirit is in our selves, let us cleanse and purifie the same spring, as cleane as possibly we can, that all outward and casuall occurrences whatsoever, may be made familiar and agreeable unto us, knowing once how to use them well.

*If things go crosse, we ought not, in vnto;
To fret; for why? such choler will not broot:
But he that know's when ought is done amisse,
To set all straight, shall chieve full well, I wot.*

Plato therefore compared our life to a game at Tables; wherein the plaier is to winn for the luckiest cast of the dice, but whatsoever his chance is, he must be fure to play it well, and make the best of it: Now of these two points, the former, to wit, a good throw, is not in our power and choise; but the other resteth in us, namely, whatsoever our lot is, to take in good woorth, and to dispose every thing in that place where it may profit most if it fortuneth well: and contrariwise, if it fell out crosse, where it may doe least harme. This (I say) is our part and duty to performe, if we be as wise as we should be. As for brain-sicke fooles, and such as know not how to carrie themselves in this life (like unto those that have crasse and diseased bodies, who neither can abide burning heat nor chilling colde) as in prosperity they spread and set up their failes too high, so in adversitie they strike them as low. Troubled they are mightily with both extremities; or to speake more truly, with themselves, as much in the one as the other, and no lesse in that state which yeeldeth those things that we call and repute Goods. Theodorus that infamous Philosopher, who for his profane opinion was furnamed Atheos, that is to say, The Atheist, was wont to say: That he delivered his speeches with the right hand to his auditors and scholars, but they tooke the same with their left; even so ignorant and untaught persons many times when fortune presenteth herselfe unto them on the right hand, receive her awkwardly, turning to the left side undecently, and by that meanes commit many untoward & lewd parts. But those that be wise doe fare better: for as Thyme yeeldeth unto Bees the quickest and driest hony; even so they out of the most unfortunate accidents that be, can skill often-times to get somewhat which is agreeable and commodious unto themselves. This is then the first and principall point, wherein a man ought to be trained and exercised, upon this must he study and meditate. And like as that fellow, when he flung a stone at a curst bitch, missed her, and chanced to hit his step-mother, saying withall: It makes no matter; for it hath not light amisse; even so we, may turne all our fortune to our owne purpose, and make the best use of it, in case things fall out otherwise than we would or meant. Diogenes his hap was to be banished and driven out of his owne countrey; yet this exile of his proved not ill to him; for by that meanes and thereupon he beganne to studie and professe Philosophie. Zeno the Cittizian had but one frigat or shie-boat left him, and hearing newes that both it and all therein was cast away, drowned and perished in the mids of the sea: O Fortune (quoth he) thou hast done well, to drive us againe to put on our poore and simple scholars habit, and to send us to our gallerie and schoole of Philosophie. What should hinder us then, but that we may follow the examples of these men. Art thou deprived and put out of some publike office or magistracie which thou didst exercise? Go so and live in the countrey; there follow thine owne businesse, and plie thy private affaires: Hast thou made sute and great meanes to be entertained in the Court, and to winde into speciall favour with some Prince and Potentate, and after all thy travell suffered repulse? Well, thou shalt live privately at home, without danger, without trouble. Again, Art thou entred into action, and doest thou manage State affaires, wherein thou hast cares enough, and no time to breathe thy selfe?

The holme water, and hot baines

*Do not so much alay our paines:
And if our limmes be dull or sicke,
Refresh the same and make them quicke:
As when a man himselfe doth see
Advanc't to honour and high degree,
His glory, care and paine doth ease,
Not travell then will him displease.*

as Pindarus saith very well: Art thou in some disgrace, and cast out of favour with reproch, by reason of some slanderous calumnniation or envie? Thou hast a gale of fore-wind at the poope, which will soone bring thee directly to the Muses and to the Academie; that is to say, to follow thy booke, and study Philosophie: for this was Platoes helpe, when he was in disfavour with Demys the tyrant. And therefore one meanes this is (of no small importance) to worke contentment in a mans mind; namely, to looke backe unto the state of famous and renowned persons, and to see whether they (haply) have not suffered the like at any time; as for example: Art thou discontented with thy childlesse estate, for that thy wife hath brought thee no children? Doe but marke the Kings of Rome, how there was not one of them that left the crown unto his sonne. Is it povertie that pincheth thee, so as thou art not able to endure it? Tell mee which of all the Beootians wouldst thou chuse to resemble, sooner than Epaminondas? or what Romane wouldst thou be like unto, rather than Fabrizius? But say thy wife hath plaid false by thee, and made thee weare hornes? Didst thou never reade that Epigram of King Agis at Delphos?

*Agis, of sea and land a crowned king,
Gave me sometime a sacred offering.*

And yet as mightie a Prince as he was, you have heard (I am sure) that Alcibiades lay with his wife Tumax, and she would not bath to call the sonne that she had by him in adulterie, Alcibiades, especially amongst her women & waiting-maidens, whispering and speaking as much softly unto them: But what of all that? This crooked crosse was no bar unto K. Agis, but that he proved the greatest and most renowned personage of all the Greeks in his time. No more was it any hinderance to Stipo, but that he lived all the daies of his life most merrily, and no Philosopher like to him in those daies, notwithstanding he had a daughter that plaid the harlot: and when Metrocles the Cynick reproched him therewith; Is this (quoth he) my fault or hers? To which when Metrocles answered againe: The fault is indeed hers, but the infortunity and mishap is yours: What now, (replied Stipo again) how can that be? Are not (I pray you) all faults and mischances or misfortunes? Metrocles could not deny it: Why then (inferred Stipo at last) what are mischances or misfortunes, other than infortunities and mishaps to them whose mischances they are. By this milde kinde of Sorites and Philosophicall reasoning thus from point to point, he shewed that the reprochfull language of this Cynicall Metrocles was nothing els, but a vaine and foolish baying and barking of a cur-dogge. But on the contrary side, the most part of men are provoked and troubled not onely for the vices of their friends, familiars, and kinsfolke, but also of their very enemies. For reprochfull taunts, anger, envie, malice, and spitefull jealousies, are the mischiefs and plagues (I must needs say) of such especially that have them; howbeit they molest and vex those also that are wiselike and without discretion, no otherwise than the hafty and cholericke fits of our neighbors, the peevish and froward dispositions of our familiar acquaintance, and some shrewd demeanors of our servants in that they go about: with which me thinks you also troubling and disquieting your selfe as much as with any thing else, like unto those Physicians of whom Sophocles thus writeth;

*Who bitter choler cleanse and scoure
With Drugs as bitter and as foure.*

so do unseemely and not wis for the credite of your person, thus to chafe and fret at their passions and imperfections beyond all reason, and shew your selfe as passionate as they. For surely the affaires and negotiations wherewith you are put in trust, and which be managed by your direction, are not executed ordinarily by the ministerie of such persons whose dealings be plaine, simple and direct, as instruments most meet and fit for such a purpose; but for the most part by crooked, rough, and crabbed pieces. To reforme and amend these enormities, I would not have you thinke that it is either your worke and dutie, or an enterprise otherwise easily performed. But if you making use of these, being such by nature as the Chirurgians do of tooth-drawing pincers, and those instruments wherewith they doe bring the edges of a wound together; will shew you selfe milde, moderate, and tractable in every respect, according as the present occasion will give leave; surely you shall not receive so much discontentment and displeasure at the untoward and unhappie dealings of others, as joy in the conscience of your owne good disposition, as making this account, that such ministers of yours do but their kind, like as dogs when they bark: But if you feed and cherish this pusillanimitie and weaknesse of yours, as other follies, you shall be sure to heape up many troubles and follies of other men ere you be aware, which will be ready to fall and run as into some low ground and hollow trench, unto that weaknesse of yours. For what should I say, that some Philosophers reprove the pittie and commiseration which we have for them that are in distresse & miserie, acknowledging that it is a good, and charitable deed to helpe and succour such as be in calamitie, but not commending that condolence and fellow-feeling with our neighbours, as if we yeelded with them unto Fortune? And more than so, the same Philosophers will not permit and give us leave, in case we be subject to some vice and ill disposed, for to be seene and known for to grieve and sorrow therefore: but rather to correct and amend what is amisse, without any shew at all of sad cheere and heavinesse; which being so, consider then how little reason and small cause we have, nay how absurd it were, that we should suffer our selves to be troubled, vexed and angry, in case all those who commerce and converse with us, deale not so well and kindly as they should? But above all things my good friend Paccius, let us fectio this, that our selfe love deceive and seduce us not; let us beware (I say) that we do not so much shew an hatred and detestation of wickednesse and sinne in general; as beware some private and particular regard of our owne, in that we seeme so to abhorre and dread the naughtinesse of those that have to do with us. For to be exceeding much mooved and beyond all measure affectionate at some time to such and such affaires; to cover (I say) and pursue the same over-hotly, and otherwise than in meeete and beleeming; or contrariwise, to loth, despise, and abhor the same, must needs breed discontentments, suspitions, and offences in those persons by whom we seeme either to have bene prevented & disappointed of some things, or to have runne and fallen too soone upon other: But he that is used to carie himselfe cheerefully and with moderation in his affaires, (fall out as they will) and can frame to their events, he will soone learne to negotiate and converse with any man in all dexteritie and gentle behaviour. Well then, let us set in hand againe to discourse of those matters which we have intermitted for a while: for like as in a feaver all things that we taste seeme at the first bitter and unfavorie; but when we see others take without any shew and signification of dislike the same which we spit out, then we blame no more either meats or drinks, but lay the fault upon our disease; even so, when we perceive that other men have entred upon and gone through the same affaires with great alacritie, and without any paine at all, whereof we complained and made much adoe; let us for shame cease to find fault and bee offended so much at the things. And therefore if at any time there shall befall unto us some adverse and crooked accident against our wils, it will be very good for the working of our contentment in minde, not to passe over but to regard such things as at other times have happened to our minds and as we could wish them; but to conferre them together, and by a good medly of them both to darken and dor the worst with laying the better to. But now, whereas we are wont when our eyes be dazzled and offended with beholding that which is too bright & glittering, we refresh & comfort our sight againe with looking upon pleasant colours of flowers, and Greene grassie; herein contrariwise wee direct our mindes and cogitations upon heave and dolorous objects, and violently force our thoughts to be amuzed upon the remembrance of calamities and adverse fortunes, plucking them perforce as it were from the consideration of better. And heere in this place me thinks I may very fitly apply that sentence to our present purpose, which was said to a busie and curious person,

*Ab sparefull minde and most envious hart
Why others faults do'st thou so quickly spie
With eagles sight, but in thine owne thou art
Starke blinde or else do'st winke with howlets eie?*

Even so good sir, How is it that you regard and advise fo wistly your owne miserie and calamitie, making it alwaies apparent and fresh in remembrance, but upon your present prosperitie you set not minde? And like as ventoses, cupping glasses or boxes draw the must corrupt humors to them out of the flesh; even so you gather against your selfe the worst things you have, being no better than the merchant of Chus, who when he sold to others a great quantity of the best wine, fought up and downe tasting every vessell untill he met with that for his owne dinner, which began to sowe and was little better than starke naught. This man had a servant who ranne away, and being demanded what his man had done unto him, for which hee should shew him a paire of heeles? Because (quoth hee) when hee had plentie of that which was good, he would needes seeke for naught. And most men verily are of the same nature, who passing by good and desireable things, which be (as a man would say) the pleasant and potable liquors that they have, betake themselves to those that bee harsh, bad, and unfavourie. But Aristippus was of another humour; for like a wife man and one that knew his owne good, hee was alwaies disposed to make the best of everie occurrence, raising and lifting up himselfe to that end of the ballance which mounted aloft, and not to that which went downward. It fortuned one day that he lost a faire mannor or Lordship of his owne, and when one of his friends above the rest made most semblance to lament with him, and to be angry with Fortune in his behalfe; Heare you (quoth he) know you not that your selfe have but one little farme in the whole world, and that I have yet three houses more left with good lands lying to them? Yes marie do I (quoth the other: ) Why then (quoth Aristippus againe) wherefore doe not we rather pittie your case, and condole with you? For it is meeere madnesse to grieve and sorrow for those things that are lost and gone, and not to rejoice for that which is saved. And like as little children, if a man chance to take from them but one of their gauds, among many other toies that they play withall, throw away the rest for verie curst heart, and then fall a puling, weeping and crying out aright; semblably, as much folly and childishnesse it were, if when fortune thwarteeth us in one thing, we be so farr out of the way and disquieted therewith, that with our plaints and moanes we make all her other favours unprofitable unto us. But wil some one say, What is it that we have? Nay, What is it that we have not? might he rather say: One man is in honour, another hath a faire and goodly house; one hath a wife to his minde, and another a trustie friend.

Antipater of Tarso the Philosopher, when he drew toward his end and the houre of his death, in recounting and reckoning up all the good and happie daies that ever he saw in his life time, left not out of this roll so much as the Bon-voiage that he had when he sailed from Cilicia to Athens. And yet we must not forget nor omit those blessings and comforts of this life which we enjoy in common with many more, but to make some reckoning & account of them: and namely to joy in this, that we live; that we have our health; that we behold the light of the sunne; that we have neither warre abroad nor civill edition and dissention at home; but that the land yeeldeth it selfe arable and to be tilled, and the sea navigable to everie one that will, without feare of danger; that it is lawful for us to speake, and keepe silence at our pleasure; that we have libertie to negotiate and deale in affaires, or to rest and be at our repose. And verily the enjoying of these good things present, will breed the greater contentment in our spirit, if wee would but imagine within our selves that were absent; namely, by calling to minde effoonnes, what a misse and desire those persons have of health, who bee sicke and diseased? How they wish for peace, who are afflicted with warres? How acceptable it is either to a stranger or to a meane person and unknown, for to bee advanced unto honour, or to bee friended in some famous and puissant citie? And contrariwise, what a great griefe it is to forgoe these things when a man once hath them? And surely a thing can not bee great or precious when we have lost it, and the same of no valour and account all the while we have and enjoy it: for the not being thereof, addeth no price and woorth thereto. Neither ought wee to holde these things right great and excellent, whiles wee stand alwaies in feare and trembling to thinke that we shall be deprived and bereft of them, as if they were some woorthie things: and yet all the time that they be sure and safe in our possession, neglect and little regard them as if they were common and of no importance. But we ought to make use of them whiles they be ours, and that with joy, in this respect especially, that the losse of them if it shall so fall out, wee may beare more meekly and with greater patience. Howbeit, most men are of this opinion (as Arcefilas was wont to say) that they ought to follow diligently with their eie and cogitation the Poemes, Pictures, and Statues of others, and come close unto them for to behold and peruse exactly each of them; yea, and consider everie part and point therein from one end to the other: whiles in the meane time they neglect and let alone their owne lives and manners; notwithstanding there be many unpleasant sights to be spied and observed therein: looking evermore without, and admiring the advancements, welfare and fortunes of others: much like as adulterers who have an eie after their neighbours wives, but loath and set naught by their owne.

And

And verily this one point also is of great consequence, for the setting of a mans minde in sure repose; namely, to consider principally himselfe, his owne estate and condition; or at least wife (if he do not so) yet to looke backe unto those that be his inferiours and under him; and not as the most fort do, who love alwaies to looke forward and to compare themselves with their betters and superiors. As for example, slaves that are bound in prison and lie in irons, repute them happy who are abroad at libertie; such as be abroad and at libertie, thinke their state blessed who be manumifed and made free; being once a franchised, they account themselves to be in verie good case if they were citizens; and being citizens they esteeme rich men most happie; the rich imagine it a gay matter to be Lords and Princes; Lords and Princes have a longing desire to be Kings and Monarchs; Kings and Monarchs aspire still higher and would be Gods; and yet they rest not so, unless they may have the power to flash lightnings and shoot thunderbolts, as well as Jupiter. Thus whiles they evermore come short of that which is above them and covet still after it, they enjoy no pleasure at all of those things that they have, nor be thankfull therefore.

*The treasures great I care not for
Of Gyges King so rich in gold;
Such cov'rice I do abhor,
Nor money will I touch untold.
I never long'd with gods above,
In their high works for to compare:
Grand signories I do not love,
Far from mine eyes all such things are.*

A Thracian he was that protested thus. But some other, that were a Chian, a Galatian or a Bithynian (I dare warrant you) not contenting himselfe with his part of honor, credit & authoritie in his owne countie and among his neighbours and fellow-citizens, would be ready to weepe and expostulate the matter with teares, if he might not also weare the habite and ornaments of a Patritian or Senatour of Rome. And say it were graunted and allowed him to be a noble Senatour, he would not be quiet untill he were a Romaine Lord Pretor: Be he Lord Pretor, he will aspire to a Consulship; and when he is created Consul, whine he will and crie if he were not nominated and pronounced the former of the twaine, but elected in the second place. And I pray you what is all this? What doeth a man herein but gather pretended excuses of ingratitude to Fortune, in punishing and chastising himselfe after this manner? But the man who is wife and of sound judgement, in case some one or two among so infinite thousands of us mortall men

*Whom sunne from heaven so daily doth behold,
Who feed on fruits of earth so manifold,*

be either more honoured or richer than himselfe, will not therefore be cast downe straight way, and sit mourning and lamenting for sorrow: but rather in the way as he goeth, and whensoever he cometh abroad, salute & beseech with praise and thanksgiving, that good fortune of his and blessed angell that guideth his life, for that his lot is to live farre better, more at hearts ease, and in greater reputation than many millions of millions of other men. For true it is, that in the solemne games at Olympus, no champion may choose his concurrents with whom he is to wrestle or enter into combat for a prize: but in this life, our state standeth so, and our affaires bee in that manner composd, that everie man hath meanes to match, yea and excell many others, and so to beate himselfe aloft, that he be rather envied than envious; unless haply he be such an one, as will presume to deale with Briareus or Hercules for the Maftrie. Well, when thou shalt behold some great Lord or honorable personage borne aloft in a litter upon mens shoulders, stand not wondring so much at him, but rather cast thine eyes downe a litle lower, & looke upon the poore porters that carrie him. Again, when thou shalt repute that great Monarch Xerxes a right happy man, for that he made a bridge of ships over the Streights of Hellefont; so consider with all, those painfull slaves who under the verie whip and for feare of scourging, digged thorough the mountaine Atlas, and made passage that way for an arme of the sea; as also those miserable wretches, who had their eares cropt and their noses cut off, for that the foresaid bridge by a mightie tempest was injoynted and broken; and therewith imagine with thy selfe what those seely soules might thinke, and how happie they would repute thy life and condition in companie of their owne. Socrates upon a time when one of his familiar friends seemed to complaine and say: What a costly place is this? How deere are things sold in this citie? The wine

wine of Chios will cost a pound; purple is sold for three, and a pinte of honie is held at five dragmes: Tooke him by the hand and led him to the Meale-hall. Loe (quoth he) you may buy here halfe a sextare of good meale for an half-penie. The market (God be thanked) is cheape: from thence he brought him into an Oile-cellar, and where they sold Olives: Here you shall have (quoth he) a measure called Chenix, for two brazen dodkins (a good market beleve me.) He tooke him then with him to the Brokers shops that sold clothes, where a man might buy a suite of apparell for ten dragmes. You see (quoth he) that the peni-worths are reasonable, and things be bought and sold good cheape throughout the citie; even so we, when we shall heare other men say; Our state is but meane, we are exceeding bare, & our condition is passing base: For why? We can not come to be Consuls, we shall never be rulers & governors of Provinces, nor rise to the highest places of authoritie. We may verie well answere in this wise; Nay marie, but our case is right good; we live gallantly, and lead a blessed and happie life: we beg not; we go not from doore to doore to crave folks almes; we are no porters; we beare no burdens; neither like parasites and smell-fests, do we get our bread by flatterie. But forasmuch as we are for the most part grown to this folly, that we are accustomed to live rather according to others than ourselves, and our nature is so far corrupted with a kinde of jealous affectation and envie, that it joyeth not so much in her owne proper goods, as grieveth at the welfare of another) I would advise you not onely to regard those things that be resplendent, glorious and renowned in those whom you admire and esteeme so happie; but also to set open and lift up the vaile a litle, and to draw (as it were) that glittering courtaine of outward shew, apparence and opinion that men have of them which covereth all, and so to looke in. Certes, you shall finde that they have within them many matters of trouble, many grievances and discontentments. That noble Pittacus, so famous for his valor and fortitude, and as much renowned also for wisdom and justice, feasted upon a time certaine of his friends that were strangers: and his wife coming in at mids of the dinner, being angry at somewhat els, overthrew the table, and there lay all under foot. Now when his guests and friends were woonderously dismaied and abashed hereat: Pittacus made no more ado at the matter, but tuning unto them. There is not one of us all (quoth he) but he hath his crosse, and one thing or other to exercise his patience: and for mine owne part this is the onely thing that checketh my felicitie: for were it not for this throw my wife, I were the happiest man in the world: So that of me may these verses be well verified:

*This man who while he is in street or publicke place is happiest thought,
No sooner sets in house his feet
but wo is him: and not for nought.
His wife him rules; and that's a sight
She chides, she fights from morne to night.*

Well my masters, you have many occasions (I am sure) that vex you: as for my selfe I grieve at nothing. Many such secret foreshadowings there be that put them to anguish and paine who are rich and in high authoritie; yea and trouble Kings and Princes themselves; howsoever the common people see no such matter; and why, their pompe and outward glorie covereth and hideth all. For when we read thus in Homer,

*O happy King, sir Agamemnon high
The sonne of Atreus that mighty knight
Borne in good horse, and tall in fortunes lap,
Most puissant rich, and thrall to no mishap.*

This is a cheerful surety of an outward beatitude onely, in regard of his armes, horses, and men of war about him: for the voices which are breathed out and uttered from his passions, which do falsifie that opinion of him; and beare witness of the contrarie: as may appeere by this testimony of himselfe in Homer,

*Great Jupiter god Saturnes sonne,
Hath plung'd me deepe in wo begun.
Euripides also to the like effect;
Your state, old sir, I happy deeme,
and his no lesse I do admire
Who led his life, unknowne, unseen, from danger far, from vaine desire.*

By

By these and such like meditations, a man may by litle & litle spend & diminish that quarrellsome and complaining discontentment of the minde against Fortune, in debasing and casting downe his owne condition with the wonderfull admiration of his neighbors state. But there is nothing that doth so much hurt unto our tranquillitie of minde as this, when our affection and will to a thing is disproportioned unto our might and power; as if we set up greater failes then our vessel will beare, building our hopes and desires as castles in the aire without a sound foundation, and promising our selves more than reason is; for afterwards when by prooffe we see, that we cannot reach thereto, and finde that the successe is not answerable to our conceit, we grumble by and by against fortune, and we blame our destinie; whereas we should accuse our owne follie and rashnes. For neither he that would seeme to shoote an arrow out of a plough; or ride upon to an Oxe backe to hunt the Hare; can say that he is unluckie; nor hee that goeth about to catch the Hart and Hinde with fishers drag-nets, or with grins, snares and traps, may justly finde fault with his fortune, and give out that some wicked angel doth crosse him, or malignant spirit haunt him, if he faile and misse of his purpose: but surely such are to condemne their owne foolishnesse and inconsiderate temeritie, in attempting things impossible. And what might be the cause of such errors and grosse oversight? surely our fond and blinde selfe-love. This is it that causeth men to affect ever to be foremost; this mooveth them to strive and contend for the highest place; this maketh them opinionative in every thing, aiming and reaching at all things unsatiably, and never rest contented. For it sufficeth them not to be both rich and learned; eloquent withall and mightie; good fellows at the table and pleasant companions; minions and favorites of Kings and Princes; rulers of cities and governors of provinces; unless they may be masters also of the swiftest and hottest hounds for running; the principall horses for service and stomacke; quails and cocks of the best game for fight; If they faile in any of these, they be cast downe, and their hearts are done. Demys the elder of that name, not being contented and satisfied in minde that he was the most mighty and puissant tyrant in his time; but because hee was not a better Poet than Philoxenus, nor able to discourse and dispute so learnedly as Plato; in great choler and indignation, he cast the one into a dungeon within the Stone quarries, where malefactors, felons, and slaves were put to punishment; and confined the other as a catie, and sent him away into the Ile Aegine. Alexander the great was not of that disposition, who when Brison the famous runner in the race contended with him for the best game in foot-man-ship, and for the nonce to please the King, seemed to faint and lag behinde, and so to yeeld the honour of the course unto him; being advertised thereof, was mightily offended and displeased with him for it. Very wisely therefore and aptly to this purpose the Poet Homer when he had given this commendation of Achilles,

*Like unto him there is not one in field
Of all the Greekes that serve with speare and shield.*

He inferred presently upon it,
In feats of armes: but for to speake and plead Others there be who can him teach and lead.

Megabyzus the Persian, a great lord, went up one day into the shop of Apelles, where he used to paint; and when he was about to speake (I wot not what) as touching painting-craft, Apelles not enduring to heare him talke so foolishly, staied him and stopped his mouth, saying preely thus unto him: So long fir as you held your tongue, you were taken to be some great man, by reason of your chaines, corquans, and brooches of gold; your purple robes also, which together with your silence commended your person: but now the very pretentive boies here, who grinde oker and such like colours, are ready to laugh at you, hearing you talke so foolishly, you know not what. And yet some there be who thinke that the Stoicks do, but mocke and jest when they heare them hold this opinion: That the wise man (such as they imagine to themselves) is not onely Prudent, Just and Valiant, but ought also to be called an Oratour, a Captaine and a Poet, a rich and mightie man, yea and a very King; whiles they themselves will needs be invested in these titles, and if they be not, then they are displeased and discontent by and by; what reason they have so to be let them answer. Sure I am that among the gods themselves, some have power one way, and some another; and thereupon tooke their sundry denominations accordingly, & rest contented therewith: as for example, one is surnamed Engelium, i. the god of war; another Mantom, i. the president of Prophecies; and a third Cerdous, which is as much to say, as the patron of those that gaine by trafficke. And heereupon it is that Jupiter in Homer forbidding Venus to meddle in warlike and martiall affaires, as nothing pertinent unto her, sendeth her to weddings and bride-chambers, and bids her attend them. Moreover some qualities and things there be, that we seeme to affect and wish; the which are in nature contrary, and will not concur and fort well together: as for example, the profession of eloquence, and the studie of Arts Mathematicall require rest and quietnesse, neither have the students therein neede to be employed in any affaires. Contrariwise, policie and managing of the State and weale publicke, the favours of princes and potentates, are not compassed without much adoo; neither can a man be idle at any time, who either is employed in the service of his country, or attendant in the Court. Much feeding upon flesh and libellal drinking of wine, maketh (I must needs say) the bodie able and strong, but the minde feeble and weake. Likewise, the continuall and excessive care both in getting and keeping goods, may well augment riches and increase our substance: but surely it is the contempt and despisement of worldly wealth, that is a great helpe and meanes to learning and Philolophy. And therefore wee may well conclude; that every man is not fit for every thing: but heerein ech one must be ruled by the sage sentence of Pythim Apollo, and first learne, To know himselfe; then marke and observe to what one thing he is most framed and enclined; and thereto both apply and employ his wits, and not to offer violence to nature, and draw her perforce, as it were, against the haire, to this or that course of life, which she liketh not.

*The horse serv's best in chariot at the till,
The oxe at plough, the ground to eare and till:
Ships under saile the dolphins when they fly,
Must swiftly then do swim their sides fast by:
Who would in wood the wilde bore chase and slay,
Must bring with him the hardie hound away.*

Now if there be one that shall bee angry with himselfe and displeased, that he is not at once both a savage lion of the Forrest, bolde and venturous of his owne strength, and withall a daintie fine puppie of Mila, cherished and fostered in the lappe and boosome of some delicate dame and rich widow; commend me to him for a senselesse foole of all fooles, and to say a sooth, I holde him also as very anaffe and doltish fop, who will needs bee such an one as Empedocles, Plato and Democritus; namely, to write of the world, of the nature and true essence of all things therein, and withall, to keepe a rich olde trot and sleepe with her every night, as Euphorion did; or els like unto those who kept company with Alexander the great, in drinking and gaming (as one Medius did) and yet thinke it a great abuse and indignity (forsooth) if he may not be as much admired for his wealth as Ismenias, and esteemed no lesse for his vertue than Epaminondas. We see that the runners in a race be not discontented at all, if they weare not the garlands and coronets of wrestlers, but rest pleased with their owne rewards, and therein delight and rejoice. It is an olde laid law, and a common proverbe: Sparta is thy lot and Province, looke well to it, and adorne the same. For it is a saying also of wise Salon;

*And yet we will not change our boome
With them, for all their wealth and golde:
Goods passe from man to man full soone,
Our vertue is, a sure free holde.*

Strato the naturall Philosopher, when he heard that Menedemus his Concurrent had many more scholars by far than he: What marvel is that (quoth he) if there more that desire to be washed and bathed, than are willing to be anointed & rubbed. Aristotle writing to Antipater: It is not meet (quoth he) that Alexander alone should thinke highly of himselfe, in that he is able to command so many men; but they also have good cause to be aswell conceited of themselves, who have the grace to beleieve of the gods as they ought. For surely, they that thus can make the best use of their owne estate, shall never be vexed, nor at their neighbours well-fare pine away for very envie. Which of us now doeth require or thinke it fit, that the vine-tree should beare figges, or the olive grapes? and yet we our selves, if we may not have all at once, to wit, the superiority and preeminence among rich men, among eloquent orators and learned clerks, both at home and abroad, in the schooles among Philosophers, in the field among warriors; aswell among flattering claw-backs as plaine spoken and tel-truth friends: to conclude, unless we may goe before all pinching peny-fathers in frugalitie; yea, and surpasse all spend-thrifts in riot and prodigality; we are out of our little wits; we accuse our selves daily like lycophants; we are unthankfully we repine and grumble as if we lived in penury and want. Over and besides, do we not see that Nature herselfe doeth teach us sufficiently in this point? For like as she hath provided

for

for sundry kinds of bruit and wilde beasts, divers sorts of food : for all feed not upon flesh, all pecke not upon seeds and graines of plants, neither doe all live upon roots which they worke from under the ground; even so she hath bestowed upon mankind many meanes to get their living, while some live by grafting and feeding of cattell, others by tillage, some be Fowlers, others Fishers: and therefore ought every man to chuse that course of life which sorteth best with his owne nature, and wholly to apply and set his minde thereto; leaving unto others that which pertaineth to them, and not to reprove and convince Hesiodus when he thus speaketh, although not to the full and sufficiently to the point:

The Potter to Potter doth beare envie,

One Carpenter to another hath a sightfull eye.

For jealous we are not onely of those who exercise the same art, and follow that course of life which we do; but the rich also do envie the learned and eloquent; noble men the rich; advocates and lawiers, captious and litigious sophisters; yea, and (that which more is) gentlemen freeborne, and descended from noble and ancient houses, envie Comedians when they have acted well and with a good grace upon the stage in great Theaters; dauncers also and jesters in the court, whom they see to be in favor and credite with Kings and Princes; and whiles they do admire these, and thinke them happy for their good speed and successe in comparison of their owne doings, they fret and grieve, and out of measure torment themselves. Now, that everie one of us hath within himselfe treasures laid up of contentment and discontentment, and certaine tunnes of good things and evil; not bestowed as Homer said: unto the doore-fill and attic of Jupiters house; but placed in each of our owne mindes, the divers passions whereunto we are subject do sufficiently proove and shew. For such as are foolish and unadvised, doe neglect and let go the very good things that presently they have, and never care to enjoy them, to intensive and earnestly bent are their mindes and spirits alwaies to that which is comming, and future expectation: whereas wise men on the contrary side, call to their fresh remembrance those things that are past, so as they seeme to enjoy the same as if they were present, yea and in make that which is no more, to be as beneficiall unto them, as if they were ready and at hand. For surely that which is present, yielding itselfe to be touched by us but the least moment of time that is, & immediately passing our senses, seemeth unto fooles to be none of ours, nor any more to concerne us. But like as the Roper which is painted in the temple of Pluto, or description of Hell, suffereth an asse behind him to gnaw & cate a rope as fast as he twisteth it of the Spanbroome; even so the unthankfull and senselesse oblivion of many ready to catch and devour all good things as they passe by, yea and to dissipate and cause to vanish away every honest and notable action, all vertuous deeds, duties, delectable recreations and pleasant pastimes, all good fellowship and mutuall societie, and all amiable conversation one with another, will not permit, that the life be one and the same, linked (as it were) and cheined by the copulation of things passed and present; but deviding yesterday from to day, and this day from the morrow, as if they were sundry parts of our life, bringeth in such a forgetfulness, as if things once past had never beene. As for those verily who in their disputations and Philosophicall discourses admit no augmentation of bodies, affirming that every substance continually fadeth and vanisheth, would make us beleeve in word, that each one of us every howe altereth from himselfe, and no man is the same to day, that he was yesterday: but these for fault of memorie not able to retaine and keepe those things that are done and past, no nor to apprehend and estoones call them againe to minde, but suffer every thing to passe away and runne as it were through a sieve, doe not in word but in deed and effect, make themselves void and emptie every day more than other, depending onely upon the morrow, as if those things which were done the yeere past, of late, and yesterday, nothing appertained unto them, nor ever were at all. This is therefore one thing that hindreth & troubleth that equanimity & repose of spirit which we seeke for: & yet there is another that doth it more; and that is this: Like as flies creeping upon the smooth places of glasses or mirrors, cannot hold their feet but must needs fall down, but contrariwise they take hold where they meet with any roughnes, & stick fast to rugged flaws, that they can finde even so these men gliding & glancing over all delectable & pleasant occurrences, take hold of any adverse & heavy calamities, those they cleave unto & remember very wel; or rather as (by report) there is about the city Olynthus a certain place, into which if any flies called Beetles enter in once, they can not get forth againe, but after they have kept turning about, and fetching compasses round to no purpose a long time, they die in the end, whereupon it tooke the name of Cantharolathron; sensibly, men after they fall to the reckoning up & commemoration of their harmes & calamities past, past, are not willing to retire backe, nor to breath themselves and give over multiplying thereupon still. And yet contrariwise, they ought to do after the maner of Painters, who when they paint a table to lay upon the ground, or by a course of dead and dusky colours such as be fresh, gay and gallant, for to palliate & in some sort to hide the unpleasantnes of the other, they ought (I say) to smother and keepe downe the heaviness of the heart occasioned by some crosse mishaps, those that have fallen out of their minde, for to obliterate and wipe them out of their minde quite, and to be freed cleane from them it is not possible: and surely the harmonic of this world is reciprocal and variable, compounded (as it were) of contraries, like as we do see in an harpe or bow; neither is any earthly thing under the cope of heaven, pure, simple, and sincere without mixture. But as Musick doth consist of base and treble sounds; and Grammar of letters, which be partly vocall, & partly mute, to wit, vowels and consonants, and he is not to be counted a Grammarian and Musician, who is offended and displeased with either of those contrarie elements of the arte, but he that affecteth the one as well as the other, and knoweth how to use and mixe both together with skil for to serve his purpose; even so considering that in the occurrences of mans life there be so many contrarieties, and one weigheth against another in maner of counterpoise; for (according to Empyricides)

It cannot stand with our affaires,

that good from bad should parted bee:

A medley then of mixed paires

doth well, and serves in each degree.

It is not meet that we should let our hearts fall and be discouraged with the one sort whensoever it hapneth, but we ought according to the rules of harmonic in Musick, to stop the point alwaies of the woorth, with strokes of better, and by overcasting misfortunes (as it were) with a vaile and curtaine of good haps, or by setting one to the other, to make a good composition and a pleasant accord in our life, fitting and sorting our owne turnes. For it is not as Menander said,

Each man so soone as he is borne,

one spirit good or angell hath,

Which him assist: both even and morne,

and guides his steps in every path.

but rather according to Empedocles: No sooner are we come into the world, but each one of us hath two angels, called Dæmones, two Destinies (I say) allotted unto us, for to take the charge and government of our life, unto which he attributeth divers and sundry names,

Here Chthonie was, a downward looker hat hat,

Heliopie eke, who turneth to the sunne,

And Dæris shee, that loves in blood to bat,

Harmonie smiles ever and anon,

Calisto faire and Aeschre foule among,

Thoofa swift, Dinæa stout and strong,

Nemertes who is lovely white and pure,

But Alaphie with fruis black and obscure.

Insomuch, as our Nativitie receiving the seeds of each of all these passions blended and confused together, and by reason thereof the course of our life not being uniforme, but full of disordered and unequal dispositions, a man of good and sound judgement ought to wish and desire at Gods hand the better, to expect and looke for the woorth, and to make an use of them both, namely by abridging and cutting off that which is excessive and too much: For not he onely (as Epicurus was wont to say) shall come with most delight and pleasure to see the morrow-lunne, who made least account thereof on the eeven; but riches also, glorie, authoritie and rule doth most rejoice their hearts who least feared the contrarie: for the vehement and ardent desire that a man hath to any of these things, doth imprint likewise an exceeding feare of forgoing and losing the same, and thereby maketh the delight of enjoying them to be feeble and nothing firme and constant; even as the blase and flame of the fire which is blown and driven to and fro with the wind. But the man who is so much assisted with reason, that he is able without feare and trembling to say unto Fortune:

ἔλθ' ὅτε αὖτις φέρῃς, ὅλκον δ' ἔχεις ἐν ἀνελπίστῃ.

Wel come to me, if good: how bringest thou't,

And if thou faile, I will take little thought.

Orthus:

*Well maist thou take from me some joy of mind,
But little griefe, thou shalt me leave behind.*

hath this benefit by his confidence and resolution: that as he taketh most joy of his good fortunes when they are present; so he never feareth the losse of them, as if it were a calamitie insupportable. And herein we may awell imitate as admire the disposition and affection of Anaxagoras, who when he heard the newes of his sons death I know full well (quoth he) when I begot him that die he must: and after his example, whosoever any infortunitie hapneth, to be readie with these & such like speeches: I know that riches were not permanent, but transitorie and for a day: I never thought other, but that they who conferred these dignities upon me both might and could deprive me of them I wist: that I had a good wife and vertuous dame, but withalla woman and no more: I was not ignorant that my friend was a man (that is to say) a living creature by nature mutable, as Plato used to say. And verily, such preparations and dispositions of our affections as these, if peradventure there shall befall unto us any thing against our intent and minde, but not contrarie to our expectation, as they will never admit such passionate words as these (I never thought it would have fallen out so, I was in great hope of other matters, and little looked I for this) so they shall be able to rid us of all sudden pantings and leapings of the hart, of unquiet & disorderly beating of the pulses, and soone stay and seile the furious & troublesome motions of impatience. Carnesides was wont in time of greatest prosperitie to put men in minde of a change; for that the thing which hapneth contrarie to our hope and expectation, is that which altogether and wholly doth breed sorrow and griefe. The kingdom of the Macedonians was not an handfull to the Romaine Empire and dominion; and yet king Persius when he had lost Macedonie, did not only himselfe lament his owne fortune most pitiously, but in the eyes also of the whole world he was reputed a most unfortunate and miserable man. But behold Pandus Aemilius whose hap it was to vanquish the said Persius, when he departed out of that Province, and made over into the hands of another his whole armie, with so great command both of land and sea, was crowned with a chaplet of flowers, and so did sacrifice unto the gods with joy and thanksgiving in the judgement of all men, woorthily extolled and reputed as happie. For why? when he received first that high commission and mightie power withall, he knew full well, that he was to give it over and resigne it up when his time was expired; whereas Persius on the contrarie side, lost that which he never made account to lose. Certes even the Poet Homer hath given us verie well to understand, how forcible that is, which hapneth besides hope and unlooked for, when he bringeth in Ulysses upon his returne, weeping for the death of his dog; but when he fate by his owne wife who shed teares plentifully, wept not at all; for that he had long before at his leisure against this comming home of his, prevented and brought in to subjection (as it were) by the rule of reason, that passion which otherwise hee knew well enough would have broken out; whereas, looking for nothing lesse than the death of his dog, he fell suddenly into it, as having had no time before to repress the same. In summe, of all those accidents which light upon us contrarie to our will; some grieve and vex us by the course and instinct of nature; others (and those be the greater part) we are wont to be offended and discontented with, upon a corrupt opinion and foolish custome that we have taken: and therefore we should do verie well, against such temptations as these, to be ready with that sentence of Mander:

*No harme nor losse thou dost sustaine:
But that thou list so for toaine.*

And how (quoth he) can it concerne thee?
*For if no flesh without it wound,
Nor soule win him, then all is found.*

As for example, the base parentage and birth of thy father; the adulterie of thy wife; the losse or repulse of any honor, dignitie or preeminence: for what should let, notwithstanding all these crosses, but that thy bodie and minde both may be in right good plight and excellent estate? And against those accidents which seeme naturally to grieve and trouble us, to wit, maladies, paines and travels; death of deere friends and toward children, we may oppose another saying of Enripides the Poet:

*Alas, alas and well a day:
But why alas, and well away?
Nought els to us hath yet beene delt,*

But that which daily men have felt.

For no remonstrance nor reason is so effectually to restrain and stay this passionate and sensual part of our minde, when it is readie to slip and be carried headlong away with our affections, as that which calleth to remembrance the common and naturall necessitie; by means whereof a man in regard of his bodie, being mixed and compounded, doth expose and offer this handle (as it were) a great vantage whereby fortune is to take hold when the wrestleth against him; for otherwise, a the greatest and most principall things, he abideth fast and sure. King Demetrius having besieged and woon the citie Megara, demanded of Stripo the wife Philosopher, whether he would sell any goods in the sackage and pillage thereof? Sir (quoth he) I saw not so much as one man carrying any thing of mine away; seembably, when fortune hath made what spoile we can, and taken from us all other things, yet somewhat there remaineth still within our selves,

*Which Greeks do what they can or may,
Shall neither drive nor beare away.*

In which regard we ought altogether so to depreffe, debase and throw downe our humane nature, as if it had nothing firme, stable and permanent, nothing above the reach and power of fortune: but contrariwise, knowing that it is the least and woort part of man, and the same fraile, brittle, and subject to death, which maketh us to lie open unto fortune and her assaults; whereas in respect of the better part we are masters over her, and have her at command, when there be-20 ing seated and founded most surely the best and greatest things that we have, to wit, found and honest Opinions, Arts and Sciences, good discourses tending to vertue, which be all of a substance incorruptible, and whereof we can not be robbed: we (I say) knowing thus much, ought in the confidence of our selves to cary a minde invincible and secure against whatsoever shall happen, & be able to say that to the face of Fortune, which Socrates addressing his speech indeed covertly to the Judges, seemed to speake against his two accusers, Anitus and Meletus: We'll may Anitus and Meletus bring me to my death, but hurt or harme me they shall never be able. And even so Fortune hath power to bring a disease or sicknesse upon a man, his goods she can take away, raise she may a slander of him to tyrant, prince or people, and bring him out of grace and favour; but him that is vertuous, honest, valiant and magnanimous, she can not make wic-
30 ked, dishonest, base-minded, malicious & envious: and in one word, she hath not power to take from him a good habitude, setled upon wisdom and discretion, which wheresoever it is alwaies present, doth more good unto a man for to guide him how to live, than the pilot at sea for to direct a ship in her course; for surely the pilot, be he never so skilfull, knoweth not how to still the rough and surging billowes when he would, he can not allay the violence of a tempest, or blustering winde, neither put into a safe harbor and haven, or gaine a commodious bay to anker in at all times and in every coast, would he never so faire, nor resolutely without feare and trembling when he is in a tempest, abide the danger and under-goe all; thus farre forth onely his art fer-40 veth, so long as he is in no despaire, but that his skill may take place;

*To strike main-saile, and downe the lee
To let ship hull, untill he see
The foot of mast no more above
The sea: while he doth not remove,
But with one hand in other fast
Quaketh and pantereth all agast.*

But the disposition and staid minde of a prudent man, over and besides that it bringeth the body into a quiet and calme estate, by dissipating and dispatching for the most part the occasions and preparatives of diseases, and that by continent life, sober diet, moderate exercises, and travels in measure; if haply there chance some little beginning or indisposition to a passion, upon which the minde is ready to runne it selfe, as a ship, upon some blinde rocke under the water,
50 it can quickly turne about his nimble and light crosse-saile yard, as Aesclepiades was wont to say, and so avoid the danger.

But say there come upon us some great and extraordinary accident, such as neither we looked for, nor be able by all the power we have, either to overcome or endure; the haven is neere at hand, we may swim safely thither out of the body, (as it were) out of a vessell that leaketh and taketh water, and will no longer holde a passenger: as for foolish folke, it is the feare of death, and not the love of life that causeth them to cling and stick close to the body, hanging and clapping

claspeth thereunto no otherwise than Ulysses to the wilde figge tree, who hee feared with great horror, the gulfes Charybdes roaring under him;

Whereas the winds would not permit to stay,

Nor suffer him to rowe or saile away:

displeased infinitely in the one, and dreading fearefully the other. But he that, some measure (be it never so little) knoweth the nature of the soule, and casteth this with himselfe: That by death there is a passage out of this life, either to a better state, or at least worse not: a worle: certes he is furnished with no meane way-faring provision to bring him to the security of mind in this life, I meane the fearelesse contempt of death: for he that may (so long as vertue and the better part of the soule (which indeed is proper unto man) is predominant) live pleasantly; and when the contrary passions, which are enemies to nature, doe prevaile, depart resolutely without feare, saying thus unto himselfe:

God will me suffer to be gone

When that I will myselfe, anon.

What can we imagine to happen unto a man of this resolution, that should encumber, trouble or terrifie him? for whosoever he was that said: I have prevented thee (O Fortune) I have stopped up all thy avenewes, I have intercepted and choked all the waies of access and entry; surely he fortified himselfe, not with barres and barricadoes, not with locks and keyes, ne yet with mures and walles, but with Philosophieall and sage lessons, with sententious sawes, and with discourses of reason, whereof all men that are willing, be capable. Neither ought a man to discredit the truth of these and such like things which are committed in writing, and give no beleefe unto them, but rather to admire, and with an affectionate ravishment of spirit embrace and imitate them; yea, and withall to make a triall and experiment of himselfe; first in smaller matters, proceeding afterwards to greater, until he reach unto the highest, and in no wise to shake off such meditations, nor to shift off and seeke to avoid the exercise of the minde in this kinde, and in so doing, he shall haply finde no such difficultie as he thinketh. For as the effeminate delicacy and nicenesse of our mind, amsted alwaies and loving to be occupied in the most easie objects, and retiring est-soones from the cogitation of those things that fall out troffe, unto such as tend unto greatest pleasure, causeth it to be soft and tender, and imprinteth a certaine daintinesse not able to abide any exercise; so if the same minde would by custome learne and exercise it selfe in apprehending the imagination of a maladie, of paine, travell, and of banishment, and enforce it selfe by reason to withstand and strive against each of these accidents, it will be found and seene by experience, that such things which through an erroneous opinion were thought painefull, grievous, hard and terrible, are for the most part but vaine in deed, deceitfull and contemptible: like as reason will shew the same if a man would consider them each one in particular. Howbeit the most part mightily feare and have in horror that verse of Menander,

No man alive can safely say,

I his case shall never me assay.

as not knowing how materiall it is to the exempting and freeing of a man from all griefe and sorrow, to meditate before-hand, and to be able to looke open-eyed full against fortune, and not to make those apprehensions and imaginations in himselfe soft and effeminate, as if hee were fostered and nourished in the shadow, under many foolish hopes which ever yeeld to the contrary, and bee not able to resist so much as any one. But to come againe unto Menander, we have to answer unto him in this maner: True it is indeed, there is no man living able to say: This or this shall never happen unto me; howbeit, thus much may a man that is alive say and assever: So long as I live I will not do this, to wit, I will not lie; I will never be a coufiner, nor circumvent any man; I will not defraud any one of his owne; neither will I fore-lay and surpris any man by a wile. This lieth in our power to promise and performe, and this is no small matter, but a great meane to procure tranquillitie and contentment of minde. Whereas contrariwise, the remorse of conscience when as a man is privie to himselfe, and must needs confesse and say: These and these wicked parts I have committed, festereth in the soule like an ulcer and fore in the flesh; and leaveth behind it repentance in the soule, which fretteth, gallereth, gnaweth, and setteth it a bleeding fresh continually. For, whereas all other sorrowes, griefes, and anguishes, reason doth take away; repentance onely it doth breed and engender, which together with shame biterh and punisheth it selfe; for like as they who quiver and shake in the feavers called Epidi; or contrariwise burne by occasion of other agues, are more afflicted and more at ease ease than those who suffer the same accidents by exterior causes, to wit, winters cold or summers heat; even so all mischances and casuall calamities, bring with them lighter dolours and paines as coming from without. But when a man is forced thus to confesse,

My selfe I may well thanke for this,

None els for it blame worthy is.

which is an ordinary speech of them who lamentably bewaile their finnes from the bottome of their hearts, it causeth griefe and sorrow to be so much more heavy, and it is joynd with shame and infamie: whereupon it cometh to passe, that neither house richly and finely furnished, nor heapes of gold and silver; no parentage or nobilitie of birth, no dignitie of estate and authority how high soever, no grace in speech; no force and power of eloquence; can yeeld unto a mans life such a caline (as it were) and peaceable tranquillitie; as a soule and conscience cleere from wicked deeds, sinfull cogitations and lewd desseignes, which having the source & fountaine of life (I meane the inward disposition of the heart) not troubled & polluted, but cleere and clemented; from whence all good and laudable actions do flowe and proceed, and the same doe give a lively, cheerefull, and effectual operation, even by some divine instinct and heavenly inspiration, together with a bold courage and haughty minde, and withall yeeld the remembrance of a vertuous and well led life, more sweete, pleasant, firme and permanent, than is that hope whereof Pindarus writeth, the nurse and softresse of old age: for we must not thinke, that (as Orpheus was wont to say) the * Censers or perfuming pannes wherein sweet incense is burned, to reteine and render the pleasant odor along time after they be empty, and that the vertuous deeds of a wise and honest man, should not alwaies leave behind them in the soule an amiable, delightful, and fresh remembrance thereof; by meanes whereof, that inward joy being watered, is ever greene, buddeth and flourisheth still, despising the shamefull error of those who with their plaints, moanes, and wallings, diffame this life of ours; saying: It is a very hell and place of torments, or else a region of confined and exiled soules, into which they were sent away and banished forth of heaven. And heere I cannot choose but highly commend that memorable saying of Diogenes, who seeing once a certeine stranger at Lacedemon dressing and trimming himselfe very curiously against a feastivall & high day: What meanes all this (quoth he) my good friend? to a good and honest man is not everie day in the yeere a feast and holy day? yea verily, 30 and if we be wise we should thinke all daies double feasts, and most solemne gaudie-daies: for surely this world is a right sacred and holy temple, yea and most divine, becomming the majestie of God, into which man is inducted and admitted at his nativitie, not to gaze and looke at statues and images cut and made by mans hand, and such as have no motion of their owne, but to behold those works and creatures which that divine spirit and almightie power in wonderfull wisdom and providence hath made and shewed unto us sensible; and yet (as Plato saith) representing and resembling intelligible powers, from whence proceed the beginnings of life and mooving, namely the sunne, the moone, the starres; what should I speake of the rivers which continually send out fresh water still; and the earth which bringeth forth nourishment for all living creatures, and yeeldeth nutriment likewise to every plant? Now if our life be the 40 imitation of so sacred mysteries, and (as it were) a profession & entrance into so holy a religion of all others most perfect, we must needs esteeme it to be full of contentment & continuall joy: neither ought we (as the common multitude doth) attend & wait for the feasts of Saturne, Bacchus, or Minerva, and such other high daies wherein they may solace themselves, make metrie and laugh, buying their mirth and joy for money, giving unto plaiers, jesters, dauncers, & such like their hire and reward for to make them laugh. In which feasts and solemnities, we use to sit with great contentment of minde, arraied decently according to our degree and calling, (for no man useth to mourne and lament, when he is professed in the mysteries of Ceres, and received into that confraternitie; no man sorroweth when he doth behold the goodly fights of the Pythian games; no man hungreth or fasteth during the Saturnals;) what an indignitie and 50 shame is it then that in those feasts which God himselfe hath instituted, and wherein (as a man would say) he leadeth the daunce, or is personally himselfe to give institution and induction, men should contaminate, pollute and profane as they do, dishonoring their life for the most part, with weeping, wailing, sighing and groning, or at the leastwise in deepe thoughts & pensive cares. But the greatest shame of all other is this; that we take pleasure to heare the organs and instruments of musicke found pleasantly; we delight to heare birdes singing sweetly; we behold with right good will, beastes playing, sporting, dauncing, and skipping feately; and contrariwise wee are offended when they howle, roare, snarle, and gnash their teeth, as also when they shew a fierce, sterne, and hideous looke; and all this while seeing our owne lives heaue, sad, trauailed and oppressed with most unpleasant passions, most intricate and inexplicable affaires, and overwhelmed with infinite and endlesse cares; yet we will not afford our selves some reit and breathing time; nay (that which more is) we will not admit the speech and remonstrances of our friends and familiars, whom if we would give eare unto, we might without fault finding receive the present, remember with joy and thanksgiving that which is past, and without distrust, suspicion and feare, expect with joyfull and lightsome hope that which is to come.

OF VNSEEMELY AND NAUGHTY BASH- FULNESSE.

The Summarie.

Althoughe it be needlesse to stand curiously upon the concatenation and coherence of these matters handled by Plutarch, how they be knit and linked together, considering that he penned these discourses of his at sundrie times; and both they who haue reduced them into one volume; and those also who haue translated them out of Greeke into other languages, haue not all followed one order: yet I thinke verily that this present Treatise, as concerning Naughtie Bashfulness, is fitly joined next to the former, as touching the repose and tranquillitie of the spirit. For one of the greatest shaking cracks that our soule can receive in her tranquillitie, is when she secretly and by stealth may be lifted from her seat, for to driue a man to those things which may trouble him immediately, and much more afterwards. Now this euill bashfulness hath this vicious and dangerous qualitie, to know how to seduce and draw us by faire semblant, and nevert helesse to trouble & confound after a strange fashion the contentment of our spirits, as appereth plainly in this little booke, which deserueth to be well perused and considered by all sorts of people. Now after he hath shewed what this euill shamefastnes is; he declareth that it is no lesse pernicious and hurtfull then impudencie; adding moreover that wee ought to take good heed, lest in avoiding it, we fall into contrarie extremities, as they do who are enuious, shamelesse, obstinate, idle and dissolute. Then he proceedeth to teach us, that the first and principall preservative against this poison is, to holde it for to be most dangerous and deadly, which he doth verifie and prooue by notable examples. Which done, he describeth particularly and from point to point, the incommunities, perils, and misfortunes that come by naughty bashfulness, applying thereto good and proper remedies, giuing withall many sage and wise counsels drawn out of Philosophie, tending to this stop and marke; that neither the regard of our friends, kinsfolke and familiars, nor yet the respect of any thing else besides, ought to draw from our thought, our mouth or hands, any thing contrarie to the dutie of an honest man: which both for the present, and also all the rest of our life may leaue in our soule, the cicatrice or scar of repentance, sorrow and heavinesse. In conclusion, to the end that we should not commit those deeds in haste, which afterwards we may repent at lesse; he sheweth that we ought to haue before our eyes the hurts and inconueniences caused before by euill bashfulness, that the consideration thereof might keepe us from falling into fresh and new faultes.

OF VNSEEMELY AND naughtie bashfulnesse.

Mong those plants which the earth bringeth forth, some there are which not onely by their owne nature bee wilde and savage, and withall bearing no fruit at all; but (that which woofe is) in their growth doe hurt unto good seeds and fruitfull plants: and yet skilful gardeners and husbandmen, iudge them to be arguments and signes, not of bad ground, but rather of a kinde and fat soile; semblably the passions and affections of the minde, simply and in themselves are not good, howbeit they spring as buds and flowers from a towardy nature, and such as gently can yeeld it selfe to be wrought, framed, and brought into order by reason. In this kinde I may range that which the Greekes call δυσωμία, which is as much to say, as a foolish and rusticall shamefastnes; no euill signe in it selfe, howbeit the cause and occasion of euill and naughtinesse. For they that be giuen to bash and shame over-much and when they should not, commit many times the same faultes that they doe, who are shamelesse and impudent: heere onely is the difference, that they, when they trespass and do amisse, are displeased with themselves, and grieve for the matter; whereas these take delight & pleasure therein: for he that is gracelesse and past shame, hath no sence or feeling of griefe when he hath committed any foule or dishonest act; contrariwise, whosoever be apt to bash & be ashamed quickly, are soone moved & troubled anon, even at those things which seeme onely dishonest, although they be not indeed. Now, lest the equivocation of the word might breed any doubt, I meane by δυσωμία, immoderate bashfulness, whereby one blusheth for shame exceedingly and for every thing, whereupon such an one is called in Greeke δυσωπύς, for that his visage and countenance together with his mind changeth, fallett and is cast downe: for like as καταπίπτειν in Greeke is defined to be a sacred heavinesse, which causeth a downe-looke; even so, that shame and dismaiednesse which maketh us that we dare not looke a man in the face as we should and when we ought, the call δυσωμία. And hereupon it was that the great Orator Demosthenes said of an impudent fellow, that he had in his eyes not νεγες, but μεγας. i. harlots, playing prettily upon the ambiguity of the word νεγες, which signifieth both the round apple in the eyes, and also a maiden or virgine: but contrariwise the over-bashfull person (whom wee speake of) sheweth in his countenance a minde too soft, delicate and effeminate, and yet he flattereth himselfe therein, and calleth that fault (wherein the impudent person surpasseth him) Shamefastnesse. Now Cato was wont to say, That he loved to see yong folke rather to bluish than to looke pale; as having good reason to acquaint and teach youth to dread shame and reproch more than blame and reproofe; yea, and suspicion or obloquie, rather than perill or danger.

Howbeit, we must abridge & cut off the excesse and over-much, which is in such timidity and feare of reproch; for that often-times it cometh to passe in some, who dreading no lesse to heare ill and be accused, than to be chastised or punished; for false hearts are frightened from doing their duty, and in no wise can abide to haue an hard word spoken of them. But as we are not to neglect these that are so tender, nor ought to feed them in their feeblenesse of heart; so againe, we must not praise their disposition who are stiffe and inflexible: such as the Poet describeth, when he saith:

Who fearelesse is, and basheth not all men fast to behold;
In whom appeares the dogged force
of Anaxarchus bold:

but we ought to compound a good mixture and temperate medley of both extremities, which may take away this excessive obstinacie which is impudence, and that immoderate modestie which is meere childishnesse and imbecillitie. True it is that the cure of these two maladies is difficult; neither can this excesse both in the one and the other be cut off without danger. For like as the skillfull husbandman when he would rid the ground of some wilde bushes and fruitlesse plants, he laieth at them mainly with his grubbing hooke or mattocke, untill he haue fetched them up by the roote; or else sets fire unto them and so burneth them; but when he comes to proue or cut a vine, an apple tree, or an olive, he carrieth his hand lightly for feare of wounding any of the sound wood, in fetching off the superfluous and ranke branches, and so kill the heart thereof; even so the Philosopher, intending to plucke out of the mind of a yong man, either envie, an unkind and savage plant, which hardly or unneth at all may be made gentle and brought to any good use; or the unseasonable and excessive greedines of gathering good, or dissolute and disordinate lust; he never feareth at all in the cutting thereof, to draw blood, to presse and pierce hard to the bottom, yea and to make a large wound and deepe skarre. But when he setteth to the keene edge of remembrance and speech, to the tender and delicate part of the soule, for to cut away that which is excessive or overmuch, to wit, wherein is seated this unmeasurable and sheepish bashfulness, he hath a great care and regard, lest ere he be aware he cut away therewith, that ingenuous and honest shamesfastnesse that is so good and commendable. For wee see that even nourishes themselves when they thinke to wipe away the filth of their little infants, and to make them cleane; if they rub anything hard, otherwhiles fetch off the skin withall, make the flesh raw and put them to paine. And therefore we must take heed, that in seeking by all meanes to do out this excessive bashfulness utterly in yong people, we make them not brazen faced, such as care not what is said unto them, and blush thereat no more than a black dog, and in one word standing still in any thing that they do; but rather we ought to doe, as they, who demolish and pull downe the dwelling houses that be neere unto the temples of the gods; who for feare of touching any thing that is holy or sacred, suffer those ends of the edifices and buildings to stand still, which are next and joined close thereto; yea and those they underprop and stay up, that they should not fall downe of themselves; even so (I say) beware and feare we must, whiles we be tempering about this immoderate shamesfastnesse for to remove it, that we do not draw away with it grace and modesty, gentleness and debonariy which be adjacents and lie close unto it; under which qualities lieth lurking and sticketh close to, the foresaid naughty bashfulness, flattering him that is possessed therewith, as if he were full of humanitie, courtesie, civilitie and common sense; not opinionative, severe, inflexible and untractable: which is the reason, that the Stoicke Philosophers when they dispute of this matter, have distinguished by severall names, this aptnes to blush or overmuch bashfulness, from modestie and shamesfastnesse indeed: for feare lest the equivocation and ambiguity of one common word, might give some occasion and vantage to the vicious passion it selle to do some hurt. As for us, they must give us leave to use the termes without calumniation, or rather permit us to distinguish according to Homer, when he saith, neither without good cause is it, that in the former place he putteth downe the harme and discommoditie thereof: for surely it is not profitable but by the meanes of reason, which cutteth off that which is superfluous, and leaveth a meane behinde.

Shame is a thing that doth mickle harme, and profiteth as much.

To come then unto the remedies thereof; it behooveth him first and formost, who is given to blushing at every smal matter, to beleve & be perswaded, that he is possessed with such an hurtfull passion: (now there is nothing hurtfull, which is good and honest) neither ought he to take pleasure and delight when he shall be tickled in the eare with praises and commendations, when he shall heare himselfe called gentle, jolly and courteous, in steed of grave, magnanimous and just; neither let him do as Pegasus the horse in Euripides, who

When mount his back Bellerophon's should,

With trembling stoupe more than his owne selfe would.

that is to say, give place and yeeld after a base manner to the demands and requests of everie man; or object himselfe to their wil and pleasure, for feare (forsooth) lest one should say of him Lo what a hard man is this? See how inexorable he is. It is reported of Bacchorus a king of Egypt, that being rough, fell & austere, the goddesse Isis sent the serpent called Apsis, for to wind and wreath about his head, and so to cast a shadow over him from above, to the end that hee might be put in minde to judge aright: but this excessive shamesfastnesse which alwaies overspreadeth and covereth them, who are not manly but faint-hearted and effeminate, not suffering them once to dare, to deny, or gainsay any thing, surely would avert and withdraw judges from doing justice close up their mouthes, that in counsels and consultations should deliver their opinion frankly; yea and cause them both to say and do many things inconsiderately against their minde, which otherwhiles they would not. For looke whosoever is most unreasonable and importunate, he will ever tyrannize and dominie over such an one, forcing by his impudencie the bashfulness of the other: by which meanes, it cometh to passe that this excessive shame,

shame, like unto a low piece of soft ground which is ready to receive all the water that comes, and apt to be overflowed and drowned, having no power to withstand and repulse any encounter, say a word to the contrary whatsoever is proposed, yeeldeth access to the lewdest desires, acts and passions that be. An evill guardian and keeper of childhood and yong age, is this excessive bashfulness, as Brytus well said, who was of this minde, that neither he nor she could well and honestly passe the flower of their fresh youth, who had not the heart and face to refuse and denie any thing; even so likewise, a bad governesse it is of the bride-bed and womens chamber, according to that which shee saide in Sophocles to the adulterer, who repented of the fact,

Thy flattering words have me seduced,

And so perswaded, I am abused.

In such sort as this bashfulness, over and besides, that it is vicious and faultie it selfe, spoileth and marreth cleane the intemperate & incontinent person, by making no resistance to his appetites and demands, but letting all ly unfortified, unbard, and unlockt, yeelding easie access and entrance to those that will make assault and give the attempt, who may by great gifts and large offers catch and compass the wickedest natures that be: but surely by perswasions and inductions, and by the meanes withall of this excessive bashfulness, they oftentimes conquer and get the mastery even of such as are of honest and gentle disposition. Here I passe by the detriments and damages that this bashfulness hath beene the cause of, in many matters and that of profite and commoditie: namely, how many men having not the heart to say nay, have put forth and lent their money even to those whose credite they distrust; have beene sureties for such as otherwise they would have beene loth and unwilling to engage themselves for, who can approve and commend this golden sentence (written upon the temple of Apollo) Be surety thou maist, but make account then to pay: howbeit, they have not the power to do themselves good by that warning, when they come to deale in the world. And how many have come unto their end and died by the meanes of this foolish qualitie, it were hard to reckon. For Creon in Euripides when he spake thus unto Medea,

*For me Madame, it were much better now
by fast deniall your minde to discontent;*

Than having once thus yeelded unto you sigh afterwards full sore, and ay repent.

gave a very good lesson for others to follow; but himselfe overcome at length through his foolish bashfulness, granting one day longer of delay at her request, overthrew his owne state, and his whole house. Some there were also who doubting and suspecting that they were laide for, to be bloodily murdered, or made away by poison, yet upon a foolish modestie not refusing to go into the place of daunger, came to their death and were soone destroyed. Thus died Dionys, who notwithstanding hee knew well enough that Callippus laide wait for him to take away his life, yet (forsooth) abashed he was to distrust his friend and host, and so to stand upon his guard. This was Antipater the sonne of Cassander massacred; who having first invited Demetrius to supper, was bidden the morrow after to his house likewise; and for that he was abashed to mistrust Demetrius, who the day before had trusted him, refused not to go, but after supper he was murdered for his labour. Moreover, when Polyperchon had undertaken and promised unto Cassander for the summe of one hundred talents to kill Hercules (a base sonne of king Alexander by lady Barysne) he sent and requested the said Hercules to sup with him in his lodging, the yong gentleman had no liking at all to such a bidding, but mistrusting and fearing his curtesie, alleged for his excuse that he was not well at ease: whereupon Polyperchon came himselfe in person unto him, and in this maner began to perswade: Above all things my good childe (quoth he) studie and endeavour to imitate the humanitie and sociable nature of your noble father, unlesse haply you have me in jealousie and suspition as if I went about to compass your death. The youth was abashed to heare him say so, and went with him; well, supper was no sooner ended, but they made an end of the yong gentleman also, and strangled him outright: so that it is no ridiculous and foolish advertisement (as some let not to say) but a wise and sage advise of Hesiodus when he saith;

Thy friend and lover to supper do invite,

Thy foe leave out, for he will thee requite.

Be not in any wife bashfull and ashamed to refuse his offer whom thou knowest to hate thee: but never leave out and reject him once who seemeth to put his trust and confidence in thee:

for

for if thou do invite, thou shalt be invited againe; and if thou be bidden to a supper and go, thou canst not choofe but bid againe; if thou abandon once thy distrust and diffidence, which is the guard of thy safety, and so marre that good tincture and temperature by a foolish shame that thou hast, when thou darst not refuse.

Seeing then that this infirmirie and maladie of the minde, is the cause of many inconveniences, alway we must to chafe it away with all the might we have by exercise, beginning at the first like as men do in other exercises, with things that are not very difficult, nor such as a man may boldly have the face to denie: as for example, if at a dinner one chance to drinke unto thee, when thou hast drunke sufficiently already; be not abashed to refuse for to pledge him, neither force thy selfe, but take the cup at his hand and set it downe againe on the boord; againe, there is another perchance that amidst his cups chalenge thee to hazzard or to play at dice; be not ashamed to say him nay, neither feare thou although thou receive a flout and scoffe at his hands for deniall: but rather do as Xenophanes did, when one Lafus the sonne of Hermiones called him coward, because he would not play at dice with him: I confesse (quoth he) I am a very dastard in those things that be lewd and naught, and I dare do nothing at all; moreover, say thou fall into the hands of a prating & talkative busie bodie, who catcheth hold on thee, hangeth upon thee and will not let thee go? be not sheepish and bashfull; but interrupt and cut his tale short, shake him off I say, but go thou forward and make an end of thy businesse whereabout thou wentest: for such refusals, such repulses, shifts and evasions in small matters, for which men cannot greatly complaine of us, exercising us not to blush and be ashamed when there is no cause, do inure and frame us well before-hand unto other occasions of greater importance. And heere in this place, it were not amisse to call unto remembrance a speech of Demosthenes: for when the Athenians being solicited and moved to send aid unto Harpalus, were so forward in the action, that they had put themselves in armes against king Alexander, all on a sodaine they discovered upon their owne coasts Philoxenus, the lieutenant generall of the kings forces, and chiefe admirall of his Armada at sea: now when the people were so astonied upon this unexpected occurrence, that they had not a word to say for very feare: What wilt these men do (quoth Demosthenes) when they shall see the sunne, who are so afraid that they dare not looke against a little lampe; even so I say to thee that art given much to blush and be abashed: What wilt thou be able to do in weightie affaires, namely, when thou shalt be encountered by a king; or if the bodie of some people or state be earnest with thee to obtaine ought at thy hand that is unreasonable? when thou hast not the heart to refuse for to pledge a familiar friend if he chance to drinke unto thee & offer thee a cup of wine? or if thou canst not find meanes to escape and wind thy selfe out of the company of a babling busie bodie, that hath fastened and taken hold of thee, but suffer such a vaine prating fellow as this to walke and leade thee at his pleasure up and downe, having not so much power as to say thus unto him: I will see you againe hereafter at some other time, now I have no leasure to talke with you.

Over and besides, the exercise and use of breaking your selves of this bashfulnesse in praising others for small and light matters, will not be unprofitable unto you; as for example: Say, that when you are at a feast of your friends, the harper or minstrell do either play or sing out of tune; or haply an actour of a Comedie, dearly hired for a good piece of money, by his ill grace in acting, marre the play and disgrace the authour himselfe Menander, and yet nevertheless, the vulgar sort doe applaud, clap their hands, and highly commend and admire him for his deed: in mine advice it would be no great paine or difficulty for thee to give him the hearing with patience and silence, without praising him after a servile and flattering maner, otherwise than you thinke it meet and reason: for if in such things as these, you be not master of your selfe, how will you be able to hold, when some deare friend of yours shall reade unto you either some foolish time or bad poeise that himselfe hath composed? if he shal shew unto you some oration of his owne foolish and ridiculous penning? you will fall a praising of him, will you? you will keepe a clapping of your hands with other flattering jacks? I would not els. And if you doe so, how can you reprove him when he shall commit some grosse fault in greater matters? how shall you be able to admonish him, if the chance to forget himselfe in the administration of some magistracie or in his carriage in wedlocke, or in politike government? And verily, for mine owne part, I do not greatly allow and like of that answer of Pericles, who being requested by a friend to beare false witness in his behalfe, and to binde the same with an oath, whereby he should be forsworne: I am your friend (quoth he) as far as the altar; as if he should have said: Saving my conscience and duty to the gods: for surely he was come too neere already unto him. But he, who hath accustomed himselfe long before, neither to praise against his owne minde, one who hath made an oration, nor to applaud unto him who hath sung, nor to laugh heartily at him who came out with some stale or poore jest which had no grace; hee will (I trow) never suffer his friend and familiar to proceed so farre, as to demand such a request of him, or once be so bolde as to move him (who before had refused in smaller trifies to satisfie his desire) in this maner: Be perjured for me; beare false witness for my sake; or pronounce an unjust sentence for the love of me.

After the same maner we ought to be prepared and provided before-hand against those that be instant to borrow money of us, namely, if we have bene used to deny them in matters that neither be of great moment nor hard to be refused. There was one upon a time, who being of this mind, that there was nothing so honest as to crave and receive, begged of Archelaus the king of Macedonie (as he sate at supper) the cup of golde whereout he drunke himselfe; the king called unto his page that waited at his trencher, and commanded him to give the said cup unto Euripides, who sat at the boord; and withall, casting his eye wistly upon the party who craved it: As for you sir (quoth he) worthy you are for your asking to go without; but Euripides deserves to have, though he do not crave. A woorthy speech, importing thus much, that the judgement of reason ought to be the best master and guide to direct us in our gifts and free liberality, and not bashfulnesse and shame to denie. But wee contrariwise, neglecting and despising many times those that be honest and modest persons, yea, our very familiar friends, who have need of our helpe, and seeme to requite the same, are ready to bestow our bounty upon such as incessantly importune us with their impudent craving, not for any affection that we have to pleasure them, but because we can not finde in our heart to say them nay. Thus did king Antigonus the elder to Bias, after he had bene a long time an importunate begger: Give this Bias (quoth he) a talent, for me thinks he will have it perforce: and yet this Antigonus, of all princes and kings that ever were, had the best grace and most dexterity to put by, and thrust off such unreasonable beggers: for when a beggerly Cynicall Philosopher craved once at his hands a drachme: It is not for a king (quoth he) to give a drachme: Why then (quoth the other againe) give me a talent: Neither is it meet (quoth the king) for a Cynick to receive a talent. Diogenes as he walked otherwiles along the Ceranicum (that is, a street in Athens, where stood erected the statues of worthy personages) would aske almes of those images; and when some marvelled at him therefore: I do it (quoth he) to learne how to take a repulse and deniall. Semblably, we ought first to be trained in small matters, and to exercise our selves in denying slight requests unto such as would seeme to demand and have at our hands that which is not fit and require, to the end that we may not be to seeke for an answer when we would denie them in matters of greater importance: for as Demosthenes was wont to say: He who hath spent and bestowed that which he had otherwise than he should, will never employ those things which he hath, not as he ought, if peradventure he should be furnished againe therewith. And looke how often we doe faile, and be wanting in honest things, and yet abound in superfluities, it is a signe that we are in a great fault, and many waies shame groweth to us by that meanes.

Moreover, so it is, that this excessive bashfulnesse is not onely a bad and undiscereet steward to lay out and disperse our money, but also to dispose of our serious affaires and those of great consequence, wherein it will not admit the advice and counsell that reason giveth; for oftentimes it falleth out, that when we be sicke, we send not for the best and most expert Physicians, in respect of some friend, whom we favour and reverence so, as we are loth to doe otherwise than he would advise us: likewise wee chuse for masters and teachers of our children, not those alwaies who are best and meetest, but such as make sure and meanes unto us to be entertained; yea, and many times, when we have a cause to be tried in the law, we chuse not alwaies the most sufficient & expert Advocates or Barristers for our counsel to plead for us; but for to gratifie some of some familiar friend or kinsman of our owne, we commit the cause to him for to practise and learne to plead in court to our great cost and losse. To conclude we may see manie of those that make profession of Philosophy, to wit, Epicureans, Stoicks, and others, how they follow this or that sect, not upon their owne judgement and election; but for that they were importuned by some of their kinsfolke or friends thereto, whom they were loth to denie. Come on then, let us long before be exercised against such grosse faults in vulgar, final & common occasions of this life; as for example, let us breake our selves from using either a barber to trim us, or a painter to draw our picture, for to satisfie the appetite of our foolish shamefacednesse; from lo:ging also in some bad Inne or Hostellie where there is a better neere at hand, hand, because haply our host the goodman of the house hath oftentimes saluted us kindly; but rather make we a custome of it, (although there be but small difference and odds between one and another) alwaies to chuse the better: and like as the Pythagoreans observed evermore precisely not to crosse the right legge with the left, neither to take an odde number for an even, though otherwise all things else were equal and indifferent; even so are we to draw this into an ordinarie practise, that when we celebrate any solemne sacrifice, or make a wedding dinner, or some great feast, we invite not him, who is wont with reverence to give us the gentle greeting and good morrow, or who seeing us a great way off useth to runne unto us, rather than him whom we know to be an honest man and a well-willer of ours; for whosoever is thus inured and exercised long before, shall be hardly caught and surpris'd; nay rather he shall never be once assailed and set upon in weightie matters. And thus much may suffice as touching exercise and custome.

Moreover to come unto other profitable instructions which we have gathered for this purpose, the principall in mine advice is this, which sheweth & teacheth us, that all the passions and maladies of the minde be ordinarily accompanied with those inconveniences which we would seeme to avoid by their meanes: as for example, ambition and desire of honor hath commonly attending upon it dishonor; paine usually followeth the love of pleasures; labour and travell ensueth upon ease and delicacie; repulse, overthrowes, and condemnations are the ends that ensue daily upon those that are given to be litigious, contentious, and desirous to cast, foile, and conquer others; sensibly it hapneth unto excessive bashfulness, which seeming to be and shun the smoke of blame, casteth it selfe into the very fire and flame of infamie. For those who be abashed to gaine say and denie them, who importune them unreasonably, and will take no nay in things unjust, are constrained afterwards to beare both shame and blame at their hands who justly call them to their answer and accuse them woorthily; and whilst they feare some light checke or private rebuke, many times they are faine to incurre and susteine open disgrace and reproch: for being abashed to denie a friend who craveth to borrow money, as being loth to say they have none, within a while after (with shame enough) they blush, when they shal be convinced to have had none; and having promised to asist and stand to some who have suit in law, by that meanes are forced to contend with others, and afterwards being ashamed thereof, are driven to hide their heads and flie out of the way. Also there be many whom this foolish modestie hath caused to enter into some disadvantageous promise as touching the marriage either of daughter or sister, and being entangled therewith have beene constrained afterwards upon change of minde to breake their word and faile in their promise; as for him who said in old time, that all the inhabitants of Asia served as slaves unto one man; for that they knew not how to pronounce one only negative syllable, that is, No; he spake not in earnest but by way of bourd, and was disposed to jest: but surely these bashfull persons may if they list without one word spoken, by knitting and bending their browes onely, or nodding downward to the ground, avoid and escape many offices and absurd inconveniences, which oftentimes they do unwillingly and onely upon importunitie. For as Euripides said very well,

Wise men do know how things to take:

And of silence an answer to make.

And haply we have more cause to take that course with such as be senselesse and unreasonable: for to those who be honest, sensible, and of more humanitie, we need not feare to make excuse and satisfie them by word of mouth. And for this purpose it were not amisse to be furnished with many answers and notable apothegmes of great and famous persons in times past; and to have them ready at hand to allege against such importunate & impudent fellows. Such was that saying of Phocion to Anipater: You can not have me to be your friend and a flatterer to; likewise the answer which he made unto the Athenians, who were earnest with him to contribute and give somewhat toward the charges of solemnizing a great feast, and withall applauded and clapped their hands: It were a shame (quoth he) that I should give any thing over and above unto you, and not to pay that which I owe to him yonder, pointing therewith to Callicles the usurer; for as Thucydides said; It is no shame to confesse and acknowledge povertie; but more shamefull it is indeed not to avoid and eschew it. But he who by reason of a faint, feeble, and delicate heart dare not for foolish shame answer thus unto one that demaundeth to borrow money,

*My friend, I have in house or purse
No silver white, for to disburse.*

and then suffreth to passe out of his mouth a promise (as it were) an earnest pennie or pawne of assurance,

Is tied by foot with fetters not of brasse

Or you wrought, but shame, and cannot paye.

But Perseus when he lent looth a summe of money to one of his familiar friends and acquaintance, went into the open market place to passe the contract at the very banke or table of exchangers and usurers; being mindfull of that rule and precept of the Poet Hesiodus, which teacheth us in these words,

How ever thou laugh with brother more or lesse,

With him make no contract without witnesse.

now when his friend marvelled hereat and said; How now Perseus, so formally and according to law? Yea (quoth he) because I would receive my money againe of you friendly, & not require it by comte and suit of law. For many there be, who at the first upon a kinde of foolish modestie, are abashed to call for assurance & securitie, but afterward be forced to proceed by order of law, & so make their friends their enemies. Againe, Cato lending commendatory letters unto Deniu the Tyrant, in the behalfe and favour of one Heliconus Cysicena, as of a kind, modest, and courteous person, subscribed in manner of a post-date under his letter thus: That which you read above, take it as written in the commendation of a man, that is to say, of a living creature by nature mutable. Contrariwise Xenocrates, although he were otherwise in his behaviour austere, yet being overcome and yielding to a kind of foolish modestie of his owne, recommended in his letters unto Polyperchon, a man of no worth or qualitie, as it proved afterwards by the sequell: Now when as that Macedonian Lord bade the partie welcome, and friendly gave him his hand, and withall used some words of course and complement, demaunding whether he had neede of ought, and bidding him call for what he would; he made no more ado but craved a whole talent of silver at his hands; which Polyperchon caused presently indeed to be weighed out unto him; but he dispatched his letters withall unto Xenocrates to this effect: That from thenceforth he should be more circumspect, and consider better whom he recommended unto him: and verily, herein onely was the error of Xenocrates, for that he knew not the man for whom he wrote: but we oftentimes knowing well enough that they be leawd and naughty persons, yet are verie forward with our commendatorie letters; yea and that which more is, our purse is open unto them; we are ready to put money into their hands to our owne hinderance and damage; not with any pleasure that we take, nor upon affection unto them, as they do, who bestow their silver upon court-fanes, pleasers, and flatterers to gratifie them; but as displeased and discontented with their impudencie, which overturneth our reason, upside downe, and forceth us to do against our owne judgement, in such sort, that if ever there were cause besides, we may by good reason say unto these bold and shamelesse beggers, that thus take vantage of our bashfulness:

I see that I must for your sake,

Leawd courses ever undertake.

namely, in bearing false witness; in pronouncing wrong judgement; in giving my voice at any election for an unworthie and unmeet person; or in putting my money into his hands, whom I know insufficient, and who will never repay it. And therefore of all passions, this leawd and excessive modestie is that, which is accompanied presently with repentance, and hath it not following afterwards as the rest: for at the verie instant when we give away our money, we grieve; when we beare such witness, we blush; when we asist them and set to our helping hand, we incurre infamie; and if wee furnish them not with that which they require, wee are convinced as though we were not able. And forasmuch as our weaknesse is such, that we cannot denie them simply that which they would have; we undertake and promise many times unto those who do importune & ly upon us uncessantly, even those things that we are not able to copasse & make good; as namely, our commendatorie letters for to finde favour in princes courts; to be mediators for them unto great titlers and governors, and to talke with them about their causes, as being neither willing nor so hardie as thus to say; The king knoweth not us; hee regardeth others more, and you were better go to such and such. After this manner, when Lyfander had offended king Agelamus and incurred his heavy displeasure, and yet was thought woorthie to be chiefe in credit above all those that were about him, in regard of the great opinion and reputation that men had of him for his noble acts, he never bathed to repell and put backe those letters that came unto him, making excuse and bidding them to go unto others, and assay them, who were in greater credit with the king than himselfe. For it is no shame not to be able to effect all things, but for a man to be driven upon a foolish modestie to enterprife such matters, as he is neither able to compasse nor meet to mannage; besides that it is shamefull, I hold it also a right great corrosive to the heart.

But now to goe unto another principle, we ought willingly and with a ready heart to doe pleasure unto those that request at our hands such things as be meet and reasonable; nor as forced thereto by a rustickall feare of shame, but as yielding unto reason and equity. Contrariwise, if their demands be hurtfull, absurd, and without all reason, we ought evermore to have the saying of Zeno in readinesse, who meeting with a yoong man one of his acquaintance, walking close under the towne wall secretly as if he would not be seene; asked of him the cause of his being there, and understanding by him that it was because he would avoide one of his friends; who had bene earnest with him to beare false witness in his behalfe: What saist thou (quoth Zeno) for that thou art? Was thy friend so bold and shamelesse to require that of thee which is unreasonable, unjust and hurtfull unto thee? And dar'st thou not stand against him in that which is just and honest? For whose sake was that said,

*A crooked wedge is fit to cleave
a knotted knurrie tree,
It will be seemes against leawd folke with lewdnesse arms to be.*

teacheth us an ill lesson, to learne to be naught our selves, when we would be revenged of naughtyne. But such as repulse those who impudently and with a shamelesse face doe molest and trouble them, not suffering themselves to be overcome with shamefacednesse, but rather shame to graunt unto shamelesse beggers those things that be shameful, are wise men and well advised, doing herein that which is right and just. Now as touching those importunate and shamelesse persons, who otherwise are but obscure, base and of no worth, it is of no great matter to resist them when they be troublesome unto us. And some there be who make no more ado but shitt them off with laughter or a scoffe: like as Theocritus served twaine who would seeme to borrow of him his rubber or currying combe in the verie baine; of which two, the one was a meere stranger unto him, the other he knew well enough for an notorious theefe: I know not you (quoth he) to the one; and to the other, I know what you are well enough; and so he sent them both away with a meere frumpe. Lyfiasche the priestesse of Minerva in Athens, surnamed Polaris, that is, the patronesse of the citie; when certaine Muleters who brought sacrifices unto the temple, called unto her for to powre them out drinke freely: No (quoth she) my good friends, I may not do so, for feare you will make a custome of it.

Anigonus had under him in his retinue a yoong gentleman, whose father in times past had bene a good warrior, and lead a band or company of souldiours, but himselfe was a very coward, and of no service; and when he succ unto him (in regard of his birth) to be advanced unto the place of his father, late deceased: Yoong man (quoth he) my maner is to recompense and honour the prowess and manhood of my souldiours, and not their good parentage. But if the party who assaileth our modesty, be a noble man, of might and authority (and such kinde of persons of all other will most hardly endure a repulse, and be put off with a deniall or excuse, and namely, in the case of giving sentence or award in a matter of judgement, or in a voice at the election of magistrates) peradventure it may be thought neither easie nor necessarie to doe that which Cato sometimes did, being then but of yoong yeeres, unto Catulus; now this Catulus was a man of exceeding great authoritie among the Romans, and for that time bare the Censureship, who came unto Cato, (then Lord high treasurer of Rome that yeere) as a mediator and intercessour for one, who had bene condemned before by Cato in a round fine, pressing and importuning him so hard with earnest prayer and entreaty, that in the end Cato seeing how urgent and unreasonable he was, and not able to endure him any longer, was forced to say thus unto him: You would thinke it a foule disgrace and shame for you Catulus, Censour as you are, since you will not receive an answer and be gone, if my sergeants and officers here should take you by the head and shoulders, and send you away: with that, Catulus being abashed and ashamed, departed in great anger and discontentment. But consider rather and see, whether the answer of Agellus and that which Themistocles made, were not more modest, and favoured of greater humanity: for Agellus, when his own father willed him to give sentence in a certain cause that was brought before him, against all right, and directly contrary to the lawes: Father (quoth he) your selfe have taught me from my very child-hood to obey the lawes; I will be therefore obedient ent still to your good precepts, and passe no judgement against law. As for Themistocles, when as Simonides seemed to request of him somewhat which was unjust and unlawful: Neither were you Simonides (quoth he) a good Poet, if you should not keepe time and number in your song, nor I a good Magistrate, if I should judge against the law. And yet (as Plato was wont to say) it is not for want of due proportion betweene the necke and body of the lute, that one citie is at variance with another citie, and friends fall out and be at difference, doing what mischief they can one to another, and suffering the like againe; but for this rather, that they offend and faile in that which concerneth law and justice. Howbeit, you shall have some, who themselves observing the precise rules most exactly according to art in Musick, in Grammaticall orthographic, and in the Poeticall quantitie of syllables and measures of feet, can be in hand with others, and request them to neglect and forget that which they ought to do in the administration of government, in passing of judgements, and in their other actions. And therefore with such as these be, I would have you take this course which I will now tell you: Is there an Advocate or Rhetorician that doth importune you sitting as judge upon the bench? or is there an Orator that troubleth you with an unreasonable sute as you sit in counsell? grant them both, that which they request, upon condition that the one in the entrie of his plea will commit a solecisme or incongruity, and the other in the beginning of his narration come out with some barbarisme: but it is all to nothing, that they will never do so, it would be thought such a shame; and in very truth, we see that some of them are so fine eared, that they can not abide in a speech or sentence that two vowels should come together: againe, Is he one of the nobilitie, or a man of honour and authoritie, that troubleth you with some dishonest sute? will him likewise for your sake to passe thorow the market place hopping and dancing, making mowes, and wriking his mouth; but if he denie so to doe, then have you good occasion and fit opportunity to come upon him with this revie, and demand of him; whether of the twaine be more dishonest? to make incongruity in speech, and to make mowes, and set the mouth awry; or to breake the lawes, commit perjury, and beside all right, equitie and conscience, to award and adjudge more unto the leawd and wicked, than to good and honest persons. Moreover, like as Nicostratus the Argive answered unto Archidamus, who sollicitized him with a good summe of money (promising him besides in marriage what Lady he would himselfe chuse in all Lacedaemon) to betray and render up by treason the towne Cromcum: I see well (quoth he) Archidamus, that you are not descended from the race of Hercules, for that he travelled thorow the world, killing wicked persons whom he had vanquished, but your study is to make them wicked who are good and honest; even so we ought to say unto him, who would bee thought a man of worth and good make, and yet cometh to prelle and force us to commit those deeds which are not befitting, that he doth that which becometh not his nobility or opinion of vertue.

Now if they be meane and bale persons to account, who shall thus tempt you, go this way to worke with such: If he be a covetous miser, and one that loveth his money too well, see and trie whether you can induce and perswade him by all importunity to credit you with a talent of silver upon your bare word, without schedule, obligation or specialtie for his security; or if he be an ambitious and vaine-glorious person; trie if you can prevaile with him so much, as to give you the upper hand or higher seat in publicke place; or if he be one that desireth to beare rule and office; assay him, whether he will give over his possibilitie that he hath to such a magistracie, especially when he is in the ready way to obtaine it? Certes, we may well thinke it a very strange and absurd thing, that such as they in their vices and passions should stand and continue so stiffe, so resolute and so hard to be removed; and we who professe and would be reputed honest men, lovers of vertue, justice and equity, can not be masters of our selves, but suffer vertue to be subverted, and cast it at our heeles. For if they who by their importunity urge our modestie, doe it either for their owne reputation or their authoritie, it were absurd and beside the purpose, for us to augment the honour, credit and authority of another, and to dishonour, discredit and disgrace our selves; like unto those, who be in an ill name, and incur the obloquie of the world, who either in publicke and solemne games defraude those of the prizes and rewards who have achieved victory, or who at the election of magistrates, deprive those of their right of suffrages and voices to whom it doth belong, for to gratifie others that deserve it not, thereby to procure to the one sort, the honour of sitting in high places, and to the other the glory of wearing coronets, and so by doing pleasure unto others, falsifie their owne faith, defame themselves, and lose the opinion and reputation they had of honesty and good conscience. Now if we see that it is for his owne lucre and gaine, that any one urge us beyond all reason to do a thing; how is it that we doe not presently consider, that it is absurd and without all sence to hazzard and put to comprinise (as it were) our owne reputation and vertue for another man, to the end that the pursle of some one (I know not who) should thereby be more weightie and heauie?

But certainly many there be unto whom such considerations as these are presented, and who are not ignorant that they tread aside and do amisse; much like to them, who being challenged to drinke off great bolles full of wine, take paines to pledg them with much ado, even so long till their cies be ready to start out of their heads, changing their countenance, and paining for want of winde, and all to pleasure those that put them to it. But surely this feeblenes of minde and faint heart of theirs, resembleth the weake constitution and temperature of the bodie, which cannot away either with scorching heat or chilling cold. For be they praised by those who set upon them thus impudently, they are ready to leape out of their skins for joy; and say they doubt for to be accused, checked, rebuked or suspected, if haply they deny, then they are ready to die for woe and feare. But we ought to be well defended & fortified against the one & the other, that we yeeld neither to them that terrifie us, nor to those that flatter us. Thucydides verily supposing it impossible for one to be great or in high place & not enuid, saith, That the ma is well advised & led by good counsell who stooreth at the greatest & highest affaires, if he must be subject unto envie. For mine owne part, thinking as I do, that it is no hard matter to escape envie, but to avoid all complaints & to keepe our selves from being molested by some one or other that conuerse with us & keepe our company, a thing impossible: I suppose it good counsell for us, & the best thing we can do for our owne safetie, to incurre rather the ill will and displeasure of leaud, importunate, and unreasonable people, than of those who have just cause to blame and accuse us, if against all right and justice we satisfie their minds and be ready to do them service and pleasure: as for the praises and commendations which proceed from such leawd & shamelesse persons, being as they are in every respect counterfeite and fopishlicall, we ought to beware and take heed of; neither must we suffer our selves as swine to be rubbed, scratched, or tickled, and all the whiles stand still and gently, letting them do with us what they will, untill they may with ease lay us all along, when we have once yeilded to be so handled at their pleasure: for surely they that give care to flatterers, differ in no respect from those who set out their legs of purpose to be supplanted and to have their heeles tripped up from under them; save onely in this, that those are woofe foiled and catch the more shamefull fall, I meane as well such as remit punishment to naughtie persons, because forsooth they love to be called mercitull, milde and gentle; as those on the contrary side, who being perswaded by such as praise them, do submit themselves to enmities and accusations needlesse, but yet perilous; as being borne in hand & made beleve they were the onely men, & such alone as stood invincible against all flatterie, yea and those whom they sliche not to tearme their very mouthes & voices; and therefore Bion likened them most aptly to vessels that had two eares, for that they might be caried so easily by the eares which way a man would: like as it is reported of one Aleximus a Sophister, who upon a time as he walked with others in the gallerie Peripatos, spake all that naught was of Stilpo the Megarean: & when one of the company said unto him, What meane you by this, considering that of late & no longer since than the other day, he gave out of you al the good that may be: I wol we (quoth he) for hee is a right honest gentleman, and the most courtoous person in the worlde. Contrariwise Menedemus when he heard that Aleximus had praised him many a time; But I (quoth he) do never speake well of Aleximus; & therefore a bad man he must needs be, that either praiseth a naughty person, or is dispraised of an honest man. So hard it was to turn or catch him by any such meanes, as making use, and practising that precept which Hercules Attithemus taught his children, when hee admonished and warned them that they should never call those thanke who praised them: and this was nothing else, but not to suffer a mans selfe to be overcome by foolish modestie, nor to flatter them againe who praised him. For this may suffice in mine opinion which Pindarus answered upon a time to one who said unto him: That in euery place and to all men he never ceased to commend him: Grand mercie (quoth he) and I will do this favor unto you againe that you may be a true man of your word, & be thought to have spoken nothing but the truth.

To conclude, that which is good and expedient against all other affections and passions, they ought surely to remember who are easily overcome by this hurtfull modestie, whensoever they giving place soone to the violence of this passion, doe commit a fault and tread away against their minde: namely to call to remembrance the markes and prints of remorse and repentance sticking fast in their minde, and to repent efsouones and keepe the same a long time.

For

For like as waifaring men, after they have once stumbled upon a stone; or pilots at sea when they have once split their ship upon a rocke and suffred shipwracke, if they call those accidents to remembrance, for ever after doe feare and take heed not onely of the same, but of such like; even so they that set before their cies continually the dishonours and damages which they have received by this hurtfull and excessive modestie, and represent the same to their minde once wounded and bitten with remorse and repentance, will in the like afterwards reclaime themselves, and not so easily another time be perverted and seduced out of the right way.

OF BROTHERLY LOVE OR AMITIE.

The Summarie.

A Man should have profited but badly in the schoole of vertue, if endeavouring to carry himselfe honestly toward his friends and familiars, yea and his verie enemies, he continue still in euill demeanor with his owne brethren, unto whom he is joined naturally, by the straightest line and linke that can be devised. But for that ever since the beginning of the world, this proverbiall sentence from time to time hath bene current and found true; that the Unitie of Brethren is a rare thing: Plutarch after he had complained in the reuerence of this little booke, that such a maladie as this, raigned mightily in his time goeth about afterwards to apply a remedie thereto. And to this effect he sheweth, that since brotherly amitie is 30 taught and prescribed by nature, those who love not their brethren, be blackish, unnatural, enemies to their owne selves; yea, and the greatest Atheists that may be found. And albeit the obligation wherein we are bound to our parents, amounteth to so high a summe as we are never able fully to discharge; he prooveth notwithstanding, that brotherly love may stand for one verie good payment toward that debt: whereupon he concludeth, that hatred betwene brethren ought to be banished; for that if it once creepe in and get betweene, it will be a verie hard matter to reioine and reconcile them againe. Afterwards he teacheth a readie and compendious way, how a man ought to manage and use a brother ill disposed. In what manner brethren should carrie themselves one to another, both during the life of their father and also after his decease; discoursing at large upon the dutie of those who are the elder or higher advanced in other respects; as also what they should doe, who are the younger; 40 namely, that as they are not equall to their other brethren in yeeres, so they be their inferiours in place of honor and in wealth; likewise what meanes as well the one as the other are to follow, for to avoid envie and jealousy. Which done, he teacheth brethren who in age come verie neere, their natural dutie and kindnesse that they ought to shew one unto another; to which purpose he produceth proper examples of brotherly amitie among the Pagans: In the ende, since he cannot possibly effect thus much, that brethren should evermore accord well together, he setteth downe what counse they are to take in their differences and disagreements; and how their friends ought to be common betweene them; and for a final conclusion, he treateth of that honest care and 50 respectue regard one of another that they ought to have, and especially of their kinsefolke, which he enricheth with two other notable examples.

OF BROTHERLY LOVE or amitie.

These ancient statues representing the two brethren Castor and Pollux, the inhabitants of the citie Sparta, were wont in their language to call Siagras. And two parallell pieces of timber they are of an equall distance asunder, united and joined together by two other pieces overthwart : now it should seeme, that this was a device fitting verie well and agreeable to the brotherly amitie of the said two gods, for to shew that undivisible union which was betweene them; and even so, I also do offer and dedicate unto you, o Nigerrimus and Quintus, this little treatise as touching the amitie of brethren, a gift common unto you both as those who are woorthie of the same:

for seeing, that of your owne accord you practise that already, which it teacheth and exhorteth unto, you shall be thought not so much to be admonished thereby, as by your example to confirme and testifie the same which therein is delivered; and the joy which you shall conceive to see that approved and commended which your selves do, shall give unto your judgement a farther assurance to continue therein; as if your actions were allowed and praised by vertuous and honest beholders of the same.

Aristarchus verily, the father of Theodectes, scoffing at the great number of those Sophisters or counterfeite sages in his daies, said : That in old time hardly could be found seven wise men throughout the world; but in our daies (quoth he) much ado is to finde so many fooles or ignorant persons. But I may verie well and truly saie : That I see in this age wherein we live, the amitie of brethren to be as rare, as their hatred was in times past. The examples wherof being so few as they were among our auncests, were thought by men in those daies living, notable arguments to furnish Tragedies and Theaters with, as matters verie strange and in a manner fabulous. But contrariwise, all they that live in this age if haply they meete with two brethren, that be good and kind one to another, wonder and marvell thereat as much as if they saw those Molionides (of whom Homer speaketh) whose bodies seemed to grow together in one : and as incredible and miraculous doe they thinke it, that brethren should live in common the partition, goods, friends and slaves which their fathers left behind unto them, as if one and the same soule alone ruled the feet, hands and eies of two bodies. And yet nature herselfe hath set downe a lively example of that mutuall behaviour and carriage that ought to be among brethren, and the same not farre off, but even within our owne bodies, wherein she hath framed and devised for the most part those members double, and as a man would say, brethren-like and twinnes, which be necessarie, to wit, two hands, two feet, two eies, two eares, and two nose thrills; shewing thereby, that she hath thus distinguished them all, not onely for their naturall health and safetie, but also for a mutuall and reciprocall helpe, and not for to quarrell and fight one with another. As for the hands when she parted them into many fingers, and those of unequal length and bignesse, she hath made them of all other organically parts, the most proper artificious and workmanlike instruments; inasmuch as that ancient Philosopher Alexander ascribed the verie cause of mans wisdom and understanding unto the hands. Howbeit, the contrarie unto this should seeme rather to be true; for man was not the wisest of all other living creatures in regard of his hands, but because by nature being endued with reason, given to be wittie and capable of arts and sciences, he was likewise naturally furnished with such instruments as these. Moreover, this is well known unto everie man, that nature hath formed of one and the same seed, as of one principle of life, two, three, and more brethren; not to the end that they should be at debate and variance, but that being apart and asunder, they might the better and more commodiously helpe one another. For those men with three bodies and a hundred armes apiece, which the Poets describe unto us (if ever there were any such) being joined and grown together in all their parts, were not able to doe any thing at all when they were parted asunder, or as it were, without themselves: which brethren can doe well enough, namely, dwell and keepe within house and go abroad together, meddle in affaires of State, exercise husbandrie and tillage one with another, in case they preferre and keepe well that principle of amity and benevolence which nature hath given them. For otherwise they should (I suppose) nothing differ from those feet which are readie to trip or supplant one another, and cause them to catch a fall : or they should resemble those hands and fingers which enfolded and claspe one another untowardly against the course of nature. But rather according as in one and the same bodie, the cold, the hot, the drie, and the moist, participating likewise in one and the same nature and nourishment, if they doe accord and agree well together, engender an excellent temperature and most pleasant harmonie, to wit, the health of the bodie, without which, neither all the wealth of the world, as men say,

*Nor power of roiall majestie,
Which equall is to deitie.*

have any pleasure, grace or profit: but in case these principall elements of our life, covet to have more than their just proportion, and thereupon breake out into a kind of civill sedition, seeking one to surcrease and over-grow another, soone there ensueh a filthy corruption and confusion which overthroweth the state of the bodie and the creature it selfe; fembly, by the concord of brethren, the whole race and house is in good case and flourisheth, the friends and familiars belonging to them (like a melodious quire of musicians) make a sweet content and harmonie: for neither they doe, nor say nor thinke any thing that jarreth or is contrarie one to the other,

*Where as in discord such an taking part,
The worse oft soones do speed, whiles better smart.*

to wit, some ill-tongued varlet and pickthanke carrie-tale within the house, or some flattering claw-backe coming betweene, and entring into the house, or else some envious and malicious neighbour in the citie. For like as diseases do ingender in those bodies which neither receive nor stand well affected to their proper & familiar nourishment, many appetites of strange and hurtfull meates; even so, a slanderous calumpny of jealousie being gotten once among those of a blood & kindred, doth draw and bring withall evil words and naughtie speeches, which from without are alwaies readie enough to runne thither where as a breach lieth open, and where there is some fault already. That divine master and soothsayer of Arcadie, of whom Herodotus writeth, when he had lost one of his owne naturall feet, was forced upon necessitie to make himselfe another of wood: but a brother being fallen out and at warre with a brother, and constrained to get some stranger to be his companion, either out of the market place and common hall of the citie as he walketh there, or from the publike place of exercise, where he useth to behold the wrestlers and others; in my conceit doth nothing else but willingly cut-off a part or limbe of his owne bodie made of flesh, and engrafted fast unto him, for to let another in the place which is of another kinde and altogether a stranger. For even necessitie it selfe which doth entertaine, approve and seeke for friendship and mutuall acquaintance, teacheth us to honor, chearish and preserve that which is of the same nature and kind; for that without friends societie and fellowship we are not able to live solitarie and alone as most savage beasts, neither will our nature endure it: and therefore in Menander he saith very well and wisely:

*By jolly cheere and bankers day by day,
Thinke we to finde (of asher) trustie friends,
To whom our selves and life commit we may?
No speciall thing for cost to make amends;
I found he hath, who by that means hath met
With shade of friends; for such I come no bet.*

For to say a truth, mozt of our friendships be but shadowes, semblances and images of that first amitie, which nature hath imprinted and engrafted in children toward their parents, in brethren toward their brethren: and he who doth not reverence nor honor it, how can he perswade and make strangers believe that he beareth found and faithfull good will unto strangers. Or what mar is he who in his familiar greetings and salutations, or in his letters, will call his friend and companion Brother, and can not finde in his heart so much as to go with his brother in the same way? For as it were a point of great folly and madnesse, to adorne the statue of a brother, and in the meane time to beat and maime his bodie; even so, to reverence and honor the name of a brother in others, and withall to shun, hate and disdain a brother indeed, were the case of one that were out of his wits, and who never conceived in his heart and minde, that Nature is the most sacred and holy thing in the world. And heere in this place, I can not choose but call to minde, how at Rome upon a time I tooke upon me to be umpier betweene two brethren, when whom the one seemed to make profession of Philosophie; but he was (as after it appeared) not onely untruly entitled by the name of a Brother; but also as falsely called a Philosopher: for when I requested of him that he should carrie himselfe as a Philosopher toward his brother, and such a brother as altogether was unlettered and ignorant: In that you say (ignorant quoth he) I hold well with you, and I avow it a trueth; but as for Brother, I take it for no such great and venerable matter, to have sprung from the same loines, or to have come forth of one wombe. Well (said I againe) It appeares that you make no great account to issue out of the same natural members; but all men else besides you, if they doe not thinke and imagine so in their hearts; yet I am sure they doe both sing and say that Nature first, and then Law (which doth preserve and maintaine Nature) have given the chiefe place of reverence and honor next after the gods, unto father and mother; neither can men performe any service more acceptable unto the gods, than to pay willingly, readily and affectionately unto parents who begat and brought them forth, unto nourishes and fosters that reared them up, the interest and usurie for the old thanks, besides the new which are due unto them. And on the other side againe, there is not a more certaine signe & marke of a verie Atheist; than either to neglect parents, or to be any waies ungracious or defective in duty unto them: and therefore whereas we are forbidden in expresse termes by the law, to doe wrong or hurt unto other men: if one doe not behave himselfe to father and mother both in word and deed, so as they may have (I do not say no discontentment and displeasure but) joy and comfort thereby, men esteeme him to be profane, godlesse and irreligious. Tell me now, what action, what grace, what disposition of children towards their parents, can be more agreeable and yeeld them greater contentment, than to see good will, kinde affection, fast and assured love betwene brethren? the which a man may easily gather by the contrarie in other smaller matters. For seeing that fathers and mothers be displeased otherwhiles with their sonnes, if they misuse or hardly intreat some home-borne slave whom they set much store by: if I say, they be vexed and angrie, when they see them to make no reckoning & care of their woods and grounds wherein they tooke some joy and delight; considering also that the good kind-hearted old folke of a gentle and loving affection that they have, be offended if some hound or dog bred up within house, or an horse be not well tended and looked unto; last of all, if they grieve when they perceive their children to mocke, find fault with, or despise the lectures, narrations, sports, fights, wrestlers, and others that exercise fears of activitie, which themselves sometime highly esteemed: Is there any likelihood that they in any measure can indure to see their children hate one another? to entertaine brailes and quarrels continually? to be ever snarling, railing and reviling one another? and in all enterprises and actions alwaies crossing, thwarting and supplanting one another? I suppose there is no man will so say. Then on the contrarie side, if brethren love together and be ready one to do for another; if they draw in one line and carrie the like affection with them: follow the same studies and take the same courses; and how much nature hath divided and separated them in bodie, so much to joine for it againe in minde; lending one another their helping hands in all their negotiations and affaires; following the same exercises; repaire to the same disputations; and frequenting the same plaies, games and pastimes, so as they agree and communicate in all things: certainly this great love and amitie among brethren, must needs yeeld sweet joy and happie comfort to their father and mother in their old age: and therefore parents take nothing so much pleasure, when their children prove eloquent orators, wealthy men, or advanced to promotions and high places of dignities; as loving and kind one to another; like as a man shall never see a father so desirous of eloquence, of riches, or of honor, as he is loving to his owne children. It is reported of Queene Apollonia the Cyzicen, mother to King Eumenes, and to three other Princes, to wit, Atalus, Philerterus and Athenaus, that shee reputed and reported her selfe to bee right happy, and rendered thanks unto the immortal gods, not for her riches, nor roiall port and majestie; but that it was her good fortune to see those three younger sonnes of hers, serving as Pensioners and Elquiers of the bodie to Eumenes their elder brother, and himselfe living fearlessse and in as securitie in the mids of them, standing about his person with their pollaxes, halberds, and partisans in their hands, and girded with swords by their sides. On the other side, King Xerxes perceiving, that his sonne Ochus set an ambush and laid traines to murder his brethren, died for verie sorrow and anguish of heart. Terrible and grievous are the warres, said Euripides, betwene brethren; but unto their parents above all others most grievous; for that whosoever hateth his owne brother, and may not vouchsafe him a good eie and kinde looke, can not choose but in his heart blame the father that begat him, and the mother that bare him. We read that Pisistratus married married his second wife, when his sonnes whom he had by the former were now men grown, saying: That since he saw them prove so good and towardly, he gladly would be the father of many more that might grow up like them; even so, good and loyall children will not onely affect and love one another for their parents sakes, but also love their parents so much the more, in regard of their mutuall kindnesse, as making this account, thinking also and saying thus to themselves; That they are obliged and bounden unto them in many respects, but principally for their brethren, as being the most precious heritage, the sweetest and most pleasant possession that they inherit by them. And therefore Homer did verie well, when he brought in Telemachus among other calamities of his, reckoning this for one, that he had no brother at all; and saying so thus:

*For Jupiter my fathers race in me alone,
Now ended hath, and given me brother none.*

As for Hesiodus he did not well to with & give advice to have an only begotten sonne, to be the full heire and universall inheritour of a patrimony; even that Hesiodus who was the disciple of those Muses, whom men have named piores, as it were pius ones, for that by reason of their mutual affection and sister-like love they keepe alwaies together. Certes, the amitie of brethren is so respective to parents, that it is both a certaine demonstration that they love father and mother, & also such an example & lesson unto their children to love together, as there is none other like unto it, but contrariwise, they take an ill president to hate their owne brethren from the first originall of their father: for he that liveth continually & waxeth old in suits of law, in quarrels and dissensions with his owne brethren, and afterward shall seeme to preach unto his children for to live friendly & lovingly together, doth as much as he, who according to the common proverbe:

*The sores of others will seeme to heale and cure
And in himselfe of ulcers full impure.*

and so by his owne deeds doth weaken the efficacye of his words. If then Eteocles the Thebane, when he had once said unto his brother Polynices, in Euripides,

*To starve about sunne-rising would I mount,
And under earth descend as farre againe,
By these attempts, if I might make account
This soveraigne roialtie of gods to gaine.*

should come afterwards againe unto his sonnes, and admonish them

*For to maintaine and honour equall state,
Which knits friends ay in perfect unitie,
And keeps those link't who are confederate,
Preserving cities in league and amitie:
For nothing more procures securitie,
In all the world, than doth equalitie.*

who would not mocke him and despise his admonition? And what kinde of man would Atreus have bene reputed, if after he had set such a supper as he did before his brother, he should in this manner have spoken sentences and given instruction to his owne children?

*When great mishap and crosse calamitie
Upon a man is fallen suddenly,
The onely meed is found by amitie
Of those whom blood hath joined perfectly.*

Banish therefore we must, and rid away cleane, all hatred from among brethren, as a thing which is a bad nurse to parents in their olde age, and a woofe for tresse to children in their youth; besides, it giveth occasion of slander, calumny and obloquie among their fellow-citizens and neighbours, for thus do men conceive and deeme of it: That brethren having bene nourished and brought up together so familiarly from their very cradle, it can not be that they should fall out and grow to such termes of enmity and hostility, unlesse they were privie one to another of some wicked plots and most mischievous practises. For great causes they must bee, that are able to undoe great friendship and amitie, by means whereof hardly or uneth afterwards they can bee reconciled and surely knit againe. For like as sundry pieces which have bene once artificially joined together by the means of glue or foder, if the joint bee loose or open, may bee rejoined or fodered againe; but if an entire body that naturally is united and grown in one, chauce to bee broken or cut and slit asunder, it will be an hard piece of worke to finde any glew or foder so strong as to reunite the same and make it whole and found,

found, even so those mutuall amities which either for profit or upon some neede were first knit betwene men, happen to cleave and part in twaine, it is an easie matter to reduce them close together; but brethren if they bee once alienated and estranged, so as that the naturall bond of love can not hold them together, hardly will they peece againe or agree ever after: and say they be made friends and brought to attonement, certainly such reconciliation maketh in the former rent or breach an ill favoured and filthy skar, as being alwaies full of jealousie, distrust, and suspition. True it is that all jars and enmities betwene man and man, entering into the heart, together with those passions which be most troublefome and dangerous of all others, to wit, a peevish humor of contention, choler, envie, and remembrance of injuries done and past, do breed griefe, paine, and vexation; but surely that which is fallen betwene brother and brother, who of necessitie are to communicate together in all sacrifices and religious ceremonies belonging to their fathers house, who are to be interred another day in one and the same sepulchre, and live in the meane time otherwhiles under one rooffe, and dwell in the same house, and enjoy possessions, lands, and tenements confining one upon another, doth continually present unto the eie that which tormenteth the heart, it putteth them in minde daily and howely of their follie and madnesse; for by meanes thereof that face and countenance which shoulde bee most sweete, best knowne, and of all other likest, is become most strange hideous, and unpleasant to the eie; that voice which was wont to be even from the cradle friendly and familiar, is now become most fearefull & terrible to the eare; and whereas they see many other brethren cohabit together in one house, sit at one table to take their repast, occupie the same lands, and use the same servants, without dividing them; what a griefe is it, that they thus fallen out, should part their friends, their hostis and guests, and in one word, make all things that be common among other brethren, private, and whatsoever should be familiar & acceptable, to become contrarie & odious? Over and besides, here is another inconvenience and mischief, which there is no man so simple, but he must needs conceive and understand: That ordinary friends and table companions may be gotten and stollen (as it were) from others; alliance and acquaintance there may be had new, if the former be lost, even as armour, weapons and tooles may be repaired, if they be worne, or new made, if the first be gon; but to recover a brother that is lost, it is not possible, no more than to make a new hand, if one be cut away, or to set in another eie in the place of that which is plucked out of the head: and therefore well said that Persian ladie, when she chose rather to save the life of her brethren than of her children: For children (quoth she) I may have more, but since my father and mother be both dead, brother shall I never have.

But what is to be done, will some man say, in case one be matched with a bad brother? First, this we ought evermore to remember, that in all sorts of amities there is to be found some badnesse; and most true is that saying of Sophocles:

Who list to search throughout mankind,

More bad than good is sure to finde.

No kintred there is, no societie, no fellowship, no amitie and love, that can be found sincere, sound, pure and cleare from all faults. The Lacedaemonian who had married a wife of little stature: We must (quoth he) of evils chuse ever the least; even so in mine advice, a man may very well and wisely give counsell unto brethren, to beare rather with the most domesticall imperfections and the infirmities of their owne blood, than to trie those of strangers; for as the one is blamelesse, because it is necessarie, so the other is blame-worthy, for that it is voluntarie: for neither table friend and fellow gamester, nor play-fere of the same age, ne yet host or guest

Which blame by kinde hath forg'd, and cost us nought,

but rather that friend, who is of the same blood, who had his nourishment and bringing up with us, begotten of one father, and who lay in the same mothers wombe; unto whom it seemeth that *Vertue herselfe doth allow connivence and pardon of some faults, so as a man may say unto a brother when he doth a fault,

Witlesse, sturke nought, yea wretched though thou be,

Yet can I not forsake and cast off thee.

lest that (ere I be well aware) I might seeme in my hatred towards thee, for to punish sharply, cruelly, and unnaturally in thy person, some infirmities or vice of mine owne father or mother in-filled into thee by their feed. As for strangers and such as are not of our blood, we ought not to love first, and afterwards make triall and judgement of them; but first we must trie and then trust and love them afterwards; whereas contrariwise, nature hath not given unto proove and experience

experience the precedence and prerogative to go before love, neither doth she expect according to that common proverbe; That a man should eate a *buthell or two of salt with one whom he minded to love and make his friend; but even from our nativitie hath bred in us and with us the very principle and cause of amitie, in which regard we ought not to be bitter unto such, nor to search too neerely into their faults and infirmities.

But what will you say now if contrariwise some there be, who if meere aliens and strangers otherwise, yet if they take a foolish love and liking unto them, either at the taveme or at some game and pastime, or fall acquainted with them at the wrestling or fencing schoole, can be content to winke at their faults, be ready to excuse and justifie them, yea and take delight and pleasure therein; but if their brethren do amisse, they be exceeding rigorous unto them and inexorable; nay, you shall have many such, who can abide to love churlish dogs, & skittish horses, yea and finde in their hearts to feed and make much of fell ounces, shrewd cats, curst unhappie apes, and terrible lions; but they cannot endure the haatie and cholerick humor, the error and ignorance, or some little ambitious humor of a brother. Others againe there be, who unto their concubines and harlots will not sticke to assigne over and passe away goodly houses and faire lands lying thereto; but with their brethren they will wrangle and go to law, nay they will be ready to enter the lists and combat for a plot of ground whereupon a house standeth, about some corner of a messuage or end of a little tenement, and afterwards attributing unto this their hatred of brethren, the colourable name of hating sinne and wickednesse, they go up & downe cursing, detesting and reproching them for their vices, whiles in others they are never offended nor discontented therewith, but are willing enough daily to frequent and haunt their company. Thus much in generall rearmes by way of preamble or proæme of this whole treatise.

It remaineth now that I should enter into the doctrine and instructions thereto belonging: wherein I will not begin as other have done at the partition of their heritage or patrimonie; but at the naughtie emulation, hart-burning and jealousie which ariseth betwene them during the life of their parents. Agesilaus king of Lacedaemon was wont alwaies to send as a present unto each one of the auncients of the citie, ever as they were created Senatours, a good oxen in testimony that he honored their vertue: at length the lords called Ephori, who were the censurers & overseers of each mans behavior, condemned him for this in a fine to be paid unto the State, forbidding and adding a season withall; for that by these gifts and largesses he went about to steale away their hearts and favors to himselfe alone, which ought indifferently to regard the whole body of the citie; even so a man may do well to give this counsell unto a sonne, in such wise to respect & honour his father and mother, that hee seeke not thereby to gaine their whole love, nor seeme to turne away their favour and affection from other children wholly unto himselfe; by which practise many doe prevent, undermine and supplant their brethren, and thus under a colourable and honest pretense in shew, but in deed unjust and unequall, cloke and cover their avarice and covetous desire; for after a cautelous and subtill manner they insinuate themselves and get betwene them and home, and so defraud and couzen them ungentlemanly of their parents love, which is the greatest and fairest portion of their inheritance, who espying their time, and taking the opportunitie and vantage when their brethren be otherwise employed, and least doubt of their practises, then they bestir them most, and shew themselves in best order, obsequious, double-diligent, sober and modest, and namely in such things as their other brethren do either faile or seeme to be slacke and forgetfull. But brethren ought to do cleane contrarie, for if they perceive their father to be angrie and displeased with one of them, they should interpose themselves and undergo some part of the heave load, they ought to ease their brother, and by bearing a part, helpe to make the burden lighter: then (I say) must they by their service and ministerie gratifie their brother so much, as to bring him in some sort in grace and favour againe with their father, and when he hath faile so far forth in neglecting the opportunity of time, or omitting some other businesse which hardly will afford excuse, they are to lay the fault and blame upon his very nature and disposition, as being more meere and fitted for other matters. And hecetero accordeth well that speech of Agamemnon in Homer,

He faulted not through idlenesse,

nor yet for want of wit,

But lookt on me, and did expect

my motive unto it.

even so one good brother may excuse another and say; He thought I should have done it, and lest this due to me to doe: neither are fathers themselves strait laced, but willingly enough to admit such translations and gentle inferences of names as these; they can be content to beleeve their children, when they terme the supine negligence of their brethren plaine simplicitie, their stupiditie and blockishnesse, upright dealing and a good conscience; their quarrellous and litigious nature, a minde loth to be troden under-foot and utterly despised. In this manner he that will proceed with an intent only to appeale his fathers wrath, shall gaine thus much moreovers: That not only his fathers choler will thereby be much diminished toward his brother, but his love also much more encreased unto himselfe: howbeit, afterwards when he hath thus made all well, and satisfied his father to his good contentment, then must he turne and addresse himselfe to his brother apart, touch him to the quicke, spare him never a whit, but with all libertie of language tell him roundly of his fault, and rebuke him for his trespasse; for surely it is not good to use indulgencie and connivencie to a brother, no more than to insult over him too much, and tread him under foote if hee have done amisse, (for as this bewraith a joy that one taketh at his fall; so that implieth a guiltinesse with him in the same transgression: but in this rebuke and reproofe, such measure would be kept, that it may testifie a care to do him good, and yet a displeasure for his fault; for commonly he that hath bene a most earnest advocate and affectionate intercessor for him to his father and mother, will be his sharpest accuser afterwards when he hath bene alone by himselfe. But put the case, that another having not at all offended, be blamed notwithstanding and accused to father and mother, howsoever in other things, it is the part of humanitie and civill kindnesse to susteine and beare all anger and froward displeasure of parents; yet in this case, the allegations and defenses of one brother in the justification of another, when he is innocent, unjustly traduced, and hardly used or wronged by his parents, are not to be blamed, but allowable and grounded upon honestie: neither need another feare to heare that reproch in Sophocles:

*Thou givest me so farre grown out of kinde,
 As with thy sword, a counter pleat to finde,*

when frankly & freely he speaketh in the behalfe of his brother, seeming to be unjustly condemned and oppressed. For surely by this manner of proccesse and pleading, they that are convicted take more joy in being overthrowen, than if they had gained the victorie and better hand.

Now after that a father is deceased, it is well becoming and fit, that brethren should more affectionally love than before, and stick more close together: for then presently their naturall love unto their father which is common to them all, ought to appeere indifferently in mourning together and lamenting for his death: then are they to reject and cast behinde them all suspicions surmized or buzzed into their heads by varlets & servants, all slanderous calumniation and false reports, brought unto them by pick-thankes and carrie-ales on both sides, who would gladly sow some dissension betweene them: then are they to give eare unto that which fables doe report of the reciprocall love of Castor and Pollux; and namely, how it is said, That Pollux killed one with his fist for rounding him in the eare, and whispering a tale against his brother Castor. Afterwards, when they shall come to the parting of their patrimonie and fathers goods among them, they ought not (as it were) to give defiance and denounce warre one against another, as many there be who come prepared for that purpose ready to encounter, singing this note,

*O Alas! Alas! now hearken and come fight,
 Who art of warre so fell the daughter right.*

But that verie day of all others they ought to regard and observe most, as being the time which to them is the beginning either of mortall warre and enmitie irreconcilable, or else of perfect friendship and amitie perdurable: at which instant they ought among themselves alone, to divide their portions if it be possible; if not, then to do it in the presence of one indifferent and common friend betweene them, who may be a witnes to their whole order and proceeding; and so when after a loving and kinde manner, and as becometh honest and well disposed persons, they have by casting lots gotten ech one that which is his right: by which course (as Plato said) they ought to thinke that there is given and received that which is meet and agreeable for every one, and so to hold themselves therewith contented: this done, if ay they are to make account that the ordering, manning, and administration onely of the goods and heritage is parted and divided; but the enjoying, use and possession of all remaineth yet whole in common betweene them. But those that in this partition and distribution of goods, plucke one from another the nourishes that gave them sucke, or such youths as were fostered and brought up together with them: of infants, and with whom alwaies they had lived and loved familiarly; well may they pre-vaile

vaile so farre forth with eager pursuing their wilfulnesse, as to go away with the gaine of a slave, perhaps of greater price: but in stead thereof, they lose the greatest and most pretious things in all their patrimonie and inheritance, and utterly betray the love of a brother, and the confidence that otherwise they might have had in him. Some also we have knowne, who upon a peece with wilfulnesse onely, and a quarrellous humour, and without any gaine at all, have in the partition of their fathers goods, carried themselves no better nor with greater modestie and respect, than if it had bene some bootie or pillage gotten in war. Such were Charicles and Antiochus, of the cite Opus, two brethren, who ever as they met with a peece of silver plate, made no more ado but cut it quite thorough the mids, and if there came a garment into their hands, in two peece it went, slit (as neere as they could aime) just in the middle, and so they went either of them away with his part, dividing (as it were) upon some tragicall curse and execration.

*Their house and all the goods therein
 By edge of sword so sharpe and keen.*

Others there be who make their boast and report with joy unto others, how in the partition of their patrimonie they have by cunning calls, connie-catched their brethren, and over-wrought them so by their cautious circumvention, fine wit and lie policies, as that they have gone away with the better part by ods: whereas indeed they should rejoyce rather and please themselves, if in modestie, courttesie, kindnesse, and yielding of their owne right they had surpassed and gone beyond their brethren. In which regard Athenodorus deserveth to be remembered in this place; and indeed there is not one here in these parts but remembreth him well enough. This Athenodorus had one brother elder than himselfe, named Zenon, who having taken upon him the management of the patrimonie, left unto them both by their father, had imbezeld and made away a good part of it; and in the end, for that by force he had carried away a woman and married her, was condemned for a rape, and lost all his owne and his brothers goods, which by order of law was forfait and confiscate to the Exchequer of the Emperor: now was Athenodorus above said, a verie heartlesse boy still, without any haire on his face; and when by equitie and the court of conscience, his portion out of his fathers goods was awarded and restored unto him, he forsooke not his brother, but brought all abroad and parted the one halfe thereof with him againe; and notwithstanding that he knew well enough that his brother had used no faire play, but cunningly defrauded him of much in the division thereof, yet was he never angrie with him nor repented of his kindnesse, but mildly, cheerefully, and patiently endured that unthankfulness and folly of his brother, so much divulged and talked of throughout all Greece. As for Salon when he pronounced sentence and determined in this manner as touching the government of the weale-publike; That equalitie never bred sedition; seemed verie confusedly to bring in the proportion Arithmetically which is popular, in place of that other faire and good proportion called Geometrical. But he that in an house or familie would advise brethren (as Plato did the citizens of his Common-wealth) above all, if possible it were to take away these words, Mine and Thine; Mine and not Mine; or at leastwise (if that may not be) to stand contented with an egall portion, and to maintaine and preserve equalitie; certes, he should lay a notable and singular foundation of amitie, concord and peace, and alwaies build thereupon the famous examples of most noble and renowned personages, such as Pittachus was, who when the King of Lydia demanded of him whether he had money and goods enough? I may have (quoth he) more by one halfe if I would, by occasion of my brothers death whose heire I am.

But forasmuch as not onely in the possession, augmentation and diminishing of goods, the lesse is evermore set as an adverse and crosse enemy to the more, but also (as Plato said) simply and universally there is alwaies motion and stirring in unequallitie, but rest and repose in equalitie; and so all uneven dealing and unequal partition is dangerous for breeding dissension among brethren: and impossible it is, that in all respects they should be even and equally for that either Nature at first from their very nativitie, or Fortune afterwards, hath not divided with even hand their severall graces and favours among them, whereupon proceed envie and jealousy, which are pernicious maladies and deadly plagues, as wel to houses and families as also to States and Cities: in these regards (I say) therefore, a great regard and heed would be taken, both to prevent and also to remedie such mischiefs with all speed, when they begin first to ingender. As for him who is indued with better gifts, and hath the vantage over his other brethren, it were not amisse to give him counsell, first to communicate unto them those gifts wherein he seemeth to excell and goe beyond them; namely, in gracing and honouring them as well as himselfe by his credit and reputation, in advancing them by the means of his great friends, and

drawing them unto their acquaintance; and in case he be more eloquent than they, to offer them the use thereof, which although it be employed (as it were) in common, is yet nevertheless his owne still: then let him not shew any signe of pride and arrogancie, as though he did disdain them, but rather in some measure by abasing, submitting and yeelding a little to them in his behaviour, to preserve himselfe from envie, unto which his excellent parts do lie open; and in one word, to reduce that inegalitie which fortune hath made, unto some equalitie, as farre forth as possible it is to do, by the moderate carriage of his minde. Lucillus verily would never daigne to accept of any dignitie or place of rule, before his brother, notwithstanding he was his elder, but letting his owne time slip, expected the turne and course of his brother. Neither would Pollux take upon him to be a god alone by himselfe, but chose rather with his brother Caster to be a demigod, and for to communicate unto him his owne immortalitie, thought it no disgrace to participate with his mortall condition; and even so may a man say unto one whom hee would admonish: My good friend, it lies in you without diminishing one whit of those good things which you have at this present, to make your brother equall unto your selfe, and to joine him in honour with you, giving him leave to enjoy (as it were) your greatnesse, your glory, your vertue, and your fortune; like as Plato did in times past, who by putting downe in writing, the names of his brethren, and bringing them in as persons speaking in his most noble and excellent Treatises, caused them by that meanes to be famous and renowned in the world. Thus he graced Glaukus and Adamantus in his books of Politie: thus he honoured Antiphon the yongest of them all, in his Dialogue named Armenides.

Moreover, as it is an ordinary thing to observe great difference and oddes in the natures and fortunes of brethren; so it is in manner impossible, that in all things and in every respect any one of them should excell the rest. For true it is, that the foure elements, which they say were created of one and the same matter, have powers and qualities altogether contrary; but surely it was never yet scene, that of two brethren by one father and mother, the one should be like unto that wife man, whom the Stoicks do faine and imagine, to wit, faire, lovely, bountifull, honourable, rich, eloquent, studious, civill and courteous; and the other, foule, ill-favoured, contemptible, illiberrall, needie, not able to speake and deliver his minde, untaught, ignorant, uncivill and unfociable. But even in those that are more obscure, base and abject than others, there is after a sort some sparke of grace, of valour, of apinesse and inclination to one good thing or other: for as the common proverbe goeth;

With Calibrap thusles rough and keene, with Prickyreft-barow, Close Sions faire and soft, yea, White-wallflowers are scene to grow.

These good parts therefore, be they more or lesse in others, if he that seemeth to have them in farre better and in greater measure, do not debase, smother, hide and hinder them, nor deject his brother (as in some solemnitie of games for the prize) from all the principall honours, but rather yeeld reciprocally unto him in some points, and acknowledge openly that in many things he is more excellent, and hath a greater dexteritie than himselfe, withdrawing alwaies closely all occasions and matter of envie, as it were fewell from the fire, shall either quench all debate, or rather not suffer it at all to breed or grow to any head and substance. Now he that alwaies taketh his brother as a colleague, counsellor and coadjutor with him, in those causes wherein himselfe is taken to be his superiour: as for example; If he be a professed Rhetorician and Oratour, using his brother to plead causes; if he be a Politician, asking his advice in government; if a man greatly friended, employing him in actions and affaires abroad; and in one word, in no matter of consequence and which may win credit and reputation, leaving not his brother out, but making him his fellow and companion in all great and honourable occasions, and so giving out of him, taking his counsell if he be present, and expecting his presence if he be absent; and generally, making it known that he is a man not of lesse execution than himselfe, but one rather that loveth not much to put himselfe forth, nor stands so much upon winning reputation in the world, and seeking to be advanced in credit; by this meanes he shall lose nothing of his owne, but gaine much unto his brother. These be the precepts and advertisements that a man may give unto him that is the better and superiour.

To come now to him who is the inferiour, he ought thus to thinke in his minde: That his brother is not one alone that hath no fellow, nor the onely man in the world who is richer, better learned, or more renowned and glorious than himselfe, but that often-times he also is inferiour to a great number, yea, and to many millions of us men,

Who on the earth so large do breed,

upon her fruits who live and feed.

but if he be such an one as either goeth up and downe, bearing envie unto all the world; or if he be of so ill a nature, as that among so many men that are fortunate, he alone and none but he troubleth him, who ought of all other to be dearest, and is most necerly joined unto him by the obligation of blood, a man may well say of him; That he is unhappy in the highest degree, and hath not left unto another man living, any meane to go beyond him in wretchednesse. As Mellus therefore thought that the Romans were bound to render thanks unto the gods in heaven, for that Scipio so noble and brave a man was borne in Rome, and not in any other citie; so everie man is to wish and pray unto the gods, that himselfe may surmount all other men in prosperitie, if not, yet that he might have a brother at least wife to attaine unto that power and authoritie so much desired; but some there be so unfortunate and unlucky by nature, in respect of any goodnesse in them, that they can rejoice and take a great glorie in this, to have their friends advanced unto high places of honor, or to see their hostis and guests abroad, princes, rulers, rich and mightie men, but the resplendent glorie of their brethren they thinke doth eclipse and darken their owne renowne; they delight and joy to heare the fortunate exploits of their fathers recounted, or how their great grandfathers long ago had the conduct of armies, and were lord pratorous and generals in the field, wherein they themselves had never any part, nor received thereby either honor or profit; but if there have fallen unto their brethren any great heritages or possessions, if they have risen unto high estate and achieved honorable dignities, if they are advanced by rich and noble mariages, then they are cast downe and their hearts be done. And yet it had behooved and right meet it were in the first place, to bee envious to no man at all; but if that may not be, the next way were to turne their envie outward, and eie-bite strangers, and to shew our spite unto aliens who are abroad, after the manner of those who to rid themselves from civill seditions at home, turne the same upon their enemies without, and set them together by the eares, and like as Diomedes in Homer said unto Glaukus,

*Of Trojanes and their allies both,
who aide them for good will*

*Right many are beside your selfe
for me in fight to kill:*

And you likewise have Greeks enough with whom in bloodie field

You may your prowess try, and not meete me with speare and shield.

even so it may be said unto them; There be a number besides of concurrents upon whom they may exercise their envie and jealousy, and not with their naturall brethren; for a brother ought not to be like unto one of the balance scales, which doth alwaies contrarie unto his fellow, for as one riseth the other falleth; but as small numbers do multiplye the greater, and serve to make both them bigger, and their selves too; even so an inferior brother by multiplying the state of his brother who is his superiour, shall both augment him and also increase and grow himselfe together with him in all good things: marke the fingers of your hand, that which holdeth not the pen in writing, or striketh the string of a lute in playing (for that it is not able so to do, nor disposed and made naturally for those uses) is never a whit the worse for all that, nor serveth lesse otherwise, but they all stir and moove together, yea and in some sort they helpe one another in their actions, as being framed for the nonce, unequal & one bigger & longer than other, that by their opposition and meeting as it were round together, they might comprehend, claspe, and hold any thing most sure, strong, and fast. Thus Craterus being the naturall brother of king Antigonus who reigned and swaid the scepter: Thus Perillus also the brother of Cassander who wore the crowne, gave their minds to be brave warriors and to lead armies under their brethren, or else applied themselves to governe their houses at home in their absence; whereas on the contrary side, the Antiochi and Seleuci, as also certaine Grypi and Cyziceni and such others, having not learned to beare a lower faile than their brethren, and who could not content themselves to sing a lower note, nor to rest in a second place, but aspiring to the ensignes and ornaments of roiall dignitie, to wit, the purple mantle of estate with crowne, diademe and scepter, filled themselves and one another with many calamities, yea and heaped as many troubles upon all Asia throughout. Now so farre as those especially who by nature are ambitious and disposed to thirst after glory, be for the most part envious & jealous toward those who are more honored & renowned than they; it were very expedient for brethren if they would avoid this inconvenience, not to seeke for to attaine either honour or authoritie and credit all by the same meanes, but some by one thing and some by another: for we see by daily experience, it is an ordinarie matter that wilde beaſts do fight and warre one with another, namely when they feede in one and the same pasture; and among champions and such as strive for the maſterie in feats of activitie, we count those for their adversaries and concurrents onely, who proſeſſe and praſtiſe the ſame kinde of game or exerciſe; for thoſe that goe to it with ſilts and buſſets, are commonly friends good enough to ſuch ſword-fencers as fight at ſharpe to the utterance, and well-willers to the champions called Paneratiaſtæ: likewise the runners in a race agree full-well with wrestlers: theſe I ſay, are ready to aide, aſſiſt and favor one another, which is the reaſon, that of the two ſonnes of Tyndarus, Pellus won the prize alwaies at buſſets, but Caſtor his brother went away with the victorie in the race. And Homer very well in his Poeme feigned that Tecuer was an excellent archer; and became famous thereby, but his brother Ajax was beſt at cloſe fight and hand-strokes, ſtanding to it heavily armed at all peeces,

And with his ſhield ſo bright and wide
His brother Tecuer he did hide.

And thus it is with them that governe a State and common weale; thoſe that be men of armes and manage martiall affaires, never lightly do envie them much who deale in civill cauſes and uſe to make ſpeeches unto the people; likewise among thoſe that proſeſſe Rhetoricke and eloquence, advocates who plead at barre, never fall out with thoſe Sophiſters that read lectures of oratorie; among proſeſſors of Phyſicke, they that cure by diet envie not the chirurgeions who worke by hand; whereas they who endeavour and ſeek to win credite and eſtimation by the ſame art, or by their facultie and ſufficiencie in any one thing, do as much (eſpecially if they be badly minded withall) as thoſe rivals who loving one miſtreſſe, would be better welcome and finde more grace and favour at her hands one than another. True it is I muſt needs confeſſe; that they who go divers waies, doe no good one to another; but ſurely ſuch as chooſe fundrie courſes of life doe not onely avoid the occaſions of envie, but alſo by that meanes the rather have mutuall helpe one by the other: thus Demosthenes and Chares ſorted well together; Aſſeſſines likewise and Eubulus accorded; Hyperides alſo and Leosthenes were lovers and friends; in every which couple, the former imploied themſelves in pleading and ſpeaking before the people, &c were writers and pen-men, whereas the other conducted armies, were warriors and men of action. Brethren therefore who cannot communicate in glorie and credit together without envie, ought to ſet their deſires and ambitious mindes as farre remote one from another, and turne them full as contrarie as they can, if they would finde comfort, and not receive diſpleaſure by the proſperitie and happy ſucceſſe of one of another: but above all, a principall care and regard they muſt have of their kindred and alliance, yea and otherwhiles of their verie wives and namely, when they be readie with their perillous ſpeeches many times to blow more coales, and thereby enkindle their ambitious humour. Your brother (quoth one) doth wonder; he carrieth all before him; he beareth the ſway; no talke there is but of him; he is admired, and every man maketh court to him: whereas, there is no reſort to you; no man commeth toward you; nothing is there in you that men regard or ſet by. When theſe ſuggeſtions ſhall be thus whiſpered, a brother that is wiſe and well minded, may well ſay thus againe: I have a brother in deed whoſe name is up and carrieth a great ſide; and verily the greater part of his credit and authoritie is mine and at my commaundement. For Socrates was wont to ſay, that hee would chooſe rather to have Darius his friend, than his *Daricks. And a brother who is of ſound and good judgement, will thinke that he hath no leſſe benefit, when his brother is placed in great eſtate of government, bleſſed with riches, or advanced to credit and reputation by his gift of eloquence, than if himſelfe were a ruler, wealthy, learned and eloquent. Thus you may ſee the beſt and readieſt meanes that are to qualifie and mitigate this unequalitie betwene brethren. Now there be other diſagreements beſides, that grow quickly betwene, eſpecially if they want good bringing up and are not well taught, and namely, in regard of their age. For commonly the elder, who thinke that by good right they ought to have the command, rule and government of their younger brethren in everie thing, and who held it great reaſon that they ſhould be honored, and have power and authoritie alwaies above them, commonly do uſe them hardly and are nothing kinde and lightſome unto them: the younger againe being ſtubborne, wilfull and unruly, ready alſo to ſhake off the bridle, are wont to make no reckoning of their elder brethrens prerogative, but ſet them at naught and deſpiſe them; whereby it commeth to paſſe, that as the younger of one ſide envied, are held downe with envie, and kept under alwaies by their elder elder brethren, and ſo ſhunne their rebukes and ſhorne their admonitions; ſo theſe on the other ſide deſirous to hold their owne and maintaine their preeminence and ſoveraigntie over them, ſtand alwaies in dread left their younger brethren ſhould grow too much, as if the riſing of them were their fall. But like as the caſe ſtandeth in a benefit or good turne that is done, ſo ſay it is meet that the receiver ſhould eſteeme the thing greater than it is, and the giver make the leaſt of it; even ſo, he that can perſwade the elder, that the time whereby he hath the vantage of his other brethren is no great thing; and likewise the younger, that he ſhould reckon the ſame birth-right for no ſmall matter, he ſhall do a good deed betwene them, in delivering the one from diſdaine, contempt and ſuſpicion, and the other from irreverence and negligence. Now ſo farre as it is meet, that the elder ſhould take care and charge, teach and inſtruct, admoniſh and reprove the younger; and as ſit likewise the younger ſhould honor, imitate and follow the elder: I could wiſh that the ſollicitude and care of the elder, favoured rather of a companion and fellow, than of a father; that himſelfe alſo would ſeeme not ſo much to command as to perſwade, and to be more prompt and ready to joy for his younger brothers well-doing, and to praife him for it, than in any wiſe take pleaſure in reprehending and blaming him if happily he have forgotten his dutie; and in one word, to do the one not onely more willingly, but alſo with greater humanitie than the other. Moreover, the zeale and emulation in the younger ought rather to be of the nature of an imitation, than either of jealousie or contention; for that imitation preſuppoſeth an opinion of admiration, whereas jealousie and contention implieth envie, which is the reaſon that they affect and love thoſe who endeavour to reſemble, and be like unto them; but contrariwiſe, they are offended at thoſe and keepe them downe, who ſtrive to be their equals. Now among many honors, which it becometh the younger to render unto his elder, obedience is that which deſerveth moſt commendation, and worketh a more aſſured and heartie affection accompanied with a certaine reverence, which cauſeth the elder reciprocally and by way of requitall to yeeld the like and to give place unto him. Thus Cato having from his infancy honored and revered his elder brother Capion, by all manner of obeifance and ſilence before him; in the end gained thus much by it, that when they were both men grown, he had ſo won him and filled him (as it were) with ſo great a reſpect and reverence of him, that hee would neither ſay nor doe ought without his privie and knowledge. For it is reported, that when Capion had one day ſigned and ſealed with his owne ſignet a certaine letter teſtimoniall; Cato his brother coming afterwards would not ſet to his ſeale; which when Capion underſtood, he called for the ſealed teſtimoniall and pluckt away his owne ſeale, before he had once demanded for what occaſion his brother would not beleieve the deed, but ſuſpected his teſtimonie? It ſeemeth likewise, that the brethren of Epiciurus ſhewed great reſpect and reverence unto him, in regard of the love and carefull good will that he bare unto them; which appeared in this, that as to all other things elſe of his; ſo to his Philoſophie eſpecially, they were ſo wedded, as if they had beene inſpired therewith. For albeit they were ſeduced and deceived in their opinion, giving out and holding alwaies (as they did) from their infancy, that never was any man ſo deepe a cleare, nor ſo great a Philoſopher as their brother Epiciurus; yet it is wonderfull to conſider as well him that could ſo frame and diſpoſe them, as themſelves alſo for being ſo diſpoſed and affectionate unto him. And verily even among the more moderne Philoſophers of later time, Apollonius the Peripareticke, had convinced him of untrueth (whoſoever hee was) that ſaid Lordſhip and glorie could like no fellowſhip, for he made his brother Sotion more famous and renowned than himſelfe. For mine owne part, to ſay ſomewhat of my ſelfe; albeit that fortune hath done me many favours, in regard whereof I am bound to render unto her much thanks; there is not any one for which I take my ſelfe ſo much obliged and beholden unto her, as for the love that my brother Timon hath alwaies ſhewed and doth yet ſhew unto me; a thing that no man is able to denie, who hath never ſo little bene in our companie, and you leaſt of all others may doubt who have converſed ſo familiarly with us. Now there be other occaſions of trouble which ought to be taken heed of, among thoſe brethren which are of like age or ſomewhat neere in yeeres; ſmall paſſions (I wote well) they be, but many they are, and thoſe ordinary and continually; by means whereof they bring with them an evil cuſtome of vexing, fretting and angering one another ever and anon for ſmall things, which in the end turne into hatred and enmity irreconcilable: for when they have begun to quarrell one with another at their games and paſtimes, about the feeding and fighting of ſome little creatures that they keepe, to witt, quailles or cocks, and afterwards about the wrelling of their boies and pages at the ſchoole, or the hunting of their hounds in the chafe, or the capa-

rison of their horses; they can no more holde and refraine (when as they be men) their contentious veine and ambition in matters of more importance: thus the greatest and mightiest men among the Greeks in our time, banding at the first one against another in taking parts with their dancers, and then in sliding with their minstrels, afterwards by comparing one with another who had the better ponds or bathing pooles in the territorie of Edepsus, who had the fairest galleries and walking places, the faterlier halles and places of pleasure, evermore changing and exchanging, and fighting (as it were) for the vantage of a place, striving still by way of odious comparison, cutting and diverting another way the conduct pipes of fountaines, are become so much exasperate one against another, that in the meane time they are utterly undone; for the tyrant is come, and hath taken all from them; banished they are out of their owne native country; they wander as poore vagabonds thorow the world, and I may be holde (well heere) to say, they are so farre changed from that they were afore, that they be others quite, this onely excepted, that they be the same still in hatred one to another. Thus it appeareth evidently, that brethren ought not a little to resist the jealousie and contentions which breed among them upon small trifles, even in the very beginning, & that by accustomed themselves to yeeld & give place reciprocally one to another, suffering themselves to be overcome & take the foile, and joying rather to pleasure and content one another, than to win the better hand one of another: for the victorie which in olde time they called the Cadmian victorie, was nothing els but that victorie betwene brethren about the citie of Thebes, which is of all other the most wicked and mischievous.

What shall we say moreover? do not the affaires of this life minister many occasions of disagreement and debate even among those brethren which are most kind and loving of all others verily. But even therein also, we must be carefull to let the said affaires to combat alone by themselves, and not to put thereto any passion of contention or anger, as an anker or hooke to catch holde of the parties, and pull them together for to quarrell, and enter into debate; but as it were in a ballance, to looke jointly together, on whether side right and equitie doth encline and bend, and so soone as ever we can, to put matters in question to the arbitrement and judgement of some good and indifferent persons, to purge and make cleere all, before they are grown so farre, as that they have gotten a staine or tincture of cankred malice, which afterwards will never be washed or scoured out: which done, we are to imitate the Pythagoreans, who being neither joined in kintred or consanguinitie, nor yet allied by affinity, but the scholars in one schoole, and the fellows of one and the same discipline, if peradventure at any time they were so farre carried away with choler, that they fell to interchange reprochfull & reviling taunts, yet before the fume was gone downe they would shake hands, kisse and embrace one another, be reconciled, and become good friends againe. For like as if there be a fever, occasioned by a botch orising in the share, there is no danger thereof, but if when the said botch is gone, the fever still continue, then it seemeth to be a maladie proceeding from some more inward, secret and deeper cause; even so the variance betwene two brethren, when it ceaseth together with the deciding of a businesse, we must thinke dependeth upon the same businesse & upon nothing els, but if the difference remaine still when the controversie is ended, surely then it was but a colourable pretence thereof, and there was within some root of secret malice which caused it. And here in this place it would serve our purpose very well, to heare the maner of proceeding in the deciding of a controversie betwene two brethren of a barbarous nation, and the same not for some little parcell of land, nor about poore slaves or silly sheepe, but for no lesse than the kingdom of Perfus: for after the death of Darius some of the Persians would have had Ariamenes to succeed and wear the crowne, as being the eldest sonne of the King late deceased; others againe stood earnestly for Xerxes, as well for that he had to his mother Aroffa the daughter of that great Cyrus, as because hee was begotten by Darius when hee was a crowned king. Ariamenes then came downe out of Media, to claime his right; not in armes, as one that minded to make warre, but simply and peaceably, attended onely with his ordinary traine & retinue, minding to enter upon the kingdom by justice & order of law. Xerxes in the meane while, & before his brother came, being present in place, ruled as king, & exercised all those functions that appertained thereto: his brother was no sooner arrived, but he tooke willingly the diademe or roiall frontlet from his head, & the princely chaplet or coronet which the Persian kings are wont to wear upright, he laid downe, & went toward his brother to meet him upon the way, & with kind greeting embraced him: he sent also certaine presents unto him, with commandement unto those that carried them, to say thus: Xerxes thy brother honoreth thee now with these presents here, but if by the sentence and judgement of the peeres and lords of Perfus he shall be declared king, his will and pleasure is, that thou shalt be the second person in the realme, and next unto him. Ariamenes answered the message in this wise: These presents I receive kindly from my brother, but I am perswaded that the kingdom of Perfus by right belongeth unto me; as for my brethren, I will reserve that honour which is meet and due unto them next after my selfe, and Xerxes shall be the first and chiefe of them all. Now when the great day of judgement was at hand, when this weightie matter should be determined; the Persians by one generall and common consent declared Artabanus the brother of Darius late departed, to be the umpire and competent judge for to decide and end this cause. Xerxes was unwilling to stand unto his award, being but one man, as who repoled more trust and confidence in the number of the princes and nobles of the realme; but his mother Aroffa reproving him for it: Tell me (quoth she) my sonne, wherefore refusest thou Artabanus to be thy judge, who is your uncle, and besides, the best man of all the Persians? and why dost thou feare so much the issue of his judgement, considering that if thou misse, yet the second place is most honourable, namely to be called the kings brother of Perfus? Then Xerxes perswaded by his mother, yeilded; and after many allegations brought and pleaded on both sides judicially, Artabanus at length pronounced definitively, that the kingdom of Perfus appertained unto Xerxes: with that Ariamenes incontinently leapt from his seat, went and did homage unto his brother, and taking him by the right hand, enthroned and entailed him king: from which time forward he was alwaies the greatest person next unto his brother; and shewed himselfe so loving and affectionate unto him, that in his quarrell he fought most valiantly in the navall battell before Salaminas, where in his service and for his honour he lost his life. This example may serve for an original patterne of true benevolence and magnanimitie, so pure and uncorrupt, as it cannot in any one point be blamed or stained. As for Antiochus as a man may reprehend in him his ambitious minde, and excessive desire of rule; so he may as well wonder that considering his vaine-glorious spirit, all brotherly love was not in him utterly extinct; for being himselfe the younger, he waged war with Seleucus for the crowne, and kept his mother sure enough for to side with him and take his part: now it hapned that during this warre and when it was at the hottest, Seleucus stricke a battell with the Galatians, lost the field, and was himselfe not to be found, but supposed certainly to have beene slaine and cut in peeces, together with his whole armie, which by the Barbarians were put to the sword and massacred; when news came unto Antiochus of this defeature, hee laide away his purple robes, put on blacke, caused the court gates to be shut, and mourned heavily for his brother, as if he had beene dead: but being afterwards advertised that he was alive safe & sound, and that he went about to gather new forces and make head againe; hee came abroad, sacrificed with thanksgiving unto the gods, & commended all those cities & states which were under his dominion to keepe holiday, to sacrifice & wear chapplets of flowers upon their heads in token of publike joy. The Athenians when they had devised an absurd and ridiculous fable as touching the quarrell betwene Neptune and Minerva, intermeddled withall another invention, which soundeth to some reason, tending to the correction of the same, and as it were to make amends for that absurditie, for they suppress alwaies the second of August, upon which day hapned (by their saying) that debate aforesaid betwene Neptune and Minerva. What should let and hinder us likewise, if it chance that we enter into any quarrell or debate with our allies and kinsfolke in blood, to condemn that day to perpetuall oblivion, and to repute and reckon it among the cursed and dismal daies: but in no wise by occasion of one such unhappie day to forget so many other good and joyfull daies wherein we have lived and bene brought up together; for either it is for nothing and in vaine that nature hath endued us with meekenesse, and harmelesse long sufferance, or patience the daughter of modestie and mediocrity, or else surely wee ought to use these vertues and good gifts of her principally to our allies and kinsfolke; and verily to crave and receive pardon of them when we our selves have offended and done amisse, declareth no lesse love and naturall affection than to forgive them if they have trespassed against us. And therefore wee ought not to neglect them if they be angrie and displeased; nor to be straight laced and stiffely stand against them when they come to justifie or excuse themselves; but rather both when our selves have faulted, oftentimes to prevent their anger by excuse, making or asking forgiveness, and also by pardoning them before they come to excuse if we have beene wronged by them. And therefore Euclides that great scholer of Socrates is much renowned and famous in all schooles of Philosophie, for that when he heard his brother breake out into these beastly and wicked words against him, The soule ill take me if I be not revenged and meet with thee; and a mischief come to me also (quoth he againe) if I appeale not thine anger, & perswade thee to love me as well as ever thou didst. But king Emmenes not in word but in deed & effect surpassed all others in meekenesse and patience: for Persus king of the Macedonians being his mortall enemie, had secretly addressed an ambush, and set certaine men of purpose to murder him about Delphos, espying their time when they saw him going from the sea side to the said towne for to consult with the oracle of Apollo: now when he was gone a little past the ambush, they began to assaile him from behinde, tumbling downe and throwing mightie stones upon his head and necke, wherewith he was so astonishd that his sight failed, and he fell withall, in that manner as he was taken for dead: now the rumour hereof ran into all parts, inasmuch as certaine of his servitors and friends made speed to the citie Pergamus, reporting the tidings of this occurrence, as if they had bene present and scene all done; whereupon Attalus the eldest brother next unto himselfe, an honest and kinde hearted man, one also who alwaies had caried himselfe most faithfully and loyally unto Emmenes, was not onely declared king, and crowned with the royall diademe; but that which more is, espoused and married Queene Stratonice his said brothers wife, and lay with her. But afterwards, when counter-newes came that Emmenes was alive and coming homeward againe, Attalus laid aside his diademe, and taking a partisan or javelin in his hand (as his manner before time was) with other pensioners and squires of the bodie, he went to meet his brother: king Emmenes received him right graciously, tooke him lovingly by the hand, embraced the Queene with all honour, and of a princely and magnanimous spirit put up all; yea and when he had lived a long time after without any complaint, suspition, and jealousy at all, in the end at his death made over and assigned both the crowne and the Queene his wife unto his brother the aforesaid Attalus: and what did Attalus now after his brothers decease? he would not foster and bring up (as heire apparant) so much as one childe that he had by Stratonice his wife, although the bare unto him many; but he nourished and carefully cherisht the sonne of his brother departed, until he was come to full age, and then himselfe in his life time with his owne hands fet the imperiall diademe and royall crowne upon his head, and proclaimed him king. But Cambyses contrariwise frighted upon a vaine dreame which he had; That his brother was come to usurpe the kingdome of Asia, without expecting any proofe or presumption thereof, put him to death for it; by occasion whereof, the succession in the empire went out of the race of Cyrus upon his decease, and was devolved upon the line of Darius, who reigned after him; a Prince who knew how to communicate the government of his affaires, and his regall authoritie, not onely with his brethren, but also with his friends.

Moreover, this one point more is to be remembered & observed diligently in all variances and debates that are risen betweene brethren: namely, then especially, and more than at any time else, to converse and keepe companie with their friends; and on the other side to avoide their enemies and evil-willers, and not to be willing so much as to vouchsafe them any speech or entertainment. Following herein the fashion of the Candiot, who being oftentimes fallen out and in civill dissension among themselves, yea and warring hot one with another, no sooner heare newes of forrein enemies coming against them, but they rancke themselves, banding jointly together against them; and this combination is that, which thereupon is called Syncretismos. For some there be, that (like as water runneth alwaies to the lower ground, and to places that chinke or cleave asunder) are readie to side with those brethren or friends that be fallen out, and by their suggestions buzzed into their cares, ruinate and overthrow all acquaintance, kindred and amitie, having indeed both parties, but seeming to beare rather upon the weaker side, and to settle upon him, who of imbecillities soone yeeldeth and giveth place. And verily those that be simple and harmlesse friends, such as commonly yong folke are, apply themselves commonly to him that affecteth a brother, helping & increasing that love what he may; but the most malicious enemies are they, who espying when one brother is angrie or fallen out with another, seeme to be angrie and offended together with him for companie; and these do most hurt of all others. Like as the hen therefore in Aesope answered unto the cat, making semblance as though she heard her say she was sicke, and therefore in kindnesse and love asking how the did? I am well enough (quoth she) I thank you, so that you were farther off; even so, unto such a man as is inquisitive and entrench into talke as touching the debate of brethren to sound and search into some secrets betweene them, one ought to answer thus: Surely there would be no quarrell betweene my brother and me, if neither I nor he would give care to carrie-tales and pick-thankes betweene us. But now it cometh to passe (I wot not how) that when our eyes be sore and in paine, we turne away our sight from those bodies and colours which make no reverberation

repercussion backe againe upon it; but when we have some complaint and quarrell, or conceive anger or suspition against our brethren, we take pleasure to heare those that make all woofe, and are apt enough to take any colour and infection, presented to us by them, where it were more needfull and expedient at such a time to avoide their enmities and evil willers, and to keepe our selves out of the way from them; and contrariwise to converse with their allies, familiars and friends; and with them to beare company especially, yea and to enter into their owne houses for to complaine and blame them before their very wives frankly and with libertie of speech. And yet it is a common saying, That brethren when they walke together, should not so much as let a stone to be betwixt them; nay they are discontented and displeased in minde, in case a dog should chance to runne overthwart them; and a number of such other things they feare, whereof there is not one able to make any breach or division betweene brethren; but in the meane while, they perceive not how they receive into the mids of them, and suffer to traverse and crosse them, men of a curthill and dogged nature, who can do nothing els but barke betweene, and sowe false rumours and calumniationes betweene one and another, for to provoke them to jarre and fall together by the eares: and therefore to great reason and very well to this purpose said Theophrastus; That if all things (according to the old proverbe) should be common among friends, then most of all they ought to entertaine friends in common; for private familiarities and acquaintances apart one from another, are great meanes to disjoine and turne away their hearts; for if they fall to love others, and make choise of other familiar friends, it must needs follow by consequence to take pleasure and delight in other companies, to esteeme and affect others, yea and to suffer themselves to be ruled and led by others. For friendships and amities frame the natures and dispositions of men; neither is there a more certaine and assured signe of different humors and divers natures, than the choise & election of different friends, in such sort as neither to eate and drinke, nor to play, nor to passe and spend whole daies together in good fellowship and companie, is so effectually to hold and maintaine the concord and good will of brethren, as to hate and love the same persons; to joy in the same acquaintance; and contrariwise to abhor and shun the same companie; for when brethren have friends common betweene them, the said friends will never suffer any surmises, calumniationes & quarrels to grow betweene; and say that peradventure there do arise some sudden heat of choler or grudging fit of complaint, presently it is cooled, quenched, and suppressed by the mediation of common friends; for readie they will be to take up the quarrell and scatter it so as it shall vanish away to nothing if they be indifferently affectionate to them both, and that their love incline no more to the one side than to the other: for like as tin-foder doth knit and rejoyne a cracke peece of brasse, in touching and taking hold of both sides and edges of the broken peeces, for that it agreeth and setteth as well to the one as to the other, and suffreth from them both alike; even so ought a friend to be fitted and futable indifferently unto both brethren, if he would knit surely, and confirme strongly their mutuall benevolence and good will. But such as are unequal, and cannot intermeddle and go betweene the one as well as the other, make a separation and disjunction, and not a sound joint, like as certaine notes or discords in musicke. And therefore it may well be doubted and question made whether Hesiodus did well or no when he said,

Make not a seere I thee advise

Thy brothers peece in any wise.

For a discreet and sober companion common to both (as I said) before, or rather incorporat (as it were) into them, shall ever be a sure knot to fasten brotherly love. But Hesiodus (as it should seeme) meant and feared this in the ordinary and vulgar sort of men, who are many of them naught, by reason that so customably they be given to jealousy and suspition, yea and to self-love which if we consider and observe, it is well; but with this regard alwaies, that although a man yeeld equal good will unto a friend as unto a brother; yet nevertheless in case of concurrence, he ought to reserve ever the preeminence and first place for his brother, whether it be in preferring him in any election of Magistrates, or to the manning of State affaires; or in bidding and inviting him to a solemne feast, or publick assembly to consult and debate of weightie causes; or in recommending him to princes & great lords. For in such cases which in the common opinion of the world are reputed matters of honor and credit, a man ought to render the dignitie, honor, and reward, which is becomming and due to blood by the course of nature. For in these things the advantage and prerogative will not purchase so much glorie and reputation to a friend, as the repulse and putting-by, bring disgrace, discredit and dishonor unto a brother.

Well,

Well, as touching this old said law and sentence of Hesiodus, I have treated more at large elsewhere; but the sententious saying of Alexander full wisely set downe in these words:

*No man who lov's another shall you see
Well pleas'd, himselfe neglected for to bee.*

pertheth us in minde and teacheth us to have good regard and care of our brethren, and not to presume so much upon the obligation of nature, as to despise them. For the horse is a beast by nature loving to a man, and the dog loves his master; but in case you never thinke upon them, nor see unto them (as you ought) they will forgoe that kind affectiō, estrange themselves & take no knowledge of you. The bodie also is most neerely knit and united to the soule by the greatest bond of nature that can be; but in case it be neglected and contemned by her, or not cherished so tenderly as it looketh to be, unwilling shall you see it to helpe and assist her, nay full un-towardly will it execute, or rather give over it will altogether everie action. Now to come more neere and to particularise upon this point, honest and good is that care and diligence which is employed and shewed to thy brethren themselves alone; but better it would be farre, if thy love and kind affections be extended as far as to their wives fathers and daughters husbands, by carrying a friendly minde and readie will to pleasure them likewise, and to do for them in all their occasions; if they be courteous and affable in saluting their servants, such especially as they love and favour; thankfull and beholding to their Physicians who had them in cure during sickness and were diligent about them; acknowledging themselves bound unto their faithfull and trustie friends, or to such as were willing and forward to take such part as they did in any long voyage and expedition, or to beare them company in warfare. And as for the wedded wife of a brother whom he is to reverence, repute and honor no lesse than a most sacred and holy relique or monument, if at any time he happen to see her, it will be come him to speake all honour and good of her husband before her; or to be offended and complaine (as well as the) of her husband, if he set not that store by her as he ought, and when she is angred to appease and still her. Say also that she have done some light fault, and offended her husband, to reconcile him againe unto her and entreat him to be content and to pardon her; and likewise if there be some particular and private cause of difference betwene him and his brother, to acquaint the wife therewith, and by her meane to complaine thereof, that she may take up the matter by composition and end the quarrell.

Lives thy brother a bachelor and hath no children? thou oughtest in good earnest to be angrie with him for it, to sollicite him to marriage, yea with chiding, rating, and by all meanes urge him to leave this single life, and by entering into wedlocke to be linked in lawfull alliance and affinitie: hath he children? then you are to shew your good will and affection more manifestly, as well toward him as his wife, in honouring him more than ever before, in loving his children as if they were your owne, yea and shewing your selfe more indulgent, kinde and affable unto them; that if it chanceth they do faults and shrewd turnes (as little ones are wont) they runne not away, nor retire into some blind and solitarie corner for feare of father and mother, or by that meane light into some light, unhappie and ungracious companie, but may have recourse & refuge unto their uncle, where they may be admonished lovingly, and find an intercessor to make their excuse & get their pardon. Thus Plato reclaimed his brothers son or nephew Spensippus, from his loose life and dissolute riot, without doing any harme or giving him soule words, but by winning him with faire and gentle language (whereas his father and mother did nothing but rate and crie upon him continually, which caused him to runne away and keepe out of their sight) he imprinted in his heart a great reverence of him, and a fervent zeale to imitate him, and to set his mind to the studie of Philosophie, notwithstanding many of his friends thought hardly of him and blamed him not a little, for that he tooke not another course with the untoward youth, namely, to rebuke, checke, and chastise him sharply: but this was evermore his answer unto them: That he reprovved and tooke him downe sufficiently, by shewing unto him by his owne life and carriage, what difference there was betwene vice and vertue, between things honest and dishonest. Alexas sometime King of Thessalie, was hardly used and overawed by his father, for that he was insolent, proud, and violent withall; but contrariwise, his uncle by the fathers side, would give him entertainment, beare him out and make much of him. Now when upon a time the Thessalians sent unto Delphos certaine lots, to know by the oracle of god Apollo who should be their king? The foresaid uncle of Alexas unwitting to his brother, put in one for him: Then Pythia the Prophetesse gave answer from Apollo and pronounced, That Alexas should be king: The father of Alexas denied, and said that he had cast in no lot for him; and it seemed unto every man that there was some error in writing of those billes or names for the lotterie; whereupon new messengers were dispatched to the Oracle for to cleere this doubt; and then Pythia in confirmation of the former choise, answered:

*I meane that youth with reddish haire,
Whom dame Archedice in wombe did beare.*

Thus Alexas declared and elected king of Thessalie, by the oracle of Apollo, and by the meanes withall of his fathers brother, both proved himselfe afterward a most noble prince, excelling all his progenitours and predeceffours, and also raised the whole nation and his country a great name and mighty puissance.

Furthermore, it is seemely and convenient by joying and taking a glory in the advancement, prosperity, honours and dignities of brothers children, to augment the fame, and to encourage and animate them to vertue, and when they do well, to praise them to the full. Haply it might be thought an odious and unseemely thing for a man to commend much his owne sonne, but surely to praise a brothers sonne is an honourable thing, and since it proceedeth not from the love of a mans selfe, it can not be thought but right, honest, and (in truth) divine: for surely one thinks the very name it selfe (of uncle) is sufficient to draw brethren to affect & love dearly one another, and so consequently their nephewes: and thus we ought to propose unto our selves, for to imitate the better sort, & such as have bene immortalised & deified in times past: for so Hercules notwithstanding he had 70 sonnes within twaine of his owne, yet he loved Iolas his brothers sonne no lesse than any of them; inasmuch as even at this day in most places there is but one altar erected for him and his said nephew together, and men pray jointly unto Hercules and Iolas. Also when his brother Iphiclus was slain in that famous battell which was fought nere Lacedaemon, he was so exceedingly displeased, and tooke such indignation thereat, that he departed out of Peloponneus, and left the whole country. As for Leucothea, when her sister was dead, she nourished and brought up her childe, and together with her, ranged it among the heavenly faints: whereupon the Romane dames even at this day, when they celebrate the feast of Leucothea (whom they name Matuta) carrie in their armes and cherish tenderly their sisters children, and not their owne.

OF INTEMPERATE SPEECH OR GAR- RULITIE.

The Summarie.

That which is commonly said, All extremities be naught, requirerh otherwhiles an exposition, and namely, in that vertue which we call Temperance, one of the kinds or branches whereof, consisteth in the right use of the tongue, which is as much to say, as the skill and knowledge how to speake as it becometh: now the moderation of speech hath for the two extreames, Silence (a thing more often praise-worthy than reprobable) and Babbie; against which this Discourse is addressed. Considering then, that silence is an assured regard unto wise men, and opposite directly unto much prating, and comely and seemely speecus in the mids, we call not silence a vice, but say, That a man never findeth harme by holding his peace. But as touching Garrulitie or Intemperate speech, the author sheweth in the very beginning of his Treatise, that it is a maladie incurable and against nature: for it doth frustrate the talkative person of his greatest desire, to wit, for to have audience and credit given him; also that it maketh a man inconsiderate, importune and malapert, ridiculous, mocked and hated, plunging him ordinarily into danger, as many events have proovved by experience. For to discover this matter the better, he saith consequently:

sequently: That the nature of vertuous men and those who have noble bringing up, is directly opposite unto that of long-tongued persons; and joining the reasons by which a man ought not to bewray his secret, together with those evils and inconveniences which curiosity & much babble do bring, and confirming all by fine similitudes and notable examples: afterwards, taking in hand againe his former speech and argument, he compareth a traitor and busie talker together, to the end that all men should so much the rather detest the vice of garrulitie: then he proceedeth immediately to discover and apply the remedies of this mischief, willing us, in the first place and generally to consider the calamities and miseries that much babbling causeth; as also the good & commodity which proceedeth of silence: which done, he discouseth of those particular remedies, which import thus much in effect: That a man ought to shame and accustom himselfe, either to be silent, or els to speake last; to avoid all hastinesse in making his answer; to say nothing, but that which is either needfull or civill; to shun and forbear those discourses which please us most, and wherein we may be some over scene and proceed too farre; to finde busie praters occupied apart from them; to provide them the companie of men who are of authority and aged; In summe, to consider whether that which a man hath said, be convenient, meet and profitable, and never to beleeve, to thinke alwaies of this: That other-whiles a man may repent of some words spoken, but never of keeping silence.

OF INTEMPERATE speech or Garrulitie.

Very hard and troublesome cure it is that Philosopher hath undertaken, namely, To heale the disease of much prating; for that the medicine and remedie which the useth, be words that must be received by hearing; and these great talkers will abide to heare no man, for that they have all the words themselves, and talke continually; so that the first mischief of those who can not hold their tongue and keepe silence, is this: That they neither can nor will give eare to another; inso much as it is a wilfull kinde of deafenesse in men, who seeme thereby to controll nature, and complaine of her, in that where the hath allowed them two eares, she hath given them but one tongue. If then Euripides said very well unto a foolish auditor of his,

*Powre I wise words, and counsell what I can
With all my skill, into a sottish man,
Unmeth if all I be able him to fill,
If holde and keepe the same he never will.*

a man may more truly and justly say unto (or rather of) a prating fellow,

*Powre I wise words, and counsell what I can
With all my skill unto a sottish man,
Unmeth I shall be able him to fill,
In case receive the same he never will.*

and in truth, more properly it may be said: That one powreth good advertisements about such an one and beside him rather, than into him, so long as he either speaketh unto him that listeth not, or giveth no eare unto them that speake: for if a prating fellow chance to heare some short and little tale, such is the nature of this disease called Garrulitie, that his hearing is but a kinde of taking his winde new, to babble it forth againe immediately, much more than it was, or like a whistle-poele which whatsoever it taketh once, the same it sendeth up againe very often with the vantage. Within the city Olympia there was a porch or gallery called Heptaphonos, for that from one voice by sundry reflections and reverberations it rendred seven echoes: but if some speech come to the eares of a babbler, and enter never so little in, by and by it refundeth againe on every side,

*And stirs the strings of secret heart within,
Which should be still, and not be moov'd therein.*

inso much, as a man may well say: That the conducts and passages of their hearing reach not to the braine where their soule and minde is seated, but onely to their tongue: by reason whereof, whereas in others, the words that be heard doe rest in their understanding, in praters they vnderstand

away and runne out presently, and afterwards they goe up and downe like emptie vessels, void of sense and full of found. Well, as incurable as such seeme to be, yet if it may be thought available to leave no experiment untied for to doe such good, we may begin our cure, and say thus unto a busie prater:

Peace my good sonne, for Taciturnitie Brings ay with it much good commodity.

But among the rest, these be the two chiefe and principall, namely: To heare and to be heard; of which twaine, our importunate talkers can attaine neither the one nor the other, so unhappie they are as to be frustrate of that which they so much desire. As for other passions and maladies of the soule, namely, Avarice, Ambition, Love and Voluptuousnesse, they doe all of them in some sort enjoy their desire; but the thing that troubleth and tormenteth these babbling fellows most, is this: That seeking for audience so much as they do, and nothing more, they can never meet with it, but every man shunneth their company, and flieth away as fast as his legges will carrie him; for whether men be set together in a knot, sadly talking in their round chaires, or walking in companie, let them espie one of these praters comming toward them, away they goe every one, that a man would say the retreat were sounded, so quickly they retire. And like as when in some assembly if all be hushed on a sudden so as there is not a word, wee use to say that Mercurie is come among them; even so when a prating foole entrench into a place where friends are either set at the boord to make merry, or otherwise met together in counsell, everie man straightwaies is silent and holdeth his peace, as being unwilling to minister occasion unto him of talke; but if himselfe begin first to open his lips, up they rise all and are soone gone, as mariners suspecting, & doubting by the whistling northern wind from the top of craggie rocks, and promontories, some rough sea, and fearing to be stomacke-sicke, retire betimes into a bay for harbor: whereby it cometh to passe also, that neither at a supper can he meet with guests willing to eate and drinke with him, nor yet companions to lodge with him, either in journey by land, or voiage by sea, unlesse it be by constraint. For so importunate he is alwaies, that one while he is ready to hang upon a mans cloake wherefoever he goes, another while he takes hold on the side of his beard, as if he knocked at the doore with his hand to force him to speake; in which case well fare a good paire of legs, for they are woorth much monie at such a time; as Archilochus was wont to say, yea and Aristotle also that wise Philosopher: for when upon a time he was much troubled with one of these busie praters, who haunted and wearied him out of measure with cavilling tales and many foolish and absurd discourses, iterating effoones these words; And is not this a woonderful thing Aristotle? No iwis (quoth he againe) but this were a wonder rather, if a man that hath feet of his owne should stand still and abide to heare you thus prate. Unto another also of the same stamp, who after much pricke prattle and a long discourse, said thus unto him: I doubt I have bin tedious unto you Philosopher with my many words; No in good sooth (quoth Aristotle unto him): for I gave no eare at all unto you, For if otherwhiles men cannot shake such praters off, but must of necessitie let their tongues walke, this benefit he hath by the foule, that the retirith inwardly all the while lending the outward eares onely for them to beat upon, and dash as it were all about with their jangling bibble babble; for the in the meane time is otherwise occupied, and discourseth to herselfe of divers matters within; by which meanes such fellows can meet with no hearers that take heed what they say, or beleve their words. For as it is generally held, that the naturall seed of such as are lecherous and much given to the companie of women is unfruitfull and of no force to engender; even so the talke of these great praters is vaine, barren, and altogether fruitlesse. And yet there is no part or member of our body that nature hath so surely defended (as it were) with a strong rampar, as the tongue: for before it the hath set a pallaizado of sharpe teeth, to the end that if peradventure it will not obey reason, which within holdeth it hard as with a strait bridle, but it will blatter out and not tarry within, we might bite it until it bleed againe, and so refraine the intemperance thereof. For

*But tongues and mouth's unbri'dled if they bee
Shall find in the end mishap and miserie.*

And those in my conceit who say that houses without doores, and purses without strings, serve their matters in no steed; and yet in the meane time, neither set hatch nor locke unto their mouths, but suffer them run out and overflow continually, like unto the mouth of the sea Pontus, these I say in mine opinion seeme to make no other account of words than of the basest thing in the world; whereby they are never beleaved (say what they will) and yet this is the proper

per

per end and scope that all speech tendeth to, namely to winne credit with the hearers; and no man will ever beleeeve these great talkers, no not when they speake the truth. For like as wheat if be it enclosed within fomes danke or mould vefsell, doth well and yeeld more in measure, but for use is found to be worse; even so it is with the talke of a prating person; well may he multiply and augment it with lying, but by that meanes it leeseeth all the force of perswasion. Moreover what modest, civil, and honest man is there, who would not verie carefully take heed of drunkenness? for anger (as some say) may well be ranged with rage & madness; and drunkenness doth lodge and dwell with her, or rather is it madnes it selfe, onely in circumstance of time it may be counted lesse, for that it continueth lesse while, but surely in regard of the cause it is greater, for that it is voluntarie, and we runne wilfully into it, and without any constraint. Now there is no one thing for which drunkenness is so much blamed and accused as for intemperate speech and talke without end: for as the Poët saith,

*Wine makes a man who is both wise and grave
To sing and chime, to laugh full varronly,
It causeth him to dance, and kee to rave,
And many things to do unadcently.*

for the greatest and worst matter that ensueth thereupon is not singing, laughing and dancing; there is another inconvenience in comparison whereof all these are nothing, and that is,

*To blurt abroad, and those words to reveale,
Which better were within for to conceale.*

This is (I say) the mischief most dangerous of all the rest: and it may bethat the Poët covertly would asseile that question which the Philosophers have propounded and disputed upon; namely, what difference there might be, betweene liberal drinking of wine, and stark drunkenness? in attributing unto the former mirth and jocundnesse extraordinarie, and to the latter much babbling and toolish prattle: for according to the common proverbe, that which is feared in the heart and thought of a sober person, lieth aloft in the mouth and tongue of a drunkard. And therefore wisely answered the Philosopher Alex unto one of these jangling and prating companions: for when he seemed to marke him for sitting still, and saying nothing at a feast, inso much as he gave him the lob and foole for it: And how is it possible (quoth he) that a foole should hold his peace at the table? There was upon a time a citizen of Athens who feasted the embassadours of the king of Persia, and for that he perceived that these great Lords would take delight in the companie of learned men and Philosophers, upon a brave minde that he carried, invited they were all & met there together: now when all the rest began to discourse in general, and everie man seemed to put in some vie for himselfe, and to hold and maintaine one theame or other, Zeno who sat among them was onely silent and spake not a word; whereupon the said Embassadours and strangers of Persia began to bee merrie with him and to drinke unto him round, saying in the end: And what shall we report of you Sir Zeno unto the King our master? Marie (quoth he) no more but this, that there is an ancient man at Athens who can sit at the boord and say nothing. Thus you see that silence argueth deepe and profound wisdom; it implereth sobriety, and is a mysticall secret and divine vertue; whereas drunkenness is talkative, full of words, void offense and reason; and indeed thereupon multiplieth so many words, and is ever jangling. And in truth the Philosophers themselves when they define drunkenness say: That it is a kinde of raving and speaking idly at the table upon drinking too much wine; whereby it is evident, that they do not simply condemne drinking, so that a man keepe himselfe within the bounds of modestie and silence; but it is excessive and foolish talke, that of drinking wine maketh drunkenness. Thus the drunkard raveth and talketh idly when he is cup-shotten at the boord; but the prater and man of many words doth it alwaies and in every place, in the market and common hal, at the theatre, in the public galleries and walking places, by day and by night. If he be a physician and visit his patient, certes he is more grievous, and doth more hurt in his cure than the maladie it selfe; if he be a passenger with others in a ship, all the companie had rather be sea-sicke than heare him prate; if he set to praise thee, thou wert better to be dispraised by another; and in a word, a man shall have more pleasure and delight to converse and commune with lewd persons so they be discreet in their speech, than with others that be buisie talkers, though otherwise they be good honest men. True it is indeed that old Nestor in a tragedie of Sophocles speaking unto Ajax (who overthor himselfe in some hot and hasty words) for to appeale and pacifie him, saith thus after a milde and gracious maner,

I blame not you sir Ajax for your speech

Nought though it be, your deeds are nothing lesse.

But surely we are not so well affected unto a vaine-prating fellow; for his importunate and unseasonable words, marre all his good works, and make them to lose their grace. Lysias upon a time, at the request of one who had a cause to plead unto at the barre, penned an oration for his purpose and gave it him. The partie after he had read and read it over againe, came unto Lysias heave and ill-appealed saying: The first time that I perused your oration, me thought it was excellently well written, and I wondred at it; but when I took it a second and third time in hand, it seemed very simply endited & carried no forcible and effectual stile with it. Why (quoth Lysias, and smiled withall) know you not that you are to pronounce it but once before the judges? and yet see & marke withall the perswasive eloquence and sweet grace that is in the writing of Lysias, for I may be bold to say and affirme of him, that

The Muses with their broidered violet haire, Grae'd him with favour much and beauty faire.

And among those singular commendations that are given out of any Poët; most true it is that Homer is he alone of all that ever were, who overcame all fatietie of the reader; seeming evermore new and fresh, flourishing alwaies in the prime of lovely grace, and appeering young still and amiable to win favour; howbeit in speaking and professing thus much of himselfe,

It grieves me much for to chafe againe

A tale that once delivered hath bene plaine.

He sheweth sufficiently that he avoideth what he can, and seareth that tedious fatietie which followeth hard at heeles, & lieth wait (as it were) unto all long traines of speech; in which regard he leadeth the reader & hearer of his Poëmes from one discourse & narration to another, and evermore with novelties doth to refresh and recreate him, that he thinketh he hath never enough; whereas our long-tongued chatteringers do alter a sort wound and weary the eares of their hearers by their tautologies and vaine repetitions of the same thing as they that soile and floury writing tables when they be faire scoured and clensed; and therefore let us set this first and formost before their eies, that like as they who force men to drinke wine out of measure and undelaid with water, are the cause that the good blessing which was given us to rejoyce our hearts and make us pleasant and merry, driveth some into sadness, and others into drunkenness and violence; even so they that beyond all reason and to no purpose use their speech (which is a thing otherwise counted the most delightfull and amiable meanes of conference and societie that men have together) cause it to bee inhumane and unfociable, displeasing those whom they thought to please, making them to be mocked at their hands, of whom they looked to be well esteemed, and to have their will and displeasure, whose love and amitie they made reckoning of. And even as hee by good right may be esteemed uncourteous and altogether unciwill, who with the girdle and tisse of Venus, wherein are all sorts of kind and amiable allurements, should repell and drive from him as many as desire his companie; so hee that with his speech maketh others heave and himselfe hatefull, may well be held and reputed for a gracelesse man and of no bringing up in the world. As for other passions and maladies of the minde, some are dangerous, others odious, and some againe ridiculous and expoled to mockerie; but garrulity is subject unto all these inconveniences at once. For such folke as are noted for their lavish tongue, are a meere laughing stocke, and in every common and ordinary report of theirs, they minister occasion of laughter; hated they be for their relation of ill newes, and in danger they are because they cannot conceale and keepe close their owne secrets: heereupon Anacharsis being invited one day & feasted by Solan, was reputed wise, for that being asleepe he was found and seene holding his right hand to his mouth, and his left upon his privities and natural parts: for good reason he had to thinke, that the tongue required and needed the stronger bridle and bit to restraine it: and in very truth it were a hard matter to reckon for many persons undone, and overthrowed by their intemperate and loose life, as there have bene cities and mightie States ruined and subverted utterly, by the revealing and opening of some secrets. It befell that whiles Sylla did league before the citie of Athens, and had not leasure to stay there long and continue the siege, by reason of other affaires and troubles pressed him sore, for of one side king Mithridates invaded and harmed Asia, and on the other side the faction of Marius gathered strength; and having gotten head, prevailed much within Rome: certeine old fellows being met in a barbers shop within the city of Athens, who were blabs of their tongues, clattered it out in their talk together, that a certeine quarter of the citie named Heptaneleion was not sufficiently guarded, and therefore the towne in danger to be surpris'd by that part; which talke of theirs was over-heard by certtine espies, who aduertised Sylla so much; whereupon immediately hee brought all his forces to that side, and about midnight gave an hot assault, made entrie and went within a very litle of forcing the citie, and being matter of it all, for he filled the whole streete called Ceramicum with slaughter and dead carcasses, inso much as the chaelers ran downe with blood. Now was hee cruelly bent against the Athenians more for their hard language which they gave him than for any offence or injurie otherwise that they did unto him, for they had flouted and mocked Sylla, together with his wife Metella; and for that purpose they would get upon the walles and say: Sylla is a Sycamore or Mulberie, bestrewed all over with dusty-meale; besides many other such foolish jibes and taunts; and so for the lightest thing in the world (as Plato saith) to wit, words which are but winde, they brought upon their heads a most heave and grievous penaltie. The garrulitie and over-much talke of one man, was the onely hinderance that the citie of Rome was not set free and delivered from the tyrannie of Nero. For there was but one night betweene the time that Nero should have bene murdered on the morrow, and all things were readie and prepared for the purpose: but he who had undertaken the execution of that feat, as he went toward the Theatre, espied one of those persons who were condemned to die, bound and pinnioned at the prison doore, and readie to be led and brought before Nero; who hearing him to make piteous moane and lamenting his miserable fortune, steps to him and rounding him softly in the care: Pray to God poore man (quoth he) that this one day may passe over thy head, and that thou die not to day, for to morrow thou shalt come, thanks. The poore prisoner taking hold presently of this enigmaticall and darke speech, and thinking (as I suppose) that one bird in hand is better than two in bush, and according to the common saying, that

A fowle is he who leaving that which readie is and sure, Dare follow after things that be unreadie and unsure.

made choise of saving his life by the surer way, rather than by the juster meanes; for he discovered unto Nero that which the man had whispered secretly unto him: whereupon presently the partie was apprehended and carried away to the place of torture, where by racking, scotching and scourging; he was urged miserable wretch, to confesse and speake out that perforce, which of himselfe he had revealed without any constraint at all. Zeno the Philosopher fearing that while his body was put to dolorous and horrible torments, he should be forced even against his will to bewray and disclose some secret plot; bit off his tongue with his owne teeth and spit it in the Tyrants face. Notable is the example of Leana, and the reward which she had for continuing and ruling her tongue in singular. An harlot she was and verie familiar with Harmodius and Aristogiton; by means of which inward acquaintance, privie she was and partie as farre forth as a woman might be to that conspiracie which they had complotted against the usurping tyrants of Athens, and the hopes that they builded upon (Drunke she had out of that faire cup of Love, and thereby vowed never to reveale the secrets of god Cupid.) Now after that these two paramours and lovers of hers had failed of their enterprize and were put to death; she was called into question and put to torture, and therewith commaunded to declare the rest of the complices in that conspiracie, who as yet were unknown and not brought to light: but so constant and resolute she was, that she would not detect so much as one, but endured all paines and extremities whatsoever; whereby she shewed that those two young gentlemen had done nothing unfitting their persons and nobilitie, in making choise to be enamoured of her. In regard of which rare secrecie of hers, the Athenians caused a Lionesse to be made of brasse without a tongue, and the same in memoriall of her to be erected and set up at the verie gate and entrie of their Citadell; giving posteritie to understand by the generosity of that beast, what an undaunted and invincible heart she had; and likewise of what taciturnitie and trust in keeping secrets, by making it tonguelesse: and to say a truth, never any word spoken served to so good steed as many concealed and held in, have profited. For why? A man may one time or other utter that which he once kept in; but being spoken, it cannot possibly be recalled and unsaid, for out it is gone alreadie and spread abroad sundrie waies. And hereupon it is (I suppose) that we have men to teach us for to speake, but we learne of the gods to hold our peace. For in sacrifices, religious mysteries, and ceremonies of divine service we receive by tradition, a custome to keepe silence. And even so, the Poet Homer feigned Ulysses (whose eloquence otherwise was so sweet) to be of all

all men most silent and of fewest words; his sonne likewise, his wife and nourse, whom you may heare thus speaking:

*As soone shall stocke of sturdayeake it tell,
Or iron so strong, as I will it reveale.*

And Ulysses himselfe sitting by Penelope, before he would be known unto her who he was, Grieved in his mind, and pited to behold His wife by teares to shew what hearts did feeble, But all the while his eyes he stiffe did hold, Which sturde no more than horne or sturdie Steele.

so full was his tongue of patience, and his lips of continence. For why? reason had all the parts of his bodie so obseisant and readie at command, that it gave order to the eyes not to shed teares; to the tongue not to utter a word; to the heart not to pant or tremble, nor so much as to sob or sigh:

*Thus unto reason obseisant was his heart,
Perswaded all to take in better part.*

yea his reason had gotten the matrie of those inward and secret motions which are voide and incapable of reason, as having under her hand the verie blood and vitall spirits in all obeyfance: his people also and traine about him were for the most part of that disposition; for what wanted this of constancy & loyalty to their lord in the highest degree, to suffer themselves to be pulled 20 & haled, to be tugged & toiled, yea & dashed against the hard ground under foote by the giant Cyclops, rather than to utter one word against Ulysses, or to bewray that logge of wood which was burnt at the one end, & an instrument made readie for to put out his onely eye that he had? may they endured rather to be eaten & devoured raw by him, than to disclose any of Ulysses his secrets. Pittacus therefore did not amisse, who when the King of Egypt had sent unto him abeast for sacrifice, and willed him withall to take out and lay apart the best and woorst piece thereof, plucked out the tongue and sent it unto him, as being the organ of many good things, and no lesse instrument of the woorst that be in the world. And Ladie Ivo in Euripides speaking freely of herselfe, saith that she knew the time,

*When that she ought her tongue to hold,
And when to speake, she might be bold.*

30 For certainly those who have had noble and princely bringing up in deed, learne first to keepe silence, and afterwards how to speake. And therefore king Antigonus the great, when his sonne upon a time asked him, When they should dislodge and breake up the campe: What sonne (quoth hee) art thou alone afraid, that when the time comes thou shalt not heare the trumpet sound theremove? Loe, how he would not trust him with a word of secrecie, unto whom he was to leave his kingdom in succession! teaching him thereby, that he also another day should in such cases be wary and spare his speech. Olde Metellus likewise, being asked such another secret as touching the armie and setting forward of some expedition: If I wist (quoth he) that my shirt which is next my skinne, knew this my inward intent and secret purpose, I would put it off 40 and sling it into the fire. King Enmenes, being advertised that Craterus was coming against him with his forces, kept it to himselfe, and would not acquaint any of his neere friends therewith, but made semblance and gave it out (though untruly) that it was Neopolemus who had the leading of that power; for him did his fouldiours contemne and make no reckoning of, whereas the glory and renowne of Craterus they had in admiration, and loved his vertue and valour: now when no man els but himselfe knew of Craterus his being in the field, they gave him battell, vanquished him, slew him before they were aware, neither tooke they knowledge of him before they found him dead on the ground. See how by a stratageme of secrecie and silence the victorie was achieved, onely by concealing so hardie and terrible an enemy; inso much, as his very friends about him admired more his wisdom in keeping this secret from 50 them, than complained of his diffidence and distrust of them. And say that a man should complaine of thee in such a case, better it were yet to be challenged and blamed for distrusting, all the while thou remainest safe and obtaine a victorie by that meanes, than to be justly accused after an overthrow, for being so open and trusting so easily. Moreover, how darrest thou confidently and boldly blame and reprove another for not keeping that secret, which thou thy selfe hast revealed? for if it was behoovefull and expedient that it should not be known, why hast thou tolde it to another? but in case when thou hast lettie a secret from thy selfe unto a man, thou wouldest have him to holde it in, and not blurt it out, surely it can not be but thou hast better confidence in another than thy selfe : now if he be like thy selfe , who will pity thee if thou come by a mischiefe? is he better , and so by that meanes saveth thee harmelesse beyond all reason and ordinary course? then hast thou met with one more faithfull to thee than thou art thy selfe : but haply thou wilt say : He is my very friend ; so hath he another friend (before) whom he will do as much for , and disclose the same secret unto , and that friend (no doubt) hath another. Thus one word will get more still, it will grow and multiply by a sute and sequence linked & hanging to an intemperate tongue: for like as Unitie, so long as the pasteth not her bounds, but continueth and remaineth still in herselfe, is one and no more, in which respect she is called in Greeke, Monas, that is to say, Alone; whereas the number of twaine is the beginning of a diversitie (as it were) and difference, and therefore indefinite; for straight waies is Unitie passed forth of it selfe by doubling, and so turneth to a plurality; even so a word or speech all the while it abideth enclosed in him who first knew it, is truly and properly called a Secret, but after it is once gotten forth and let a going, so that it is come unto another, it beginneth to take the name of a common brute and rumour : for as the Poet very well saith; Words have wings. A bird, if she be let flie once out of our hands, it is much adoe to catch againe; and even so, when a word hath passed out of a mans mouth, hardly or unnethe may we withholde or recover; for it flieeth amaine, it flappeth her light wings, fetching many a round compasse, and spreadeth every way from one quarter to another: well may mariners flay a ship with cables and ankers, when the violence of the winde is ready to drive and carrie her an end, or at least wile they may moderate her swift & flight course; but if a word be issued out of the mouth, as out of her haven, and have gotten sea-roume, there is no bay nor harbour to tide in, there is no casting of anker will serve the turne, away she goes with a mighty noise and hurry, untill in the end she runnes upon some rocke and is split, or els into a great and deepe gulf, to the present danger of him who let her forth;

*For in small time, and with a little sparke
Of fire, a man may burne the Forrest tall
Of Ida mount; ev'n so (who list to marke)
All towne will heare, a word do one let fall.*

The Senate of Rome upon a time sat in sadde and serious counsell many daies together about a matter of great fecerie : now the thing being so much the more suspected and hearkened after, as it was lesse apparent and known abroad; a certaine Romane dame, otherwise a good-foller and wife matron (howbeit a woman) importuned her husband and instantly befought him, of all loves to tell her what this secret matter might be upon which they did sit so close in consultation; protesting with many an oath and execrable curse to keepe silence and not to utter to any creature in the world; you must thinke also, that she had teares at command, lamenting and complaining withall, what an unhappie woman she was, in case her husband would not trust her so much as with a word : the Romane Senatour her husband minding to trie and reprove her folly: Thou hast overcome me (sweet heart, quoth hee) and through thine importunitie, thou shalt heare of a strange and terrible occurrent that troubleth us all. So it is, that we are advertised by our Priests, that there hath bene a larke of late seene flying in the aire, with a golden cop or crest on her head in manner of an helmet, and withall, bearing a javelin: hereupon we do conferre and consult with our Soothsaiers and Diviners, desirous to be certified out of their learning, whether this prodigious token portend good or hurt to the Common-weale? but keepe it to thy selfe (as thou lovest me) and tell it no bodie. When he had thus said, he went forth toward the Common hall and Market place: his wife incontinently had no sooner spied one of her waiting-maidens coming into the roome, but she drew her apart, begunne to heat and knocke her owne brest, to rent and teare the haire off her head, and therewith: Ah, woe's me (quoth she) for my poore husband, my sweet native country; alas and weladay, what shall we doe, and what will become of us all; as if shee taught her maide and were desirous that shee should say thus unto her againe: Why, what is the matter mistresse? Now when the maiden thereupon asked her, What newes? shee fell tale an end and told all, marie shee forgot not the common and ordinarie burden or clause, that all blabs of their tongue use to come in with: But in any case (quoth she) say nothing, but keepe it to thy selfe. Scarfe was shee gone out of her mistresse sight, but seeing one of her fellowes whom shee found most at leisure and doing little or nothing to her shee imparted all. That wench againe made no more adoe, but to her lover shee goes, who haply then was come to visite her, and telleth him as much. By this meanes the tale was bruted abroad, and passed roundly from one to another; inasmuch as the rumour thereof

was

was runne into the market place, and there went currant before the first author, and devised thereof himselfe was gotten thither. For there meetes with him one of his familiars and friends: How now (quoth he) are you come but now directly from your house to the market place: No (quoth he againe) I am but newly come: Why then belike (saith the other) you have heard no newes? Newes (quoth he) what newes should I heare? and what tidings can you tell me of? Why man (answered he againe) there hath bene of late a Larke seene flying with a golden cop or crest on her head, and carrying beside a javelin; and the Consult with other Magistrates are ready to call a Senate house for to sit upon this strange occurrent. With that the Senatour before said, turning aside & smiling, thus said to himselfe: Wel done wife, I can thee thank for thy quicknes & celeritie, thou hast quit thy selfe well indeed, that the word which erewhile I uttered unto thee, is gotten before me into the market place. Well, the first thing that he did was this, To the Magistrates he went straightwaies, signified unto them the occasion of this speech, and freed them from all feare and trouble: but when he was come home to his owne house he fell in hand to chastise his wife: How now Dame (quoth he) how is this come to passe; you have undone me for ever; for it is found and knowen for a truth, that this secret and matter of counsell which I imparted to you, is divulged and published abroad, and that out of my house: and thus your unbridled tongue is the cause that I must abandon and fly my country, and forthwith depart into exile. Now when at the first she would have denied the thing stoutly, and alledged for her excuse and defence, saying: Are not there three hundred Senatours besides you your selfe, who heard it as well as you? No marvel then if it be known abroad. What tell you me of three hundred (quoth he?) upon your importunate instance, I devised it of mine owne head, in mirth to trie your silence, and whether you could keepe counsell. Certes, this Senator was a wife man and went safely and warily to worke, who to make proofe of his wife, whom hee tooke to be no foundier nor surer than a crackt and rotten vessell, would not poure into it either wine or oile, but water only, to see if it would leake & run out. But Fulvius one of the favorites & minions of Augustus the Emperor, when he was now well stepped in yeeres, having heard him toward his latter daies, lamenting and bewailing the desolate estate of his house, in that he had no children of his owne bodie begotten; and that of his three nephewes or sisters children two were dead, and Posthumus (who onely remained alive) upon an imputation there upon him confined, and living in banishment, whereupon he was enforced to bring in his wives sonne, and declare him heire apparent to succeed him in the Empire: notwithstanding upon a tender compassion, he was otherwhiles in deliberation with himselfe, and minded to recall his foresaid sisters sonne from exile, and the place whereunto he was confined. Fulvius (I say) being privy to these moanes and desseignes of his, went home and told his wife all that he had heard. Shee could not hold but goes to the Emperesse Livia, wife of Augustus, and reported what her husband Fulvius had told her. Whereupon Livia taking great indignation, sharply did contest and expostulate with Cesar in these termes: That seeing it is so (quoth she) that you had so long before projected & determined such a thing, as to call home againe your nephew afore said; why sent you not for him at the first, but exposed me to hatred, enmity & war with him, who another day should weare the Diademe and be Emperor after your decease? Well the next morning betimes, when Fulvius came, as his maner was, to salute Cesar and give him good morrow, after he had said unto him, Salve Kalpae; that is, God save you Cesar. He resaluted him no other wise but this, Salve Fulvius; that is, God make you wife Fulvius. Fulvius soone found him and conceived presently what hee meant thereby; whereupon hee retired home to his house with all speede, and called for his wife; unto whom Cesar (quoth hee) is come to the knowledge that I have not kept his counsell nor concealed his secrets; and therefore I am resolved to make my selfe away with mine owne handes. And well woorthie (quoth shee) for justly you have deserved death, who having lived so long with me, knew not the incontinence of my tongue all this while, nor would take heed and beware of it; but yet suffer me first to die upon your sword; and with that catching hold thereof, killed herselfe before her husband. And therefore Philippides the Comedian, did verie wisely in his answer to King Lysimachus, who by way of all courtesie making much of him, and minding to do him honour, demanded of him thus: What wouldst thou have me to impart unto thee of all other treasure and riches that I have? What it shall please your Majestie (quoth he) my gracious Lord, so it be none of your secrets.

Moreover, there is adjoined ordinarily unto Garrulitie, another vice no lesse than it; namely, Bussie intermeddling and Curiositie, for men desire to heare and know much newes, because they

they may report and blafe the fame abroad, and eſpecially if they be ſecrets. Thus goe they up and downe liſtning, enquiring and ſearching if they can find and diſcover ſome cloſe and hidden ſpeeches, adding as it were ſome olde ſurcharge of odious matters to their toies and fooleries; which maketh them afterwards to be like unto little boies, who neither can hold yee in their hands, nor yet will let it goe; or to ſay more truly, they claſpe and containe in their boſoms ſecret ſpeeches, reſembling ſerpents, which they are not able to hold and keepe long, but are eaten and gnawen by them. It is ſaid that certaine fiſhes called the Sea-needles, yea and the vipers doe cleave and burſt when they bring forth their yoor; and even ſo, ſecrets when they be let fall out of their mouthes who can not containe them, undo and overthrow thoſe that reveale them. King Seleucus (him I meane who was ſurnamed Callinicus, that is, the victorious Conquerour) in one battell againſt the Galatians, was defeated hee and his whole power; whereupon he tooke from his head the Diademe or Royall band that he ware, and rode away on the ſpurre on horſebacke with three or foure in his companie, wandring through deſarts and by-ways unknowne ſo long, untill both horſe and man were done, and readie to faint for wearineſſe: at length he came unto a countrey kearnes or peaſants cottage; and finding (by good fortune) the good man of the houſe within, asked for bread and water; which the ſaid peaſant or cottier gave unto him; and not that onely, but looke what the field would afford els beſides, he imparted unto him and his company with a willing heart and in great plentie, making them the beſt cheere that hee could deviſe: in the end he knew the kings face, whereupon he tooke ſuch joy, in that his hap was to entertaine the king in his neceſſitie, that he could not containe himſelfe, nor ſecond the king in diſſembling his knowledge, who deſired nothing more, than to be unknowne: when hee had therefore brought the king onward on his way, and was to take his leave of him: Adieu (quoth he) king Seleucus: with that the king reached forth his hand, and drew him toward him, as if he would have kiſſed him, & withall, beckned to one of his followers, and gave him a ſecret token to take his ſword and make the man ſhorter by the head.

Thus whiles he ſpake (I wot not what) his head Off goes, and lies in duſt when he was dead.

whereas, if he could have held his tongue a little while longer, and maſtered himſelfe, when the king afterwards had better fortune and recovered his greatneſſe and power, he ſhould in my conceit have gotten more thanks at his hands, and beene better rewarded for keeping ſilence, than for all the courteſie and hoſpitalitie that he ſhewed. And yet this fellow had in ſome ſort a colourable excuſe for this intemperate tongue of his, to wit, his owne hopes and the good will that he bare unto the king; but the moſt part of theſe praters vndo themſelves without any cauſe or pretence at all of reaſon: like as it befall unto Dennis the tyrants barbar: for when (upon a time) there were ſome talking in his ſhop as touching his tyrannicall government and eſtate, how aſſured it was, and as hard to be ruined or overthrowen, as it is to breake the Diamond: the ſaid barbar laughing thereat: I marvell (quoth he) that you ſhould ſay ſo of Dennis, who is ſo often under my hands, and at whoſe throat in a manner every day I holde my raſor: theſe words were ſoone carried to the tyrant Dennis, who faire crucified this barbar and hanged him for his fooliſh words. And to ſay a trueth, all the ſort of theſe barbars be commonly buſie fellows with their tongue; and no marvell, for lightly the greateſt praters and idleſt perſons in a countrey, frequent the barbars ſhop, and ſit in his chaire, where they keepe ſuch chat, that it can not be, but by hearing them prate ſo cuſtomably, his tongue alſo muſt walke with them. And therefore king Archelaus answered very pleaſantly unto a barbar of his, that was a man of no few words, who when he had caſt his linnen cloth about his ſhoulders, ſaid unto him: Sir, may it pleaſe your Highneſſe to tell me how I ſhall cut or have you: Mary (quoth he) holding thy tongue, and ſaying not a word. A barbar it was, who firſt reported in the city of Athens, the newes of that great diſcomſure and overthrow which the Athenians received in Sicily; for keeping his ſhop (as he did) in that end of the ſuburbs called Pyraum, he had no ſooner heard the ſaid unlucky newes of a certaine ſlave who fled from thence out of the field, when it was loſt, but leaving ſhop and all at fixe and ſeven, ran directly into the city, and never reſted to bring the ſaid tidings, and whiles they were freſh and fire-new,

*For ſeeve ſome els might all the honour win,
And be too late, or ſecond, ſhould come in.*

Now upon the broching of theſe unwelcome tidings, a man may well thinke (and not without good cauſe) that there was a great ſtirre within the city; inſomuch, as the people aſſembled together into the Market place or Common hall, and ſearch was made for the authour of this mour:

mour: hereupon the ſaid barbar was haled and brought before the bodie of the people, and examined; who knew not ſo much as the name of the partie of whom hee heard this newes; But well aſſured I am (quoth he) that one ſaid ſo, mary who it was or what his name might be, I can not tell. Thus it was taken for an headleſſe tale, and the whole Theatre or Aſſembly was to move to anger, that they cried out with one voice; Away with the villaine, have the varlet to the racke, ſet the knave upon the wheele, he it is onely that hath made all on his owne fingers ends, this hath he and none but he deviſed; for who els hath heard it, or who beſides him hath beleev'd it? Well, the wheele was brought, and upon it was the barbar ſtretched: meane while, and even as the poore wretch was hoiled thereupon, beholde there arrived and came to the citie, thoſe who brought certaine newes in deed of the ſaid deſeature, even they who made a ſhift to eſcape out of that infortunate field: then brake up the aſſembly, and every man departed and retired home to his owne houſe, for to bewaile his owne private loſſe and calamity, leaving the ſilly barbar lying along bound to the wheele, and racked out to the length, and there remained he untill it was very late in the evening, at what time he was let looſe; and no ſooner was he at liberty, but he muſt needs enquire newes of the executioner, & namely; what they heard abroad of the Generall himſelfe Nicias, and in what ſort he was ſlaine? So inexpugnable and incorrigible a vice is this, gotten by cuſtome of much talke, that a man can not leave it, though he were going to the gallowes, nor keepe in thoſe tidings which no man is willing to heare: for certes, like as they who have drunke bitter potions or unfavoury medicines, can not away with the very cups wherein they were; even ſo, they that bring evil and heave tidings, are ordinarily hated and deteſted of thoſe unto whom they report the ſame. And therefore Sophocles the Poet hath verie finely diſtinguiſhed upon this point in theſe verſes:

MESSENGER.

*Is it your heart, or els your eare,
That this offends, which you do heare?*

CREON.

*And why doſt thou ſearch my diſſeſe,
To know what griefe doth me diſpleaſe?*

MESSENGER.

*His deeds (I ſee) offend your heart,
But my words cauſe your cares to ſmart.*

Well then, thoſe who tell us any wofull newes be as odious as they who worke our wo; and yet for all that, there is no reſtreint and bridling of an untemperate tongue that is given to walke and overreach. It fortun'd one day at Lacedaemon, that the temple of Iano called there Chalciceos was robbed, and within it was found a certaine emptie flagon or ſtone bottle for wine: great running there was and concourſe of the people thither, and men could not tell what to make of that flagon: at laſt one of them that ſtood by; My maſters (quoth he) if you will give me leave, I ſhall tell you what my conceit is of that flagon, for my minde gives me (ſaith he) that theſe church-robbers who projected to execute ſo perilous an enterpriſe, had firſt drunke the juice of hemlocke before they entred into the action, and afterwards brought wine with them in this bottle, to the end that if they were not ſurprized nor taken in the manner, they might ſave their lives by drinking each of them a good draught of meere wine; the nature and vertue whereof (as you know well enough) is to quench as it were and diſſolve the vigour and ſtrength of that poiſon, and ſo got their waies ſafe enough, but if it chance that they were taken in the deed doing, then they might by means of that hemlocke which they had drunke die an eaſie death, and without any great paine and torment, before that they were put to torture by the magiſtrate. He had no ſooner delivered this ſpeech, but the whole companie who heard his words, thought verily that ſuch a contrived deviſe, and ſo deepe a reach as this never came from one that ſuſpected ſuch a matter, but rather knew that it was ſo indeed; whereupon they flockt round about, and hemmed him in, and on everie ſide each one had a ſaying unto him: And what art thou (quoth one?) From whence art thou faith another? Here comes one and aſkerth, who knew him? there ſets upon him another, ſaying: And how commeſt thou by the light of all this that thou haſt delivered: to be ſhort, they handled the matter ſo well, that they forced him to bewray himſelfe in the end, and to confeſſe that he was one of them that committed the ſacriledge. Were not they alſo who murdered the Poet Ibycus, diſcovered and taken after the ſame manner? It hapned that the ſaid murderers were ſet at a Theatre to behold the plaies and paſſtimes which were exhibited; and ſeeing a flight of Cranes over their heads, they whiſpered

one to another: Loe these be they that will revenge the death of Ibycus. Now had not Ibycus beene a long time before scene, and much searce was made after him, because he was out of the way and missed; whereupon they that late next unto these men over-hearing those words of theirs, and well noting the speech, went directly to the Magistrates and Iustices to give intelligence and information of their words. Then were they attached and examined; and thus being convicted, suffered punishment in the end, not by the means of those Cranes that they talked of, but surely by their own blab-tongues; as if some hellish furie had forced them to disclose that murder which they had committed. For like as in our bodies the members diseased and in paine, draw humours continually unto them, and all the corruption of the parts neere unto them flow thither; even so, the tongue of a babbling fellow, being never without an inflammation and a feverous pulse, draweth alwaies and gathereth to it one secret and hidden thing or other. In which regard it ought to be well fenced with a rampar, and the bulwarke of reason should evermore be set against it, which like unto a barre may stay and stop that overflowing and inconstant lubricitie which it hath; that we be not more undiscereet and foolish beasts than geese are, who when they be to take a flight into Cilicia over the mountaine Taurus, which is full of eagles, take up everie one in their bill a good big stone, which serveth them in stead of a Locke or bridle to restrain their gagling; by which device they may passe all night long without any noise, and not be heard at all or detected by the said eagles.

Now if one should demand and aske of me, what person of all others is most mischievous and dangerous? I believe very well there is no man would name any other but a traitour. And yet Euthyrates (as faith Demosthenes) for his treason covered his owne house with a rouf made of timber that he had out of Macedonie. Philocrates also lived richly and gallant of that great masse of gold and silver, which he had of King Philip for betraying his country, and therewith furnished himselfe with brave harlots, gallant concubines, and daintie sitnes. Euphorbus also and Philagrus who betrayed Eretria, were endowed by the King, with faire lands and possessions: but a prater is a traitor voluntarie and for nothing, he demandeth no hire at all, neither looketh he to be solicited, but offereth himselfe and his services; nor betrayeth unto the enemies either horses or wales, but revealeth hidden secrets, and discloseth speeches which are to be concealed, whether it be in judiciall matters of law or in seditious discords, or in managing of State affaires, it makes no matter, and no man cannet him thanks; nay he will thinke himselfe beholden to others, if they will vouchsafe to give him audience. And therefore, that which is commonly said to a prodigal person, who foolishly mispendeth and vainely wasteth his substance he cares not how, to gratifie every man: Thou art not liberal; this is no courtesie; a vice it is rather that thou art disposed unto, thus to take pleasure in nothing, but giving and giving still. The same rebuke and reprehension serveth verie fitly for a babler: Thou art no friend nor well-willer of mine, thus to come and discover these things unto me; this is thy fault, and a disease which thou art sicke of, that lovest to be clattering and hast no mind but of chating.

Now would I have the Reader to thinke that I write not all this, so much to accuse and blame the vice and maladie of garrulitie, as to cure and heale the same. For by judgement and exercise we surmount and overcome the vices and passions of the minde; but judgement, that is to say, knowledge, must go before: for no man accustometh himselfe to void, and (as it were) to weed them out of the soule, unless he hate and detest them first. Now then, and never before, begin we to take an hatred to vices, when by the light of reason we consider and weigh the shame and losse that cometh unto us by them: as for example, we know and see that these great praters, whiles they desire to win love, gaine hatred; thinking to do a pleasure, they displease; looking to be well esteemed, are mocked and derided; they lay for lucre, and get nothing; they hurt their friends, aide their enemies, and undoe themselves.

So then, let this be the first receipt and medicine for to cure this maladie; even the consideration and reckoning up of the shamefull infamies and painfull inconveniences that proceed and ensue thereof. The second remedy is, to take a survey of the contrary; that is to say, to heare all waies, to remember and have ready at hand the praises and commendations of silence, the majestie (I say) the mysticall gravitie and holinesse of taciturnitie, to represent alwaies unto our minde and understanding, how much more admired, how much more loved, and how farre wiser they are reputed, who speake roundly at once, and in few words, their minde pithily; who in a short and compendious speech comprehend more good matter and substance a great deale, than these great talkers, whose tongues are unbridled and run at randon. Those (I say) be they whom Plato so highly esteemeth, comparing them to skilfull and well practised Archers and

Darters,

Darters, who have the feat of shooting arrowes and launcing darts; for they know how and when to speake graciously and bitterly, foundly, pithily and compactly. And verily, wife Lycurgus framed and exercised his citizens immediatly from their child-hood by keeping them downe at the first with silence to this short and sententious kinde of speech, whereby they spake plaines compendiously, and knit up much in a litle. For like as they of Bisky or Celtiberia do make their Steele of yron, by entering it and letting it lie first within the ground, and then by purging and refining it from the grosse, terrene and earthly substance that it hath; even so the Laconians speech hath no outward barke (as a man would say) or crust upon it, but when all the superfluitie thereof is taken away, it is Steele (as it were) and tempered, yea, and hath an edge upon it, fit for to worke withall and to pierce: and verily that apophthegmaticall and powerfull speech of theirs, that grace which they had to answer sententiously and with such gravity, together with a quicke and ready gift to meet at every turne with all objections, they attained unto by nothing els but by their much silence. Wherefore, it were very expedient to see ever before the eyes of these great praters, those short and witty speeches, that they may see what grace and gravity both, they have: as for example; The Lacedaemonians unto Philip, greeting: Dionysius in Corinth. Also another time, when Philip had written unto them to this effect: If I enter once into the confines of Laconia, I wil destroy you utterly that you shal never rise againe. They returned this answer againe in writing: Alas; that is, If. Likewise when King Demetrius in great displeasure and indignation, cried out aloud in these words: The Lacedaemonians have sent unto me an embassador alone, and who hath no fellow; meaning that there came but one: the said embassador nothing daunted at his words, answered readily: One for one. Certes, they that used to speake short and sententiously, were highly esteemed long ago with our ancients & forefathers. And hereupon it was that the Amphyctones, that is to say, the Deputies or States for the generall council of all Greece, gave order, that there should be written over the doore of the Temple of Apollo Pythius, not the Odysee or Ilias of Homer; ne yet the Canticles or Pans of Pindarus; but these briefe sentences: Enchi mienis; that is, Know thy selfe. Musis agas; that is, Too much of nothing. Also Erytus, metes d'ans; that is, Be suretie and make account to pay: so highly esteemed they a plaine, simple and round manner of speaking, which comprised in few words much matter, and a sentence massive and found: and no marvell, for Apollo himselfe loveth brevity, and is in his oracles verie fuccinct and pithy; wherefore els is he furnamed Loxias? but because he chooseth rather to avoide pluralitie than obscuritie of words. They also who without word uttered at all, signifie the conceptions of their minde by certaine symbollicall devices, and after that maner deliver good lessons unto us; are they not sundrie waies commended and admired exceedingly? Thus Heraclitus in times past, being requested by his neighbours and fellow-citizens, to make a sententious speech unto them, and deliver his opinion as touching civil unitie and concord, mounted up into the pulpit, and taking a cup of cold water in his hand, bespiced it (as it were) with some meale, and with a sprig or two of the herbe Pennirovall, shooke all together: which done, he dranke it off, and so came downe and went his way: giving them by this demonstration, thus much to understand; that if men would take up with a litle and be content with things at hand, without desiring costly superfluities, it were the next way to keepe and preserve cities in peace and concord.

Scyllurus a King of the Scythians left behind him fourscore sonnes; and when the houre of his death drew neere, he called for a bundle of darts or a sheaf of arrowes to be brought unto him, which he put into his childrens hands one after another, and willed each one to brake and burst the same in pieces, bound as it was entire and whole together: which when they had assaied to do, and putting all their strength unto it, could not, but gave over: himselfe tooke out of the sheaf or knith the darts aforesaid one by one, and knapt them in twaine single as they were with facilitie: declaring by this device, that so long as they held together, their union and agreement would be strong and invincible; but their discord and disunion would make them so feeble, and be an occasion that they should not long continue. He then, that continually shall have these & such like precedents in his mouth, and ordinarily repeat and remember the same, will peradventure take no great pleasure and delight in idle and superfluous words. For mine owne part, surely I am abashed mightily at the example of that domestical servant at Rome, when I consider with my selfe what a great matter it is to be well advised before a man speaketh, and constantly to hold and maintaine the resolution of any purpose. Publius Pifo the great Orator and Rhetorician, because he would provide that his people and servitors about him should not trouble his head with much prattle, gave order and commaundement unto them, that that they should make answer unto his demands onely, and no more: now being minded one day to entertaine Clodius the chiefe ruler of the city at his house, he bad him to supper, and caused him to be sent for and called at the time accordingly; for a stately and royall feast he had provided, by all likelihood, and as any man would thinke no lesse: now when supper time was come, the rest of the invited guests now present, Clodius onely they staied and looked for, meane while, Piso had sent out oftentimes unto him one of his servitors who was wont ordinarily to bid his guests for to see whether he were coming, or would come to supper or no? But when it grew late in the evening, so that there was no hope now that hee would be there: Now firrha (quoth Piso to his man aforesaid) didst thou not invite and bid him? Yes iwis Sir: Why then comes he not: said the master againe? Forsooth (quoth he) because he denied to come: And why toldst thou not me this immediately? Because sir, you never asked me the question, Well this was a Romane servitor; but an Athenian servant I trow whiles he is digging and delving, will tell his master newes, and namely, what be the articles and capitulations, in the treaty and composition of peace. So powerfull and forcible is use and custome in all things, whereof I purpose now to treat; for that there is no bit nor bridle that is able to repress, tame, and keepe in a talkative tongue, but it is custome that must do the deed and conquer this maladie.

First and foremost therefore, when in companie there shall be any question propounded by them that are about thee, frame and use thy selfe to hold thy tongue and be silent, untill thou see that everie man else refuseth to speake and make answer: for according to Sophocles.

To counsell and to runne a course in race

Have not both mine one end, so haffe apace.

No more verily doeth a voice and an answer shoot at the same marke that running aimeth at: for there, to wit, in a race, he winneth the prize that getteth to be foremost; but heere, if another man have delivered a sufficient answer, it will be well enough, by praising and approving his speech, to gaine the opinion and reputation of a courteous person; if not, then will it not be thought impertinent, neither can envie or hatred come of it, in case a man do gently shew and open that wherein the other was ignorant, and so after a milde and civil manner supply the defect of the former answer: but above all, this regard would be had: That when a question or demand is addressed and directed unto another, we take it not upon our selves; and so anticipate and prevent his answer; and peradventure, neither in this nor in any thing els, is it decent and commendable to offer and put forth our selves too forward before we be required; and in this case, when another man is asked a question, our owne intrusion, with the putting by of him is not seemely; for we may be thought (in so doing) both to injurie and discredit the party demanded, as if hee were not able to performe that which was put upon him, and also to reproch the demandant, as though hee had little skill and discretion, to aske a thing of him who could not give the same: and that which more is, such malapert boldnesse and heady hastinesse in rash answering, importeth (most of all) exceeding arrogancie and presumption; for it seemeth, that hee who taketh the answer out of his mouth of whom the question is demanded, would say thus much in effect: What need have wee of him? what can he say unto it? what skill or knowledge hath hee? when I am in place, no man ought to aske any other of these matters, but my selfe only. And yet many times we propose questions unto some, not of any great desire that we have to heare their answers, but onely because we would finde talke, and minister occasion of discourse, seeking thereby to draw from them some words that may yeeld matter of mirth and pleasant conference: after which sort, Socrates used to provoke Theætetus and Charmides. To prevent therefore the answer of another, to turne away mens eares, to divert their eies, and draw their cogitations from him to our selves, is as much as if we should run before and make haste to kisse one first, who was minded to be kist of another, or to enforce him to looke upon us, whose eies were set and fixed upon another; considering, that although the partie unto whom the demand was made, be either not able nor willing to make answer, it were befitting for a man, after some little pause made, to present himself in all modesty and reverence, & then to frame & accommodate his speech as nere unto that as may be, which he thinketh will content the minde of him that made the demand, and so answer (as it were) in the name of the other: for if they who are demanded a question, make no good & sufficient answer, great reason they have to be pardoned and held excused; but he who intrudeth himselfe, & taking the words out of anothers mouth, is ready to speake before he be spoken unto, by good right is odious, although he answer otherwise sufficiently; but if he faile, and make no good answer, certes he maketh himselfe, ridiculous, and a very laughing stocke to the whole company.

The

The second point of exercise and meditation, is in a mans owne particular answers, wherein he ought especially to be careful and take heed who is given to over-much talke, to the end that they who would provoke him to speake, and all to make themselves merry and to laugh at him, may well know that he answereth nor he knowes not what inconsiderately, but with good advice and seriously to the point: for such there be in the world, who for no need at all, but only for to passe time in mirth, devise certaine questions for the nonce, and in that manner propound them to such persons for no other end, but to provoke them to prattle; and therefore they ought to have a good eie and regard before them, not to leape out and runne all on a sudden hastily to their answer, as if they were well pleased and beholden unto them for to have such an occasion of speech; but with mature deliberation to consider the nature and behaviour of him that putteth out the question, together with the necessity thereof, and the profit that may ensue thereby; and if it appeare indeed, that the partie be in good earnest, and desirous to learne and be instructed, then he must accustom himselfe to repress his tongue and take some pause, allowing a competent space of time betweene the demand and the answer; during which silence, both the demander may have while to bethinke himselfe and adde somewhat thereto, if he list, and also the demandé time to thinke of an answer, and not let his tongue runne before his wit, and so huddle up a confused answer before the question be fully propounded: for often-times it falleth out, that for very haste they take no heed of those things which were demanded, but answer him kam, and one thing for another. True it is (I must needs say) that Pythia the priestesse of Apolloes temple, is wont to give answer by oracle at the same instant that the question is demanded, yea, and often-times before it be asked; for why? the god whom she serveth

Doth understand: he dumbe, who can not speake,

And knowes ones minde, before the tongue it brake.

but among men, he that would wisely and to the purpose answer, ought to stay untill he conceive the thought, and fully understand the intent of him that proposeth a question, lest that befall unto him which is said in the common proverbe:

About an hooke I question made,

and otherwise also, if that inconvenience were not, yet are we to bridle this lavish & haffe tongue of ours, and restraîne the inordinate and hungry appetite which we have to be talking; lest it be thought that we had a fluxe (as it were) of humours gathered a long time about the tongue, and grown into an impostume, which wee are very well content should be let out, and have issue made by a question tendered unto us, and so by that meanes be discharged thereof. Socrates was wont in this manner to restraîne and repress his thirst, after that he had enchafed his body and set himselfe into an heat, either by wrestling, or running, or such like exercises; he would not permit himselfe to drinke before he had powred out the first bucket of water that he had drawn out of the pit or well, acquainting this his sensuall appetite to attend the fit and convenient time that reason appointed.

Moreover, this would be noted, that there be three kinds of answers unto interrogations; the first necessarie, the second civil, and the third needlesse and superfluous: as for example: If one should aske whether Socrates be within or no; he that is unwilling or not ready and forward with his tongue, would make answer and say: He is not within; but if he be disposed to lacerize a little, and speake more brieffe, he would leave out the word (within) and say: He is not; or yet more short than so, pronouncing onely the negative Adverbe, and saying no more but No. Thus the Lacedæmonians dealt once by Philip; for when he had dispatched his letters unto the to this effect: To know whether they would receive him into their city or no: they wrote backe againe, in faire great capitall letters, within a sheet of paper, no more but O Y, that is to say, No: & so sent it unto him: but he that would make answer to the former question of Socrates a little more civilly and courteously, would say thus: He is not within sir, for he is gone to the banke or exchange; & to give yet a somewhat better measure, he might perhaps adde moreover & say: He looketh there for certaine strangers and friends of his. But a vaine prating fellow, and one that loves many words, especially if his hap hath beene to read the booke of Antimachus the Colophonian, will make answer to the demand aforesaid in this wise: He is not within sir, gone he is to the Burse or Exchange, for there he expecteth certaine strangers out of Ionia, of whom and in whose behalfe Alcibiades wrote unto him, who now maketh his abode within the citie of Miletum, so journeyeth with Tissaphernes, one of the lieutenants generall of the great King of Persia, who before time was in league with the Lacedæmonians, stood their friend, and sent them aid;

but

but not for the love of Alibiades, he is turned from them and is sided with the Athenians: for Alibiades being desirous to returne into his owne country, hath prevailed so much that hee hath altered Tissaphernes his minde, and drawn him away from our part: and thus (shall you have him rehearse in good earnest the whole eight booke (in manner) of Thucydides his story, untill he have overwhelmed a man with a multitude of narrations, and made him beleeve that in Miletus there is some great sedition; that it is ready to be lost, and Alibiades to be banished a second time. Herein then ought a man principally to set his foote and stay his overmuch language, so as the center and circumference of the answer be that, which he who maketh the demand desireth and hath need to know. Carnedes before he had any great name, disputed one day in the publike schooles and place appointed for exercise: unto whom the master or president of the place sent before hand, and gave him warning to moderate his voice (for hee spake naturally exceeding big and loud, so as the schooles rung againe therewith.) Give men then (quoth he) a gage and measure for my voice; upon whom the said master replied thus not improperly: Let him that disputeth with thee be the measure and rule to moderate thy voice by; even so a man may in this case say: The measure that hee ought to keepe who answereth, is the very will and minde of him that propoeth the question. Moreover, like as Socrates forbade those meats which drew men on to eat when they are not hungry; and likewise those drinks which caused them to drinke who are not a thirst: even so should a man who is given to much prattle, be afraid of those discourses wherein he delighteth most, and which he is wont to use and take greatest pleasure in; and in case hee perceive them to run willingly upon him for to withstand the same, and not give them intertainment. As for example, martiall men and warriors love to discourse and tell of battels; which is the reason that the Poet Homer bringeth in * Nestor estoones recounting his owne prowesse and feats of armes: and ordinarie it is with the who in iudiciall trials have had the upper hand of their adversaries, or who beyond the hope and opinion of everie man have obtained grace and favour with kings and princes, to be subject unto this maladic that evermore followeth them, namely to report and recount estoones the manner how they came in places; after what fort they were brought in; the order of their pleading; how they argued the case; how they convinced their accusers, & overthrew their adversaries; last of all, how they were praised and commended: for to say a truth, joy and mirth is much more talkative than that olde Agrypina which the Poets doe feigne and devise in their comedies: for it rouseth and stirreth up, it reneweth and refresheth it selfe ever & anon, with many discourses and narrations; whereupon ready they are to fall into such speeches upon every light and colourable occasion: for not onely is it true which the common proverbe saith:

*Looke where a man doth feele his paine and grieve,
His hand will soone be there to yeeld reliefe.*

but also joy and contentment draweth unto it the voice, it leadeth the tongue alwaies about with it, and is evermore willing to be remembered and related. Thus we see that amorous lovers passe the greater part of their time in rehearsing certaine words which may renew the remembrance of their loves, inso much that if they cannot meet with one person or other to relate the same unto, they will devise and talke of them with such things as have neither sense nor life: like as we read of one who brake forth into these words:

*O dainty bed, most sweet and pleasant couch,
O blessed lamp, O happie candle light,
No lesse than God doth Bacchus you avouch may God you are the mightiest in her sight.*

And verily a busie prater is altogether (as one would say) a white line or strake in regard of all words, to wit, without discretion he speaketh indifferently of all matters; howbeit if he be affected more to some than to others, he ought to take heed thereof, and abstaine from them; he is (I say) to withdraw and writhe him self from thence; for that by reason of the contentment which he may therein take, and the pleasure that he receiveth thereby, they may lead him wide & carrie him every while very farre out of the way: the same inclination to overhoothe themselves in prating, they finde also when they discourse of those matters wherein they suppose themselves to have better experience, and a more excellent habit than others: such an one I say being a self-lover and ambitious withall,

*Most part of all the day in this doth spend,
Himselfe to passe, and others to transcend.*

As for example in histories if he hath read much, in artificiall stile and couching of his words, he that is a Grammarian; in relation of strange reports and newes, who hath bene a great traveler and wandered through many forren countries: hereof therefore great heed would bee taken; for garrulitie being therein fished and baited, willingly runneth to the old and usuall haunt, like as every beaſt seeketh out the ordinary and accustomed pasture. And in this point was the young prince Cyrus of a wonderfull and excellent nature, who would never challenge his play-fellows and comforts in age unto any exercise wherein he knew himselfe to be superior; and to surpasse, but alwaies to such feats wherein he was lesse practised than they; which he did as well because he would not grieve their hearts in winning the prize from them, as also for that he would profit thereby, and learne to doe that wherein hee was more raw and unready than they. But a talkative fellow contrariwise, if there be a matter propoſed whereby he may heare and learne somewhat that he knew not before, rejecteth and refuseth it; he cannot for his life hold his tongue and keepe silence a little while, to gaine thereby some hire and reward, but casting and rolling his thought round about, he never rests untill he light upon some old ragged rapodies and overworne discourses, which hee hath patched and tacked together a thousand times. Such a one there was among us, who hapned by chance to have perused two or three bookes of Epichurus; whereby he tooke himselfe to be so great a cleane and so well read, that he wearied everie mans eares who heard him talke; there was no afficibly nor fealt unto which he came, but he would force the companie to arise and depart with his unmeasurable prating of the battel of Leuctres, and the occurrences that ensued thereupon, inso much as he got himself a by-name, and everie man called him Epaminondas. But this is the least inconvenience of all others that followeth this infirmitie of much babbling; and surely one good meane is it to the cure thereof; To turne the same from other matters to such as these: for thereby shall their tongue be lesse troublesome and offensive, when it passeth the bonds in the tearmes onely of literature.

Over and besides, for the remedie of this their disease, they shall do well to inure and accustom themselves to write somewhat, and to dispute of questions apart. Thus did Antipater the Stoick, who as it may be thought, being not able nor willing to hold out in disputation hand to hand with Carnedes, who with a violent streame (as it were) of his forcible wit and eloquence refused the sect of the Stoicks, answered the said Carnedes by writing, and filled whole bookes with contradictorie assertions and arguments against him; inso much as thereupon he was furnamed Calamobos, which is as much to say, as the lustie Crier with his pen: and so by all likelihood this manner of fighting with a shadow and lowd exclaiming in secret, and apart by themselves, training these stout praters everie day by little and little from the frequencie and multitude of people, may make them in the end more sociable and fitter for companie. Thus cuſtome cures after they have spent and discharged their choler and anger upon the cudgels or stones which have bene thrown at them, become thereby more gentle and tractable to men. But above all, it were verie expedient and profitable for them to be alwaies neere unto personages for yeeres elder, and in authoritie greater than themselves, and with those to converse; for the reverent regard and feare that they have in respect of their dignitie and gravitie, may induce and direct them in time and by custome to keepe silence; and evermore among those exercises heretofore by us specified, this adviſement would be mingled and interlaced; That when we are about to speake, and that words be readie to runne out of our mouth, we say thus unto our selves by way of reasoning: What manner of speech is this that is so urgent and presseſth so hard to be gone? What ailes my tongue, that it is so willing to be walking? What good may come by the utterance thereof? What harme may ensue by concealing it in and holding my peace? For we must not thinke that our words be like an heavy burden over-loading us, and whereof we should thinke our selves well eased when we are discharged of them: for speech remaineth still as well when it is uttered as before: but men ought to speake, either in the behalfe of themselves when they stand in need of something, or to benefit others, or else to pleasure and recreate one another by pleasant devises and discourses, (as it were) with salt to mitigate the painefull travels in so actions and worldly affaires, or rather to make the same more favorie whiles we are employed therein. Now if a speech be neither profitable to him that delivereth it, nor necessarie for him that heareth it, ne yet carrie therewith any grace or pleasure; what need is there that it should be uttered? For surely, a man may as soone speake a word in vaine, as do a thing to no purpose. But above and after all other good adviſements in this case, we ought alwaies to have in readinesse and remembrance this wise saying of Simonides: A man (quoth he) may repent many a time for words spoken, but never for a word kept in: this also we must thinke: That exercise is all in all, and a matter of that moment and efficacie, that it is able to master and conquer everie thing: considering that men will take great paines and be careful; yea they will endure much sorrow for to be rid of an old cough; to chase away the troublefome yex or hicket. Besides, Taciturnitie hath not onely this one faire propertie and good vertue, that (as Hippocrates saith) It never breedeth thirst; but also that it engendreth no paine, no griefe nor displeasure, neither is any man bound to render an account thereof.

OF AVARICE OR COVETOUSNES.

The Summarie.

IF there be any excess in the world that troubleth the repose and tranquillitie of the spirit, causing our life to be wretched & miserable, it is Avarice; against which the sages and wise men of all ages from time to time have framed sharpe and terrible invectives, which in sum and effect doe shew thus much; That this covetousnes and greedy desire of gathering goods is (as it were) the capitall vice and seat-towne of all wickednes; the verie sinke of sinne and receptacle of all vices. Now albeit all men with one voice, yea and the most covetous persons of all others do confesse as much; yet the heart of man is so affectionate a friend to the earth, that needfull it is to propole and let downe divers instructions for to avert the same from thence, and to cause it to range & sort with other occupations and affaires, more becoming it selfe than is the over curious searching after transitorie & corruptible things. This is the reason, that those Philosophers who have handled the doctrine as touching manners are employed herein: and Plutarch among the rest, who teacheth us here in few words, with what considerations we ought to be furnished & fortified, that we do not permit such a pestilent plague as this to seaze upon our souls: and therewith he sheweth the miseries that befall unto avarice; whereof this is the first & principal; That in stead of giving contentment, it maketh her slave most wretched and putteth him to the greatest paine and torture in the world. And hereupon he interlaceth and inserteth a description of three sorts of covetous persons. First, of those who covet things rare and dangerous, whereas they should seeke after necessities. Secondly, of such as spend nothing, have much, and yet desire more and more; and these he depaupereth in all their colours. Thirdly, of them that be miggards and base minded pinch-pennies. Which done, he discovereth the second miserie of covetous wretches, to wit; That avarice doth tyrannize over her cause and slave, not suffering him to use that which she commaunded him to winne and get. The third is this; That it causeth him to gather and heape up riches, for some promoter or catch-poll, or else for a Tyrant, or else for some wicked and gracelesse heire, whose nature and properties hee doeth represent and describe verie lively. Afterwards having concluded that covetous persons are herein especially miserable; for that the one sort of them use not their goods at all, and other abuse the same: he prescribeth three remedies against this mischievous maladie. The first; That those who greedily gaze after riches, have no more in effect than they who stand contented with that which is necessarie for nature. The second; That we are not to count them happy, who be richly furnished with things unprofitable. And the last; That it is vertue, wherein we ought to ground and seeke for contentment; for there it is to be found and not in riches.

OF AVARICE OR Covetousnesse.

Hippomachus, a great master of wrestling & such exercises of the bodie, hearing some to praise a certaine tall man, high of stature, and having long armes and handes, commending him for a singular champion, and fit to fight at buffers: A proper fellow hee were (quoth he) if the garland or prize of the victory were hung on high, for to be reached with the hand; slemably it may be said unto them who esteeme so highly and repute it a great felicitie to be possessed of much faire lands, to have many great and stately houes, to be furnished with mighty masses and summes of money, in case felicity were to be bought and folde for coine. And yet a man shall see many in the world, chuse rather to be rich and wretched withall, than to give their silver for to be happy and blessed: but surely it is not silver nor golde that can purchase either repose of spirit void of griefe and anguish, or magnanimity, ne yet settled constancie and resolution, confidence and suffisance, or contentment with our owne estate. Be a man never so rich, he can not skill thereby to contemne riches, no more than the possession of more than enough worketh this in us; That we want not still, and desire even things that be superfluous. What other vice and maladie then doeth our wealth and riches rid us from, if it delivereth us not from avarice? By drinke men quench their thirst, by meat they slake their hunger. And he that said:

Give Hippomachus a cloak to keepe him warme,

For cold extreame I shike, and may take harme.

if there were many clothes hung or cast upon him, would be offended therewith and fling them from him; but this their strong desire and love of money, it is neither silver nor gold that is able to quench: and let a man have never so much, yet he coveteth nevertheless to have more still. And well it may be verified of riches which one said sometime to an ignorant and deceitfull Physician:

Your drugs and salves augment my sore,

They make me sicker than before.

For riches verily, after that men have once met therewith, (wheras before they stood in need of bread, of a competent house to put in their heads, of meane comment and any viands that come next hand) fill them now with an impatient desire of golde, silver, ivory, emerauds, horses and hounds, changing and transporting their naturall appetite of things needfull and necessarie, into a disordinate lust to things dangerous, rare, hard to be gotten, and unprofitable when they be had. For never is any man poore in regard of such things as suffice nature; never doeth he take up money upon usurie, for to buy himselfe meat, cheefe, bread or olives; but one indebted himselfe for to build a sumptuous and stately house; another runnes in debt, because he would purchase a grove of olive trees that joineeth to his owne land; one is engaged deeply in the usurers books, by laying corne-grounds and wheat-fields to his owne demaines, another, because he would be possessed of fruitfull vineyards; some are indebted with buying mules of Gallia, and others, because they would be matters:

Of lustie steeds, to win the prize

by running in a race,

With a tiring boile of emperie catch,

when it is drayen apace,

have cast themselves into the bottomlesse gulfes of obligations, conditions, covenants, interests, statutes, reall gages & pawns: and afterwards it cometh to passe, that like as they who drinke when they be not drie; & eat without a stomacke, many times cast up by vomit, even that which they did eat & drinke when they were hungry & thirsty; even so, when they will needs have such things as be superfluous and to no use, doe not enjoy the benefit of those things that are needfull and necessarie indeed. Lo what kinde of people these be!

As for those who are at no cost, nor will lay out any thing, and notwithstanding they have much, yet ever covet more; a man may rather marvell and woonder at them, if he would but remember that which Aristippus was wont to say: He that eateth much (quoth he) and drinketh likewise much, and is never satisfied nor full, goeth to the Physicians, asketh their opinion what his disease and strange indisposition of the body might be, and withall craveth their counsell for the cure and remedie thereof: but if one who hath five faire beddes already with the furniture thereto belonging, and seeketh to make them ten; and having ten tables with their cupboards of plate, will needs buy ten more; and for all that he is possessed of faire manours and goodly lands, have his bags and coffers full of money, is never the better satisfied, but still gappeth after more, breaketh his sleeps, devising and casting as he lieth awake, how to compasse the same, and when he hath all, yet is he not full; such an one (I say) never thinks that he hath need of a Physician to cure his maladie or to discourse unto him, from what cause all this doth proceed. And verily a man may looke, that of those who are thirstily ordinarily, and he that hath, not drunke, will be delivered of his thirst so soone as he meeteth with drinke; but in case such an one as evermore drinketh and powreth in still, never giving over, yet nevertheless continueth drie and thirstie, we judge him to have no need of repletion, but rather of purging and evacuation; him (I say) we appoint for to vomit, as being not troubled and distempered upon any want, but with some extraordinary heat or unkinde acrimonies of humours that be within him; even so it is with those that seeke to get and gather goods: he that is bare and poore in deed, will haply give over seeking so soone as he hath got him an house to dwell in, or found some treasure, or met with a good friend to helpe him to a summe of money to make cleere with the usurer, and to be crossed out of his booke: but he that hath already more than enough and sufficient, and yet craveth more, surely it is neither golde nor silver that will cure him, neither hore, nor theepe, nor yet beeves will serve his turne; need had he of purgation and evacuation, for poverie is not his disease, but covetousnesse and an unsatiabie desire of riches, proceeding from false judgement and a corrupt opinion that he hath, which if a man do not rid away out of his mind, as a winding gulle or whirle-poole that is croffe and overthwart in their way they will never cease to hunt after superfluities, and seeme to stand in need thereof (that is to say) to covet those things which they know not what to doe with. When a Physician commeth into the chamber of a patient, whom he findeth lying along in his bed groaning, and refusing all foode, he taketh him by the hand, feelth his pulse, asketh him certaine questions, and finding that he hath no ague; This is a disease (quoth he) of the minde, and so goeth his way; even so, when we see a worldly minded man altogether set upon his gets and gaines, pining away, and even consumed with the greedie worme of gathering good, weeping, whining and fighting at expences, and when any money is to goe out of his purse, sticking at no paine and trouble, sparing for no indignitie, no unhoneft and indirect means whatsoever, nor caring which way he goes to worke, whether it bee by hooke or crooke, so that hee may gaine and profit thereby; having choise of houses and tenements, lands lying in everie countrey, droves, herds and flocks of cattell, a number of slaves, wardrobes of apparell and clothes of all sorts: what shall we say that this man is sicke of, unlesse it be the poverie of the soule? As for want of money and goods, one friend (as Menander saith) may cure and helpe with his bountifull hand; but that penurie and needinesse of the soule all the men in the world, that either live at this day, or ever were before time, are not able to satisfie and suffice: and therefore of such Solon said verie well,

*No limit set, nor certaine bound, men have
Of their desire to goods, but still they crave.*

For, those who are wife and of sound judgement are content with that measure and portion which nature hath set downe and assigned for them; such men know an ende, and keepe themselves within the center and circumference of their need and necessitie onely. But this is a peculiar propertie that avarice hath by it selfe. For a covetous desire it is, even repugnant to satisfie, and hindereth it selfe that it never can have sufficient, whereas all other desires and lusts are aiding and helpfull thereto. For no man (I trow) that is a glutton, forbeareth to eat a good morcel of meat for gourmandise, nor drunkard abstaineth from drinking wine upon an appetite and love that he hath to wine, as these covetous wretches do, who spare their money and will not touch it, through a desire onely that they have of money. And how can we otherwise thinke, but it were a piteous and lamentable case, yea and a disease next cousin to meere madnesse, if a man should therefore spare the wearing of a garment, because he is readie to chill and quake for cold, or forbear to touch bread, for that he is almost hunger-starved; and even so not to handle his goods because he loveth them: certes, such a one is in the same plight and piteous perplexitie that Thrasymides was, who in a certaine comedie describeth his owne miseries:

At home it is within my power,

*I may enjoy it everie hower:
I wish a thing as if I were
In raging love, yet I forbere:
When I have lockt and seald up all,
Or else put forth by count and tale,
My come to brokers for the use,
Or other factours whom I chuse,
I plod and plonder still for more,
I burne, I seeke to fetch in store,
I chide and bridle with servants mine,
The husbandman and eke the hine
I bring to count; and then anon
My debtors all I call upon:
By Dan Apollo now I sweare,
Was any man that earth did beare,
Whom thou hast ever known or seene,
In love more wretched to have bene?*

Sophocles being on a time demanded familiarly by one of his friends, whether he could yet keepe companie with a woman if need were: God blesse me (quoth he) my good friend, take no more of that I pray you, I am free from those matters long since, and by the benefit of mine olde age, I have escaped the servitude of such violent and furious mistresses. And verily it is a good and gracious gift, that our lusts and appetites should end together with our strength and abilitie, especially in those delights and pleasures, which as Alcibiades saith neither man nor woman can well avoide. But this is not to be found in avarice and desire of riches; for shee like a curst, sharpe and strewed queane, forceth indeed a man to get and gather, but shee forbiddeth him withall to use and enjoy the same; shee stirreth up and provoketh his lust, but shee denieth him all pleasure. I remember that in old time Stratonice taxed and mocked the Rhodians for their wastfull and superfluous expences in this manner: They build sumptuously (quoth he) as if they were immortall and should never die; but they fare at their boords as though they had but a small while to live. But these covetous misers gather wealth together like mightie magnificoes, but they spend like beggerly mechanicals; they endure the paine and travell of getting, and taste no pleasure of the enjoying.

Demades the Orator came one day to visite Phocion, and found him at dinner; but seeing but a little meat before him upon the table, and the same nothing fine and daintie, but coorse and simple: I marvell (quoth he) Phocion how you can take up with so short a dinner and so small a pittance, considering the paines you doe endure in manning the affaires of State and common-wealth. As for Demades he dealt indeed with government, and was a great man in the city with the people, but it was all for his bellie, and to furnish a plentiful boord, in so much as, supposing that the citie of Athens could not yeeld him revenue and provision sufficient for to maintaine his excessive gourmandise, he laid for cates and victuals out of Macedon, whereupon Antipater when he saw him an old man with a wrinkled and withered face, said pleasantly: That he had nothing left now but his paunch and his tongue, much like unto a sheepe, or some other beast killed for sacrifice when all is eaten besides. But thou most unhappie and wretched miser, who would not make a woonder at thee, condering that thou canst lead so base and beggerly a life, without societie of men or courtesie to thy neighbors, not giving ought to any person, shewing no kindnesse to thy friends, no bountie nor magnificence to the common-wealth, yet still dost afflict thy poore selfe, lie awake all the night long, toile and moile like a drudge and hireling thy selfe, hire other labourers for day-wages, lie in the winde for inheritances, speake men faire in hope to be their heire, and debase thy selfe to all the world, and care not to whom so thou cap and knee for gaine, having I say so sufficient means otherwise to live at ease (to wit, thy niggardie and pinching parsimonie) whereby thou maist be dispensed for doing just nothing. It is reported of a certaine Bizantine, who finding an adulterer in bed with his wife, who though the were but foule, yet was illfavoured enough, said unto him: O miserable caitife what needest thou have driven thee thus to doe? what needes Sapragoras dowrie? well, goe to: thou takest great paines poore wretch, thou fillest and stirrest the lead, thou kindlest the fire also underneath it. Necessarie it is in some sort, that Kings and Princes should seeke for wealth and riches, that these Governours also and Deputies under them should bee great gatherers, yea and those those also who reach at the highest places and aspire to rule and soveraign dignities in great States and cities; all these (I say) have need perforce to heape up grosse summes of money, to the end that for their ambition, their proud port, pompe, and vaine-glorious humour, they might make sumptuous feasts, give largesses, retaine a guard about their persons, send presents abroad to other States, maintaine and wage whole armies, buie slaves to combat and fight at sharpe to the outtrance: but thou makest thy selfe so much ado, thou troublest and tormentest both body and minde, living like an oyster or a shell-fnaile, and for to pinch and spare, art content to undergo and endure all paine and travell, taking no pleasure nor delight in the world afterwards, no more than the Baine-keepers poore asse which carying billots and fagots of drie brush and sticks to kindle fire and to heat the stoupes, is evermore full of smooke, soot, ashes, and finders; but hath no benefit at all of the bane, and is never bathed, washed, warmed, rubbed, scoured, and made cleane. Thus much I speake in reproch and disdain of this miserable asse. like avarice, this bafe raping and scraping together in manner of ants or pismires.

Now there is another kind of covetousnesse more savage and beast-like, which they professe who backbite and slander, raise malicious imputations, forge false wils and testaments, lie in wait for heritages, coge and couzen, and intermeddle in all matters, will bee seene in everie thing, know all mens states, busie themselves with many cares and troubles, count upon their fingers how many friends they have yet living, and when they have all done, receive no fruition or benefit by all the goods which they have gotten together from all parts, with their cunning casts & subtil shifts. And therefore like as we have in greater hatred and detestation, vipers, the 20 venomous flies Cantharides, and the stinging spiders called Philangia & Tarantale, than either beares or lions, for that they kill folke and stinge them to death; but receive no good or benefit at all by them when they are dead; even so be these wretches more odious and worthy to be hated of us, who by their miserable parsimonie and pinching doe mischief, than those who by their riot and wastfulness be hurtfull to a common-weale, because they take and catch from others that which they themselves neither will nor know how to use. VV hereupon it is that such as these when they have gotten abundance, and are in manner full, rest them for a while, and doe no more violence as it were in time of truce and surcease of hostilitie; much after the manner as Demoisthenes said unto them who thought that Demades had given over all his lewdnesse and knavery: O (quoth he) you see him now full as lions are, who when they have filled their bellies, prey no more for the lice, untill they be hungrie againe: but such covetous wretches as be employed in government of civill affaires, and that for no profit nor pleasure at all which they intend, those I say never rest nor make holiday, they allow themselves no truce nor cessation from gathering & heaping more together still, as being evermore emptie, & have alwaies need of all things though they have all. But some men perhaps will say: These men (I assure you) do save & lay up goods in store for their children and heires after their death, unto whom whiles they live they will part with nothing: If that be so, I can compare them very well to those mice and cats in gold mines, which feed upon the gold-ore, and lick up all the golden sand that the mines yeeld, so that men can not come by the golde there, before they be dead and cut up in manner of anatomies. But tell me (I pray you) wherefore are these so willing to treasure up so much money, and so great substance, and leave the same to their children, inheritours, and successors after them? I verily beleeve to this end, that those children and heires also of theirs should keepe the same still for others likewise, and so to passe from hand to hand by descent of many degrees, like as earthen conduct-pipes by which water is conveyed into some cellerne, withhold and retaine none of all the water that passeth through them, but doe transpire and send all away from them, each one to that which is next, and reserve none to themselves; thus doe they untill some arise from without, a meere stranger to the house, one that is a scyphont or very tyrant, who shall cut off this keeper of that great stocke and treasure, and when he hath dispatched and made a hand of him, drive and turne the course of all this wealth and riches out of the usuall channell another way; or at leastwise untill it fall into the hands (as commonly men say it doth) of 50 the most wicked and ungracious imp of that race, who wil disperse and scatter that which others have gathered, who will consume and devour all unthrifely, which his predecessors have gotten and spared wickedly: for not onely as Enripides saith,

*Those children wastfull prove and bad,
Who serve vile slaves for parents bad.*

but also covetous carles & pinching peni-fathers, leave children behind the that be loose & riotous & spend-thrifts; like as Diogenes by way of mockery said upon a time: That it were better to be

be a Megarians ram than his sonne: for wherein they would seeme to instruct and informe their children, they spoile and mar them cleane, ingrafting into their hearts a desire and love of money, teaching them to be covetous and bafe minded pinch-penies, laying the foundation (as it were) in their heires of some strong place or fort, wherein they may surely guard and keepe their inheritance. And what good lessons and precepts be these which they teach them: Gaine and spare, my sonne, get and save; thinke with thy selfe and make thine account that thou shalt be esteemed in the world according to thy wealth and not otherwise. But surely this not to instruct a childe, but rather to knit up fast or sow up the mouth of a purse that it may hold and keepe the better whatsoever is put into it. This onely is the difference that a purse or money-bag becommeth foule, sullied and ill-favoring after that silver is put into it; but the children of covetous persons before they receive their patrimonies or attaine to any riches, are filled already even by their fathers with avarice, and a hungrie desire after their substance: and verily such children thus nourred, reward their parents againe for their schooling with a condigne far-larie and recompense, in that they love them not because they shall receive much one day by them, but hate them rather for that they have nothing from them in present possession already, for having learned this lesson of them; To esteeme nothing in the world in comparison of wealth and riches, and to aime at nought els in the whole course of their life, but to gather a deale of goods together, they repute the lives of their parents to be a blocke in their way, they will in heart that their heads were well laid, they do what they can to shorten their lives, making 20 this reckoning; That how much time is added to their olde age, so much they lose of their youthfull yeeres. And this is the reason, why during the life of their fathers, secretly and under-hand they steale (after a sort, by snatches) their pleasure, and enjoy the same; They wil make semblance as if it came from other, when they give away money and distribute it among their friends, or otherwise spend it in their delights; whiles they catch it privily from under the very wing of their parents, and when they goe to heare and take out their lessons, they will be sure to picke their purses if they can, before they goe away; but after their parents be dead and gone, when they have gotten into their hands the keies of their coffers and signets of their bags, then the case is altered, and they enter into another course and fashion of life: you shall have my young masters then, put on a grave and austere countenance, they will not seeme to laugh, nor be spoken to, or acquainted with any body; there is no talke now of anointing the body for any exercise, the racket is cast aside, the tennis court no more haunted, no wrestling practised, no going to the schooles either of the Academie or Lyceus, to heare the lectures and disputations of Professors and Philosophers. But now the officers and servants be called to an audit and account; now they are examined what they have under their hands; now the writings, billes, obligations and deeds are sought up and perused; now they fall to argue and reason with their receivers, stewards, factours and debtors; so sharpe-set they are to their negotiations and affaires; so full of cares and businesse, that they have no leisure to take their dinners or noone-meales; and if they sup, they can not intend to go into the baine or hot-houfe before it be late in the night; the bodily exercises wherein they were brought up and trained in, be laid downe; no swimming 40 nor bathing any more in the river Dirce; all such matters be cast behinde and cleane forgotten. Now if a man say to one of these: Will you go and heare such a Philosopher reade a lecture, or make a sermon: How can I go? (will he say againe) I have no while since my fathers death. O miserable and wretched man, what hath hee left unto thee of all his goods, comparable to that which he hath bereaved thee of, to wit; Repose and Libertie: but it is not thy father so much, as his riches flowing round about thee, that environeth and compasseth thee so, as it hath gotten the matter over thee; this hath set foot upon thy throat, this hath conquered thee; like unto that shrewd wife in Hesiodus,

*Who burnes a man without a match
or brand of scorching fire,
And driveth him to gray-old age before that time require.*

causing thy soule (as it were) to be full of rivels and hoarie haire before time, bringing with it carking cares and tedious travels proceeding from the love of money, and a world of affaires without any repose, whereby that alacrity, cheerefulness, worship and sociable courttesie which ought to be in a man, are decayed and faded cleane to nothing.

But what meane you sir by all this? (will some one haply say unto me) See you not how there be some that bestow their wealth liberally with credit and reputation? unto whom I answer thus:

thus: Have you never heard what Aristotle said: That as some there are who have no use at all of their goods, so there be others who abuse the same; as if he should say: Neither the one nor other was seemly and as it ought to be: for as those get neither profit nor honour by their riches, so these susteine losse and shame thereby. But let us consider a little what is the use of these riches which are thus much esteemed: Is it not (I pray you) to have those things which are necessary for nature? but these who are so rich and wealthy above the rest, what have they more to content nature, than those who live in a meane and competent estate? Certes, riches (as Theophrastus saith) is not so great a matter that wee should love and admire it so much, if it be true that Callias the wealthiest person in all Athens, and Ismenias the richest citizen of Thebes, use the same things that Socrates and Epaminondas did. For like as Agathon banished the flute, cornet, and such other pipes from the solemne feasts of men, and sent them to women in their solemnities, supposing that the discourses of men who are present at the table are sufficient to entertaine mirth; even so may he aswell rid away out of houses, hangings, coverlets and carpets of purple, costly and sumptuous tables, and all such superfluities, who seeeth that the great rich worldlings use the very same that poorer men do. I would not as Hesiodus saith;

That plough or beeme should hang in smoke to drie,

Or painfull tillage now be laid aside,

Nor works of oxen and mule for ever drie,

Who serve our turnes to draw, to till, to ride;

but rather that these goldsmiths, turners, gravers, perfumers and cooks would be chased and sent away, forasmuch as this were indeed, an honest and civill banishment of unprofitable artificers as forreiners, that may be spared out of a city. Now if it be so, that things requisite for the necessitie of nature, be common aswell to the poore as the rich, and that riches doe vaunt and stand so much upon nothing els but superfluities, and that Scopas the Thebesian is worthily commended in this; That being requested to give away and part with somewhat of his household stuffe which he might spare and had no need of: Why (quoth he) in what things els consisteth the felicity of those who are reputed happy and fortunate in this world above other men, but in these superfluities that you seeme to aske at my hands, and not in such as be necessarie and requisite? If it be so I say, see that you be not like unto him that praiseth a pompe and solemne shew of plaies and games more than life indeed, which standeth upon things necessary. The procession and solemnitie of the Bacchanales which was exhibited in our country, was wont in old time to be performed after a plaine and homely manner, merily and with great joy: You should have seene there one carrying a little barrell of wine, another a branch of a vine tree; after him comes one drawing and plucking after him a goat; then followeth another with a basket of dried figs; and last of all one that bare in shew Phallus, that is to say, the resemblance of the generall member of a man: but nowadaies all these ceremonies are despised, neglected, and in manner not at all to be seene, such a traine there is of those that carie vessels of gold and silver, so many sumptuous and costly robes, such stately chariots richly set out are driven & drawn with brave steeds most gallantly dight, besides the pageants, dumbe-shewes and masks, that they hide and obscure the auncient and true pompe according to the first institution; and even so it is in riches; the things that be necessarie and serve for use and profit, are overwhelmed and covered with needlesse toies and superfluous vanities, & I assure you the most part of us be like unto young Telemachus, who for want of knowledge and experience, or rather indeed for default of judgement and discretion when he beheld Nestors house furnished with beds, tables, hangings, tapistrie, apparell, and well provided also of sweete and pleasant wines, never reckoned the master of the house happy for having so good provision of such necessarie and profitable things: but being in Menelaus his house, and seeing there store of Ivorie, gold, and silver, and the mettall Electrum, he was ravished and in an ecstatic with admiration thereof, and brake out in these words:

Like unto this, the palace all within I judge to be,

Of Jupiter that mightie god

who dwels in azure skie:

How rich, how faire, how infinite

are all things which I see!

My heart, as I do them behold,

is ravish't wondrously.

50

But

But Socrates or Diogenes would have said thus rather:

How many wretched things are here?

how needlesse all and vaine?

When I them view, I laugh thereat,

of them I am not faine.

And what saiest thou foolish and vaine for as thou art? Where as thou shouldst have taken from thy verie wife her purple, her jewels and gaudie ornaments, to the end that shee might no more long for such superfluitie, nor runne a nodding after forrein vanities, farre fetcht and deere bought; dost thou contrariwise embellish and adorne thy house, like a theatre, scaffold and stage to make a goodly sight for those that come into the shew-place? Lo where in lieth the felicitie and happines that riches bringeth, making a trim shew before those, who gaze upon them, and to testifie and report to others what they have seene: set this aside (that they be not shewed to all the world) there is nothing at all therein to reckon. But it is not so with temperance, with philosophie, with the true knowledge of the gods, so farre forth as is meete and behoovefull to be knownen, for these are the same still and all one, although everie man attaine not thereto but all others be ignorant thereof. This pietie (I say) and religion hath alwaies a great light of her owne and resplendant beames proper to it selfe, wherewith it doth shine in the soule, evermore accompanied with a certaine joy that never ceaseth to take contentment in her owne good within, whether any one see it or no, whether it bee unknownen to gods and men or no, it skilleth not. Of this kinde and nature is vertue indeed, and trueth, the beautie also of the Mathematicall sciences, to wit, Geometrie and Astrologie; unto which who will thinke of the gorgeous trappings and capparifons, the brooches, collars and carkans of riches are any waies comparable, which (to say a truth) are no better than jewels and ornaments good to trim young brides and set out maidens for to be seene and looked at? For riches, if no man doe regard, behold, and set their eyes on them (to say a trueth) is a blinde thing of it selfe, and sendeth no light at all nor raies from it; for certainly say: That a rich man dine and sup privately alone, or with his wife and some inward and familiar friends, he troubleth not himselfe about furnishing of his table with many services, daintie dishes, and festivall fare; he stands not so much upon his golden cups and goblets, but useth those things that be ordinarie, which goe about everie daie and come next hand, as well vessell as viands; his wife sits by his side and beares him companie, not decked and hung with jewels and spangles of gold, nor arraid in purple, but in plaine attire and simply clad; but when he makes a feast (that is to say) sets out a theatre, wherein the pompes and shewes are to meete and make a jangling noise together, when the plaies are to be represented of his riches, and the solemne traine therof to be brought in place; then comes abroad his brave furniture indeed; then he fetcheth out of the ship his faire chaufers and goodly pots; then bringeth hee forth his rich three-footed tables; then come abroad the lampes, candlesticks, and branches of silver; the lights are disposed in order about the cups; the cup-bearers, skinkers and tasters are changed; all places are newly dight and covered; all things are then stirred and remooved that saw no sunne long before; the silver plate, the golden vessels, and those that be set and enriched with pretious stones; to conclude, now there is no shew els but of riches; at such a time they confesse themselves and will be knownen wealthy. But all this while whether a rich man suppe alone, or make a feast, temperance is away and true contentment.

OF THE NATURALL LOVE OR KINDNES OF PARENTS TO THEIR CHILDREN.

The Summarie.

Wisely said one, (whoſoever it was) That to baniſh amitie and friendſhip from among men, were as great hurt to the ſocietie of mankind, as to deprive them of the light and heat of the Sunne : which being verified and found true in the whole courſe of this life, and in the maintenance of all ſtates; not without great cauſe Nature hath caſt and ſprinkled the ſeed thereof in the generation and nourishment of a race and kinde, whereof ſhe giveth evident teſtimonies in brute beaſts, the better to moove and incite us to our duty. That we may ſee therefore this precious ſeed and graine of amitie, how it doth flower and fructifie in the world, we muſt begin at the love and naturall kindneſſe of fathers and mothers to their children; for if this be well kept and maintained, there proceed from it an infinite number of contentments which do much aſſuage and eaſe the inconveniences and diſcommodities of our life. And Plutarch entering into this matter, ſheweth firſt in generallity: That men learne (as it were) in the ſchool of brute beaſts, with what affection they ſhould beget, nourish and bring up their children: afterward he doth particulariſe thereof, and enrich the ſame arguments by divers examples. But for that he would not have us thinke that he extolled dumbe beaſts above man and woman, he obſerveth and ſeteth downe verie well the difference that is of amities, diſcourſing in good and modeſt tearmes as touching the generation and nouriture of children, and biſſely by the way repreſenteth unto us the miſerable entrance of man into this race upon earth, where he is to runne his courſe. Which done, he proveth that the nourishing of infants hath no other cauſe and reaſon, but the love of fathers and mothers; he diſcovereth the ſource of this affection; and for a concluſion, ſheweth that what defect and fault ſoever may come betwene and be medled among, yet it can not alſogether abolith the ſame.

OF THE NATURALL LOVE OR KINDNES OF PARENTS to their children.

That which mooved the Greeks at firſt, to put over the deciſion of their controverſies to ſtraine judges, and to bring into their country, ſtrangers to be their umpires, was the diſtruſt and diffidence that they had one in another, as if they confeſſed thereby that juſtice was indeed a thing neceſſarie for mans life, but it grew not among them: And is not the caſe even ſo as touching certaine queſtions diſputable in Philoſophie? for the determining whereof, Philoſophers (by reaſon of the ſundry and divers opinions which are among them) have appealed to the nature of brute beaſts, as it were into a ſtrange city, and remitted the deciding thereof to their properties and affections, according to kinde, as being neither ſubject to partiall favour, nor yet corrupt, depraved and polluted. Now ſurely, a common reproch this muſt needs be to mans naughty nature and leaſd behaviour; That when we are in doubtfull queſtion concerning the greateſt and moſt neceſſary points pertaining to this preſent life of ours, we ſhould goe and ſearch into the nature of horſes, dogs and birds for reſolution; namely, how we ought to make our marriages, how to get children, and how to reare and nourish them after they be borne, and as if there were no ſigne (in manner) or token of nature imprinted in our ſelves, we muſt be faine to alledge the paſſions, properties and affections of brute beaſts, and to produce them for witneſſes, to argue and prove how much in our life we tranſgreſſe and go aſide from the rule of nature, when at our firſt beginning and entrance into this world, we finde ſuch trouble, diſorder and conſuſion; for in thoſe dumbe beaſts beforeſaid, nature doth retaine and keepe that which is her owne and proper, ſimple, entire, without corruption or alteration by any ſtrange mixture; whereas contrariwiſe, it ſeemeth that the nature of man, by diſcourſe of their reaſon and cuſtome together, is mingled and conſuſed with ſo many extravagant opinions and judgements, ſet from all parts abroad (much like unto oile that commeth into perfumers hands) that thereby it is become manifolde variable, and in every one ſeverall and particular, and doeth not retaine that which the owne indeed, proper and peculiar to it ſelfe; neither ought we to thinke it a ſtrange matter and a wonderfull, that brute beaſts void of reaſon, ſhould come neerer unto nature, and follow her ſteps better, than men endued with the gift of reaſon: for ſurely, the verie ſenſeleſſe plants heerein ſurpaſſe thoſe beaſts beforeſaid, and obſerve better the inſtinct of nature; for conſidering that they neither conceive any thing by imagination, nor have any motion, affection or inclination at all; ſo verily their appetite (ſuch as it is) varieth not nor ſtirreth to and fro out of the compaſſe of nature, by means whereof, they continue and abide as if they were kept in and bound within cloſe-prison, holding on ſtill in one and the ſame courſe, and not ſtepping once out of that way wherein nature doth leade and conſect them: as for beaſts, they have not any ſuch great portion of reaſon to temper and mollifie their naturall properties, neither any great ſubtiltie of ſenſe and conceit, nor much deſire of libertie; but having many inſtincts, inclinations and appetites, not ruled by reaſon, they breake out by the means thereof other-whiles, wandering at ray, and running up and downe to and fro, howbeit, for the moſt part, not very farre out of order, but they take ſure holde of nature; much like a ſhip which lieth in the rode at anchor, well may the daunce and be rocked up and downe, but ſhe is not caried away into the deepe at the pleaſure of windes and waves; or much after the manner of an aſſe or hackney, travelling with bit and bridle, which go not out of the right & ſtraight way, wherein the maſter or rider guideth them; whereas in man, even reaſon herſelfe, the miſtreſſe that ruleth and commandeth all, findeth out new cuts (as it were) and by-ways, making many ſtarts and excuſions at her pleaſure to and fro, now heere, now there; whereupon it is that ſhe leaveth no plaine and apparant print of natures traacts and footing.

Conſider I pray you in the firſt place the marriages (if I may ſo terme them) of dumbe beaſts and reaſonleſſe creatures; and namely how therein they folow precifely the rule and direction of nature. To begin withall; they ſtand not upon thoſe lawes that provide againſt ſuch as marrye not, but lead a ſingle life; neither make they reckoning of the acts which lay a penalitie upon thoſe that be late ere they enter into wedlocke, like as the citizens under Lycurgus and Solon, who ſtood in awe of the ſaid ſtatutes; they feare not to incur the infamie which followed thoſe perſons that were barren and never had children; neither doe they regard and ſeeke after the honours and prerogatives which they attained, who were fathers of three children, like as many of the Romans do at this day, who enter into the ſtate of matrimonie, wedde wives and beget children, not to the end that they might have heires to inherit their lands and goods, but that they might themſelves be inheritors & capable of dignities & immunities. But to proceed unto more particulars, the male afterwards doth deale with the female in the act of generation not at all times; for that the end of their conjunction and going together is not groſſe pleaſure ſo much, as the engendering of young and the propagation of their kinde: and therefore at a certaine ſeaſon of the yeare, to wit, the very prime of the ſpring, when as the pleaſant winds ſo apt for generation do gently blow, and the temperature of the aire is friendly unto breeders, commeth the female full lovingly and kindly toward her fellow the male, even of her owne accord and motion (as it were) trained by the hand of that ſecret inſtinct and deſire in nature; and for her owne part, ſhe doth what ſhe can to woo and ſollicite him to regard her, as well by the ſweet ſcent of her fleſh, as alſo by a ſpeciall and peculiar ornament and beautie of her body, ſhewing herſelfe freſh and cheerefull, full of dew and verdure of greene herbes, pure and neat I warrant you; in this manner doth ſhe preſent her ſelfe unto the male and courteth him: now when ſhe perceives once that ſhe is ſped and hath conceived by him, ſhe leaveth him and retireth apart in good ſort full decently; and then her whole care is to provide for that which the goeth withall, fore-caſting how to be delivered of it in due time, and bethinking how to ſave, preſerve,

and reare it when it is fallen and brought forth. And certes it is not possible to expresse sufficiently and worthily the particulars that are done by these dumbe creatures (but onely this, that every thing proceedeth from the tender love and affection which they have to their young ones) in providence, in patience, in abstinence.

We all acknowledge the Bee to be wife, we call her so, we celebrate her name for producing and working so diligently that yellow honie, yea and we flatter in praising her, feeling as we do the sweetnesse of the said honie, how it tickleth and contenteth our tongue & taste; and all this while what one is there of us that maketh any account of the wisdom, wit, and artificial subtiltie that other creatures shew, as well in the bringing forth their young, as the fostering and nouriture of them? for first and foremost doe but consider the sea bird called Alcyon, no sooner doth she perceive herselfe to be knit with egge, but she falleth presently to build her nest, she gathereth together the chine-bones of a certaine sea fish which the Greekes call Beryn, that is to say, the sea-needle, these the coucheth, plaiteth, windeth and interlaced one within another, so artificially working the same and weaving them close together in a round and large forme, after the maner of a fishers leape or weele net; and when she hath knit and fortified the same exactly with many courses of the saide bones driven and united jointly together in good order, she exposeth it full against inundation and dashing of the sea waves, to the end that the superficial outside of the worke beaten upon gently and by little & little with the water, being thickned and felted thereby might be more solide and firme, and so it prooveth indeed; for so hard it groweth by this meanes, that scarcely any stone can crush it, or edged instrument of iron cleave it; but that which is yet more wonderfull, the mouth and entrie of the said nest is composed and wrought proportionably just to the measure and bignesse of the bird Alcyon afore said, so as no creature bigger or lesse than her selfe, no nor the very sea (as men say) nor the least thing in the world can get into it. And will you see moreover what kindnesse and naturall affection the sea weefils or sea dogs doe shew unto their little ones? They breed their young whelpes or kitlings alive within their bellies, and when they list, let them forth and suffer them to run abroad for reliefe and to get their foode, and afterwards receive them into their bodies againe, enclosing them whiles they be asleepe themselves, cherishing them cowed in their bowels and wombe. The she beare a molt fell, savage and cruell beast, bringeth forth her young whelpes, without forme or fashion, unknit and unjointed, having no distinct limmes or members to be seene; howbeit with her tongue as it were with a toole and instrument for the purpose, she keepeth such a licking of them, the formeth and fashioneth those membranes where in they were lapped in her wombe in such sort, that she seemeth not onely to have brought forth her young, but also to have wrought them afterwards workman-like to their shap and proportion. As for that lion which Homer describeth in this wise,

*Who leading forth his tender whelps
to seeke abroad for praie
In forest wilde; no sooner meets with hunters in the waie,
But looking sterne with bended browes
which cover both his eyes,
He makes a stand, and them affronts in fierce and threatening wise.*

Thinke you not by this description that he resembleth one who is bent to capitulate and stand upon termes of composition with the hunters for to save the life of his little ones? To speake in a word, this tender love and affection of beasts toward their young, maketh them that otherwise be timorous, hardie and bold; those that be slow and idle by nature, laborious and painfull; and such as of themselves are greedy and ravenous, to be spare and temperate in their feeding, like as the bird whereof the same Homer speaketh,

*Which brings in mouth unto her nest,
such food as she abroad
Could get to feed her naked young,
and doth her selfe defraud.*

For content she is even with her owne hunger to nourish her little ones, and the same food or bait that she hath for them, being so neere as it is unto her owne craw and gizzard, she holdeth close and falk in her bill, for feare lest shee might swallow it downe the throat ere shee were aware;

Or

*Or like the burch running about her young whelps, at the sight
Of strangers, baies and barks apace, and ready to fight.*

No doubt the feare which she hath lest her little one should take harme redoubleth her courage, and maketh her more hardie and angrie than before: as for the partridges when they be laid-for by the fowler, together with their covein of young birds, they suffer them to the away as well as they can, and make shift to save themselves, but the old rowens full subtilly seeme to wait the coming of the said hunters, abiding until they approach neere unto them, and by keeping about their feet, traine them still away after them, ready ever as it were to be caught; now when the fowler shall seeme to reach unto them with his hand, they will runne a little or take a short flight from him, and then they staie againe, putting him in new hope of his pray and bootie, which every-foot he thinketh to take with his hand: thus they play mock-holiday with the fowlers, and yet with some danger to themselves for the safetie of their young, untill they have trained them a great way off, who fought for their lives. Our hens which we keepe about our houses so ordinarily, and have daily in our eyes, how carefully doe they looke unto their young chickens whiles they receive some under their wings, which they spread and hold open for the nonce that they may creepe in, others they suffer to mount upon their backs, gently giving them leave to climbe and get up on every side, and this they doe not without great joy and contentment, which they testifie by a kind of clocking and speciall noise that they make at such a time; if when they be alone without their chickens, and have no feare but of themselves a dogge or a serpent come in their way, they fle from them; let their brood be about them when such a danger is presented, it is wonderfull how ready they will be to defend the same, yea and to fight for, even above their power. Do we thinke now that nature hath imprinted such affections and passions in these living creatures, for the great care that she hath to mainteine the race and posteritie (as it were) of hens, dogs, or beares; or doe we not rather make this construction of it, that the shame, pricketh, and woundeth men thereby when we reason and discourse thus within our selves, that these things be good examples for as many as follow them, and the reproches of those that have no sense or feeling of naturall affection; by which no doubt they do blame and accuse the nature of man onely, as if she alone were not affectionate without some hire and reward, nor could skill of love but for gaine and profit; for admired he was in the theaters that thus spake first:

*For hope of gaine one man will love another,
Take it away, what one will love his brother?*

This is the reason (according to the opinion and doctrine of Epicurus) that the father affectioneth his sonne, the mother is tender over her childe, and children likewise are kind unto their parents: but yet such that brute beasts could both speake and understand language, in some open theater, and that one called to meet together a sufficient assembly of beets, horses, dogs, and fowles, certes if their voices were demanded upon this point now in question, hee would set downe in writing, and openly pronounce, that neither bitches loved their whelpes, nor mares their foales, hens their chickens, and other fowles their little birds in respect of any reward, but freely and by the instinct of nature: and this would be found a true verdict of his, iustified and verified by all those passions and affections which are observed in them; and what a shame and infamie unto mankind is this to grant and avouch, that the act of generation in brute beasts, their conception, their breeding, their painfull deliverie of their young, and the carefull feeding and cherishing of them be natures works meerely, and duties of gratuitie; and contrariwise that in men they be pawnes given them for securitie of interest, hires, gages, and earnest pennies respective to some profit and gaine which they draw after them? But surely as this project is not true, so it is not worth the hearing, for nature verily as in savage plants and trees, to wit, wilde vines, wilde figge trees, and wilde olives she doth ingenerate certaine raw and imperfect rudiments, (such as they be) of good and kinde fruits; so she hath created in brute beasts a naturall love and affection to their young, though the same be not absolute nor fully answerable to the rule of justice, ne yet able to passe farther than the bonds and limits of necessitie. As for man, a living creature, endued and adorned with reason, created and made for a civill societie, whom she hath brought into the world for to observe lawes and justice, to serve honour and worship the gods, to found cities and governe common-wealths, and therein to exercise and performe all offices of bountie: him she hath bestowed upon noble, generous, faire and fruitfull seeds of all these these

these things, to wit, a kinde love and tender affection toward his children; and these the following still, and persisteth therein, which she infused together with the first principles and elements that went to the frame of his body and soule: for nature being every way perfect and exquisite, and namely in this inbred love toward infants, wherein there wanteth nothing that is necessarie, neither from it is ought to be taken away as superfluous; It hath nothing (as Erasistratus was wont to say) vaine, frivolous and unprofitable, nothing inconstant, and shaking too and fro, inclining now one way, and then another. For in the first place, as touching the generation of man, who is able to expresse her prudence sufficiently? neither haply may it stand with the rule of decent modestie to be over-curious and exquisite in delivering the proper names and tearmes thereto belonging: for those naturall parts serving in that act of generation and conception secret as they be and hidden, so they neither can well, nor would willingly be named; but the composition and framing thereof, so aptly made for the purpose, the disposition and situation likewise so convenient, we ought rather to conceive in our minde than utter in speech.

Leaving therefore those privie members to our private thoughts, passe we to the confection, disposition and distribution of the milke, which is sufficient to shew most evidently her providence, in desire and diligence; for the superfluous portion of blood which remaineth in a womans bodie, over and above that which serveth for the use whereunto it is ordeined, floating up and downe within her afterwards, for defect or feebleness of spirits wandereth (as it were) to and fro, and is a burden to her bodie; but at certaine set-times & daies, to wit, in every monthly revolution, nature is carefull and diligent to open certaine sculces and conduits, by which the said superfluous blood doth void and passe away, whereupon shee doth not onely purge and lighten all the bodie besides, but also cleanseth the matrice, and maketh it like a piece of ground brought in order and temper, apt to receive the plough, and desirous of the seed after it in due season: now when it hath once conceived and retained the said seed, so as the same take root and be knit, presently it draweth it selfe strait and close together round, and holdeth the conception within it; for the navill (as Democritus saith) being the first thing framed within the matrice, and serving in stead of an anchor against the waving and wandering of it to and fro, holdeth sure the fruit conceived, which both now groweth and hereafter is to be delivered (as it were) by a sure cable and strong bough, then also it stoppeth and shutteth up the said riverets and passages of those monthly purgations; and taking the foresaid blood, which otherwise would run an void by those pipes and conduits, it maketh use thereof for to nourish, and (as it were) to water the infant, which beginneth by this time to take some consistence and receive shape and forme, so long, untill a certaine number of daies which are necessarie for the full growth thereof within be expired; at which time it had need to remove from thence for a kinde of nutriment else-where in another place; and then diverting the said course of blood with all dexterity & a skilfull hand (no gardener nor fountainer in drawing of his trenches and channells with all his cunning so artificiall) and employing it from one use to another, she hath certaine cesterne (as it were) or fountaine-heads, prepared of purpose from a running source most readie to receive that liquor of blood quickly, and not without some sense of pleasure and contentment; but withall, when it is received, they have a power and facultie, by a milde heat of the naturall spirits within them, and with a delicate and foemine tendernes, to concoct, digest, change and convert it into another nature and qualitie, for that the paps have within them naturall, the like temperature and disposition answerable unto it: now these teares which spout out milke from the cocks of a conduit, are so framed and disposed, that it floweth not forth all at once, neither do they send it away suddenly: but nature hath so placed the duct that as it endeth one way in a spongeous kinde of flesh full of small pipes, and made of purpose to transmit the milke, and let it distill gently by many little pores and secret passages, so it yeeldeth a nipple in manner of a faucet, very fit and ready for the little babes mouth, about which to nuzzle and nudge with it pretty lips it taketh pleasure, and loveth to be tugging and lugging of it; but to no purpose and without any fruit or profit at all, had nature provided such tooles and instruments for to engender and bring forth a childe; to no end (I say) had she taken so good order, used so great industry, diligence and forecast, if withall she had not imprinted in the heart of mothers a wonderful full love and affection, yea, and an extraordinarie care over the fruit of their wombe, when it is borne into the world; for

*Of creatures all which breath and walke
upon the earth in sight,*

None

*None is there wretched more than man
new borne into this light.*

And whosoever saith thus of a yoong infant newly coming forth of the mothers wombe, maketh no lie at all, but speaketh trueth; for nothing is there so imperfect, so indigent and poore, so naked, so deformed, so foule and impure, than is man to see to presently upon his birth, considering that to him (in maner alone) nature hath not given so much as a cleane passage and way into this light; so furred he is all over & polluted with blood, so full of filth and ordure, when he entrencheth into the world, resembling rather a creature freshly killed & flaine, than newly borne; that no bodie is willing to touch, to take up, to handle, dandle, kisse and clip it, but such as by nature are lead to love it: and therefore, whereas in all other living creatures, nature hath provided that their udders and paps should be set beneath under their bellies, in a woman onely, she hath seated them aloft in her breasts, as a very proper and convenient place, where shee may more readily kisse, embrace, coll and huggle her babe while it sucketh; willing thereby to let us understand, that the end of breeding, bearing and rearing children, is not gaine and profit, but pure love and meere affection. Now, if you would see this more plainly proved unto you, propose (if you please) and call to remembrance the women and men both in the olde world, whose hap was either first to beare children, or to see an infant newly borne; there was no law then to command and compell them to nourish and bring up their yoong babes; no hope at all of reciprocal pleasure or thanks at their hands that indured them; no expectation of reward and recompense another day to be paid from them, as due debt for their care, paines and cost about them: nay, if you goe to that, I might say rather: That mothers had some reason to deale hardly with their yoong infants, and to beare in minde the injuries that they have done them, in that they endured such dangers and so great paines for them:

*As namely, when she painfull throwes
as sharpe as any dart,
In travell pinch a woman neere,
and pierce her to the hart:
Which midwives, Junoes daughters then,
do put her to, poore wretch,
With many a pang, when with their hand
they make her body stretch.*

But our women say; It was never Homerus (surely) who wrote this; but Homerus rather: that is to say, some Poetresse or woman of his poeticall veine, who had bene herselfe at such a busines, and felt the dolorous pangs of child-birth, or els was even then in labour, and upon the point to be delivered, feeling a mixture of bitter and sharpe throwes in her backe, belly and flanks, when shee powred out these verses: but yet, for all the sorrow and deare bargain that a mother hath of it, this kinde and naturall love doth still bend, incline and leade her, that notwithstanding she be in a heat full upon her travell, full of paines and after-throwes, panting, trembling and shaking for very anguish, yet she neglecteth not her sweet babe, nor windeth or shrinketh away from it; but the turneth toward it, she maketh to it, she smileth and laugheth upon it, she taketh it into her armes, she hugleth it in her bosome, and kisseth it full kindly: neither all this whiles gathereth she any fruits of pleasure or profit, but painfully (God wot) and carefully

*She laps it then in raggs full soft,
With swaddling bands she wraps it off,
By turnes she cooles and keeps it warme,
Loth is she that it should take harme:
And thus as well by night as day,
Paines after paines she taketh ay.*

Now tell me (I pray you) what reward, recompense and profit do women reape for all this trouble and painfull hand about their little ones? None at all (surely) for the present, and as little in future expectation another day, considering their hopes are so farre off, and the same so uncertaine. The husbandman that diggeth and laboureth about his vine at the Aequinox of the Autumne. He that soweth his corrie when the starres called Pleiades, doe couch and goe downe, reapeth and hath his harvest afterwards when they rise and appeare againe; kine calve, mares foale, hennes hatch, and soone after there cometh profit of their calves, their colts and their chickens: but the rearing and education of a man is laborious, his growth is very slow and late; and whereas

long it is ere he commeth to prooffe and make any shew of vertue, commonly most fathers die before that day. Neocles lived not to see the noble victorie before Salamis that Themistocles his sonne achieved: neither saw Miltiades the happie day wherein Cimon his sonne won the fildes at the famous battell neere the river Euryndon: Xenippus, was not so happy as to heare Pericles his sonne, out of the pulpit preaching and making orations to the people; he lived not to see the good fortune of Ariston to be at any of his sonne Platoes lectures and disputations in Philosophie: the fathers of Euripides and Sophocles, two renowned Poets, never knew of the victories which they obtained, for pronouncing and rehearsing their tragedies in open theater, they might heare them peradventure when they were little ones to stammer, to lisse, to spel and put syllables together, or to speake broken Greeke, and that was all. But ordinary it is that men to live to see, heare, and know when their children fall to gaming, revelling, masking, and banquetting, to drunkenesse, wanton whooring, love and such like misdemeanors. So as in these regards this one Mot of Enemius in an Epigram of his, deserveth to be praised and remembered.

*See how great paines all fathers undergoe,
What daily griefes their children put them to.*

And yet for all this, fathers cease not still to nourish and bring up children, and such most of all who stand least in need of their children another day; for a meere mockery it were, and a ridiculous thing if a man should suppose; that rich & wealthy men do sacrifice unto the gods, and make great joy at the nativite and birth of their children, because that one day they shall feede and suite in them in their old age, and interre them after they be dead; unless perhaps it may be said, they reioice thus and be so glad to have and bring up children, for that otherwise they should leave none heires behind them; as who would say, it were so hard a matter to finde out and meet with those that would be willing to inherite the lands and goods of strangers. Certes the sands of the sea, the little motes in the sunne raised of dust, the feathers of birds together with their variable notes, be not so many in number, as there be men that gape after heritages, and be ready to succeed others in their livings. Danaus (who as they say was the father of 50 daughters) if his fortune had beene to be childlesse, I doubt not but he should have had more heires than so to have parted his goods and state among them, and those verily after another sort than the heires of his owne body. For children yeeld their parents no thanks at all for being their inheritors, neither in regard thereof do they any service, dutie, or honour unto them; for why? they expect and looke for the inheritance as a thing due and of right belonging unto them: but contrariwise you heare how those strangers that hang and hunt about a man who hath no children, much like to those in the comedies, singing this song,

*O sir, no night shall do you any harme,
I will revenge your wrongs and quarrels ay:
Hold heare, three-halfe-pence good to keepe you warme
Pursu it, drinke it, sing wo and care away.*

As for that which Euripides saith,

*The worldly goods procure men friends to chuse,
And credit most, who then will them refuse.*

It is not simply and generally true, unless it be to those as have no children; for such indeed are sure to be invited and feasted by the rich; lords and rulers will make court and be serviceable to such; for their great oratours and advocates will plead at the bar without fee, and give their counsell gratis,

*How mightie is a rich man with each one,
So long as his next heire is knowne to none?*

whereas you shall see many in the world, who before time having a number of friends and honour enough and no sooner had a little childe borne unto them, but they lost all their friends, credit, and reputation: at once, so that by this reckoning the having of children maketh nothing at all to the authoritie of their parents, so that in regard thereof, it is not that they doe so love their children; but surely the cause of this their kindeesse and affection proceedeth altogether from nature, and appeereth no lesse in mankind than in wilde beasts: Howbeit otherwhiles this naturall love dwelle as many other good qualities in men, are blemished and obscured by occasion of vice that buddeth up afterwards; like as we see wilde briars, bushes and brambles to spring up and grow among good and kind feeds, for otherwise we might as well collect and say that men love not themselves because many cut their owne throates, or wilfully fall down headlong from steepe rocks and high places. For Oedipus

With

*With bloody hand his owne eie-lids did force,
And plucked out his eies upon remorse.*

Hegeſias disputing and discoursing upon a time of abstinence, caused many of his auditours and scholars to pine themselves to death.

*Such accidents of many sorts there be,
Permitted by the gods we daily see.*

But al of them like as those other passions and maladies of the mind before named, transport a man out of his owne nature, and put him beside himselfe, so as they testifie against themselves that this is true, and that they doe amisse herein; for if a sow having farrowed a little pigge, devoure it when she hath done, or a bitch chance to teare in peeces a puppie or whelp of her own litter, presently men are amazed at the sight thereof, and woonderfully affrighted, whereupon they sacrifice unto the gods certaine expiatorie sacrifices, for to divert the sinister praefages thereof, as taking it to a prodigious woonder, as confessing thereby, that it is a proptie given to all living creatures, even by the instinct and institution of nature; To love, foster and cherish the fruit of their owne bodies: so farre is it from them to destroy the same. And yet, notwithstanding her corruption and depravation in this behalfe: Like as in mines, the gold (although it be mixed with much clay, and furred all over with earth) shineth & glittereth thorow the same, and is to be seene as farre off; even so nature amid the most depravate maners and corrupt passions that we have, sheweth a certeine love and tender affection to little ones. To conclude, whereas the poore many times make no care at all to nourish and reare up their children, it is for nothing els but because they feare left having not so good bringing up nor so civill education as they ought, they should proove servile in behavior, untaught, unmanerly, rude, and void of all good parts; and judging (as they do) poverty to be the extremity of all miseries that can befall so man, their heart will not serve them to leave unto their children this hereditarie calamity, as a most grievous and dangerous discaſe.

OF THE PLVRALITY OF FRIENDS.

The Summarie.

N certeine discourses going before, it appeareth what a benefit and good thing friendship is. And now Plutarch addeth thereto a certeine correction very necessary, in regard of our nature which is given alwaies to bend unto extremities, and not able long to holde the golden-meane. Like as therefore, it becometh a miserable, wretched and cursed mind to be desirous for to leade a life without acquaintance and familiarity with any person; even so to make friends (as they say) hand over head and upon every occasion, is peradventure impossible, but surely not expedient. Our author therefore, willing to reforme this disordinate affection that is in many, who because they would have a number of friends, often-times have not one assured, sheweth that it is farre better for a man to get one fast and faithfull friend, than a great multitude of whom he can not make any certaine account; propounding as a remedie for this covetous minde of entreaining such a plurality of friends, the examples of those who are contented with few, and by that meanes thinke their estate more sure and stedfast. After this, he treateth of the choise of friends, but especially of one. Then discourses he of that which is requisite in true friendship, annexing thereto many proper and apt similitudes, which represent aswell the benefit that sincere affection bringeth, as the hurt which commeth off fained and counterfeited amitie. This done, he proveth, that to enterteine a number of friends, is a very hard matter, yea, and impossible; for that a man is not able to converse with them, nor to frame and sort with them all, but that he shall procure himselfe enemies on all sides: and when he hath enriched and adorned the same with notable examples, he proceedeth to describe, describē, what use a man is to make of friendship, and with what sort and condition of men he ought to joine in amity: but this is the conclusion; That an honest and vertuous man can not quit himselfe well, and performe his devouire unto many friends at once.

OF THE PLURALITIE of friends.

Socrates upon a time demanded of Menon the Theſſalian, who was esteemed very ſufficient in all literature, and a great ſchoole-man, exerciſed in long praſtice of diſputations, and named to be one (as Empedocles ſaith) who had attained to the very height and perfection of wiſedome and learning, what vertue was; and when he had answered readly and boldly enough, in this wiſe: There is a vertue (quoth he) of a yong childe, and of an olde gray beard; of a man, and of a woman; of a magiſtrate, and of a private perſon; of a maſter, and of a ſervant: I con you thanke (quoth Socrates againe, replying unto him) you have done it very well: I asked you but of one vertue, and you have raiſed and let ſlie a whole ſwarme (as it were) of vertues, gueſſing and collecting not amiſſe by ſuch an anſwere, that this deepe cleark, who had named thus many vertues, knew not ſo much as one. And might not a man ſeeme to ſcorne and mocke us well enough, who having not yet gotten one friendſhip and amity certaine, are afraid (forſooth) left ere we be aware, we fall into a multitude and pluralitie of friends: for this were even as much as if one that is maimed and ſtarke blinde, ſhould feare to become either Briareus the giant, with an hundred armes and hands, or Argus, who had eyes all over his bodie. And yet we praife and commend exceſſively and beyond all meaſure the yong man in Menander, when he ſaith:

*Of all the goods which I do holde,
To thinke ech one (I would be bolde)
Right wonderfull, if I might finde
The shadow onely of a friend.*

But certainly this is one cauſe among many others, & the ſame not the leaſt, that we cannot be poſſeſſed of any one aſſured amity, becauſe we covet to have ſo many much like unto theſe common ſtrumpets and harlots, who for that they prostitute their bodies ſo often and to ſo manie men, cannot make any reckoning to hold & retaine any one paramour or lover faſt and ſure unto them; for that the firſt commers ſeeing themſelves neglected and caſt off by the entertainment of new, retire and fall away from them, and ſeek elsewhere; or rather much after the manner of that * foſter-childe of lady Hippſytle,

*Who being ſet in meadow greene
With pleaſant flowers all faire beſeene,
One after other crops them ſtill,
Hunting this game with bright goodwill:
For why, his heart tooke great content
In their gay bew and ſweetly ſent:
So little wit and ſmall * diſcretion
The infant had, and no * repletion.*

even ſo every one of us for the deſire of noveltie, and upon a ſatiety and fulneſſe of that which is preſent and in hand, ſuffreth himſelfe ever to be caried away with a new-come friend that is freſh and flowing; which fickle and inconstant affection cauſeth us to change often and to begin many friendſhips and finiſh none; to enter ſtill into new amities and bring none to perfection; and for the love of the new which we purſue and ſeek after, wee paſſe by that which we held already and let it go. To begin then firſt and formeſt at antiquity (as it were) from the gooddeſſe Peſta (according to the old proverb) let us examine and conſider the common ſame of mans life which hath bene delivered unto us from hand to hand time out of minde, by the ſucceſſion and progreſſe of ſo many ages from the old world unto this day, and take the ſame for a wiſeſſe and counſeller both in this matter, wee ſhall finde in all the yeeeres paſt, theſe onely couples and paires of renowned friends, to wit, Theſeus and Pirithous; Achilles and Patroclus; Oreſtes

* Ophelias of Archimedes.

* Whimsy discretion of the infant had and no repletion where.

Oreſtes and Pylades; Pythias and Damon; Epaminondas and Pelopidas. For friendſhip is indeede (as I may ſo ſay) one of theſe cattell that love company and deſire to feed and paſture with fellows; but it can not abide herds and droves, it may not away with theſe great flocks, as jayes, dawes and choughes do. And whereas it is commonly ſaid and thought, that a friend is another owne ſelfe, and men give unto him the name of swallow or emmet in Greeke, as if a man would ſay, swallow, that is, ſuch another: what implieth all this, but that friendſhip ſhould be reduced within the meaſure and compaſſe of the duall number, that is, of twaine. Well, this is certaine, we can buy neither many ſlaves nor purchaſe many friends with a ſmall piece of coine: but what may be this piece of money that will fetch friends? Surely, kinde affection or good will, and a lovely grace joined with vertue, things I may tell you ſo rare, as looke thoroughout the world and the whole courſe of nature, you ſhall finde nothing more ſeaſon. No marvell then, if it be unpoſſible either to love many or to be loved of many, perfectly and in the height of affection. But like as great rivers, if they be divided into many channells, and cut into ſundry riverets, carry but an ebbe water, and run with no ſtrong ſtreame; even ſo a vehement and affectionate love planted in the minde, if it be parted many and divers waies becommeth enervate and feeble, and cometh in manner to nothing. This is the reaſon in nature, that thoſe creatures which bring forth but one and no more, love their yong more tenderly and entirely, than others do theirs. Flower alſo when he would ſignifie a childe moſt dearly beloved, calleth it μικρον παιδιον, that is to ſay, only begotten and toward old age, to wit, when the parents have no more betwene them, nor ever are like or doe looke to have another: for mine owne part, I would not deſire to have that μικρον, that is to ſay, one friend, and no more; but ſurely, I could with that other he were μικρον, yea, and μακρον, that is to ſay, long and late firſt ere he be gotten, like as a ſonne which is borne toward the latter daies of his parents, yea, and ſuch a one, as (who according to that proverb ſo common in every mans mouth) hath eaten with me a meaſure of ſalt. And are not many now adaies called friends? what els? if they have but drunke once together at the taverne, or met in the tennis court, or els turned into a tabling houſe, and played at dice and hazzard one with the other, or haply light in company at one hoſtelrie and lodged together, and in one word, they do contract and gather friends in this manner out of common innes, wreſtling places, and ordinary walks in the markets or publike galleries. And verily, the common ſort, when they ſee every morning in the houſes of rich men and mightie rulers, a great multitude and concourſe of people, with much ado and hurrying, giving attendance there to ſalute them and bid them good morrow, kiſſing their right hands, & glad if they may touch them, accompanying them in manner of a guard when they go out of their lodging; oh, they imagine & repute ſuch potentates wondrous happie, as being furniſhed with ſuch numbers of friends; and yet ſurely, as many as they be, they ſhall fee more flies ordinarily in their kitchens: and to ſay a troth, like as theſe flies will be gone if no cat and viands be ſtirring; ſo theſe friends will tary no longer than gaine and profit is to be gotten.

Certes, true and perfect friendſhip requireth theſe three things eſpecially; Vertue, as being honeſt and commendable; Societie, which is pleaſant and delectable; and Profit, which is needfull and neceſſarie: for a man muſt admit and receive a friend upon judgement and after triall made, he ought to delight and joy in his company, and he is to make uſe of him as occaſion ſerveth: all which three are contrarie unto pluralitie of friends, but eſpecially that which is principally, to wit, judgement upon a triall: and to prove this to be true; ſee firſt and formeſt whether it be poſſible in a ſmall time to make prooſe and triall of ſinging men or quierſters, that they may keepe a good concert and harmonie together in their ſong; or to make choiſe of oare-men, who ſhall agree in their rowing, to riſe and fall with their oares juſt together; or of houſholde ſervants ſuch as wee purpoſe to make the bailiffs and ſtewards of our goods, or the governors and bringers up of our children; much more unlikely then is it, that we ſhould have prooſe of many friends in a little ſpace, who will be ready to enter the triall with us of all manner of fortune, and of whom every one will be preſt and willing

*Of his uſefare to yeeld even part to thee,
And beare like part of thy calamitie.*

For neither is a ſhip ſhot or haled into the ſea againſt ſo many ſtormes & tempeſts; nor mee do ſer & pitch ſo many ſtakes in a palliſado for the defence of any place; or in havens raiſe banks, and oppoſe damps, againſt the like dangers, or in feare of ſo many perils, as friendſhip promiſeth luſcour and refuge for, if it be founded ſurely and aright upon good prooſe and ſufficient experience. As for ſuch as before triall and experiment made do intrude themſelves comming and

and going for friends, such when they be put to the trial & touch indeed, & then found like evil money, counterfeit or light, they that go without them, be glad in their minde, and as many as have them, with with all their hart & pray to God for to be rid of them. But surely this is a troublesome & comberous thing, neither is it an easie matter to void and cast off such a friendship as this, so displeasing & offensive: for like as if some kind of bad meat do trouble and offend the stomacke, a man can neither retaine and hold it still, but it will put him to paine and breed hurt & corruption, nor yet put it off and send it out in such sort as it went in, but all filthy and loathsome, as being furred over with slime, and mixed confusedly with other humours, and whollie altered from the former state; even so an ill friend either tarieth with us still to his owne griefe and ours both, or else away he goeth perforce with euill wil, malice and enmitie like bitter choller that is vomited out of the stomacke. It is not good therefore to receive and admit of friends over-lightly and over-soone, nor to set our mindes and knit our affections to those that come next hand, and present themselves first, ne yet love those incontinently that seeke to us and follow us; but rather to seeke after them and follow them our selves that are worthy of friendship: for we must not alwaies chooe that which is easie to be had & willing to be gotten; for we put by gorse and furzen bushes; we tread under foot briars and brambles though they catch hold of us, and hang unto us as we walke whether we will or no; whereas wee go forward to the olive tree and the vine; and even so it is not alwaies decent & good to entertaine into our familiaritie one that is readie to embrace and hang about us; but rather such ought we our selves affectionately to embrace whom we have tried to be profitable unto us, and who deserve that we should love and make account of them. And like as Xenxis the painter answered sometime to those who found fault with him for his slow hand in painting: I confesse indeed (quoth he) that I am long in drawing a picture, for I purpose that my worke should continue long; and even so that friendship and familiaritie is like to last and be preserved long which was a good while in prooofe and triall. Is it then no easie matter to make triall and choise of many friends together? and is it no hard thing to conuerse & keepe companie with many at once, or rather is this also impossible for surely it is conversation and fellowship, whereby we enjoy the benefit of friendship, and the most sweet and pleasant fruit of amitie consisteth in keeping continuall societie, and daily frequenting one anothers companie, like unto those who uttered these words,

For during life we will not sit in counsell from our friends, Nor yet resolve of doubtful points before we know their minds.

As Homer reporteth in one place: and in another Menelaw speaking of Ulysses, saith thus,

*Nought else us twaine our mutual love,
and pleasures shall depart
untill death close up both our eyes and strike us to the hart.*

But this pluralitie of friends whereof we now speake, seemeth to do cleane contrarie; for whereas the simple amitie of twaine draweth us together, holdeth & uniteth us by frequent and continuall conversation, fellowship, and duties of kindenesse,

*Much like as when the fig tree juice,
you put a white milke among,
It cruddes, knits, and binds the same,
no lesse then remnes strong.*

according to the words of Empedocles; and surely desirous it is to make the semblable union and concorporation: this friendship of many separateth, distracteth and diverteth us, calling and transporting us sundry waies, not permitting the commixture and fodering (as it were) of good will and kinde affection to grow into one, and make a perfect joint by familiar conversation, enclosing & fastning every part together. But the same anon bringeth withall a great inequality in offices and reciprocal services meet for friends, and breedeth a certaine foolish bashfulness and streining of courtisie in the performance thereof, for by occasion of many friends those parts in amitie, which otherwise are easie and commodious, become difficult and incommodious: And why?

*All men do not agree in humor one,
Their thoughts their cares bend diversely one,
and no marvel, for our verie natures do not all incline in affection the same way; neither are we*

at all times conversant and acquainted with the like fortunes and adventures. To say nothing of their sundrie occasions and occurrences which serve not indifferently for all our actions; but like as the windes unto sailers, they are with some and against others; sometimes on our backs and other whiles full in our face. And say that it may fall out so, that all our friends at once do stand in need, and be desirous of one and the same helpe and ministerie at our hands, it were verie hard to fit all their turnes and satisfie them to their content; whether it be in taking our advice and counsell in any negotiations, or in treating about State matters, or in suite after dignities, places of government, or in feasting and entertaining strangers in their houses: But suppose that at one & the same instant, our friends being diversly affected & troubled with sundrie affaires, request all of them together our helping hand; as for example, one that is going to sea for to have our companie in that voiage; another who being defendant & to answer for himselfe in the law, to assist him in the court; and a third that is a plaintife, to second him in his plea; a fourth who either is to buy or sell, for to helpe him to make his markets; a fifth who is to marrie for to sacrifice with him, and be at his wedding dinner; and a sixth, who is to inter a dead corps for to moume & solemnize the funerals with him: in such a medley and confusion as this, as if according to Sophocles:

*A citie smackt with insence sweet,
And ring with songs for mirth so meet,
With plaints also and groanes resound,
And all in one and selfe same sound.*

Certes having so many friends, to assist and gratifie them all were impossible, to pleasure more were absurd, and in serving ones turne to reje& many others, were offensive and hurtful: for this is a rule:

Who to his friend is well affected, Loves not himselfe to be neglected.

and yet commonly such negligences and forgetfull defaults of friends, we take with more patience, and put up with lesse anger and displeasure, when they shall come to excuse themselves by oblivion making these and such like answers. Surely, you were but forgotten; it was out of my head, and I never thought of it: but he that shall alleadge thus and say: I was not your assistant in the court, nor stood to you in your cause, by reason that I attended another friend of mine in a triall of his; or I came not to visite you whiles you had an ague, for that I was buslie employed at a feast, that such a one made to one of his friends; excusing his negligence to one friend, by his diligence to others; surely he maketh no satisfaction for the offence already taken, but increaseth the same and maketh it woorse than before, by reason of jealousy added thereto; howbeit most men as it should seeme aime at nothing else but at the profit and commoditie which friendship bringeth and yeeldeth from without, & never regard what care it doth imprint and worke within; neither remember they that he whose turne hath bene served by many friends, must likewise reciprocally be ready to helpe them as their need requireth. Like as therefore the giant Briareus with his 100 hands feeding 50 bellies, had no more sustenance for his whole body die than we, who with two hands furnish and fill one belly; even so the commoditie that wee have by many friends bringeth this discommoditie withall, that we are to be employed also to many, in taking part with them of their griefs and passions, in travailing and in being troubled together with them in all their negotiations and affaires: for we are not to give care unto Enripides the poet when he saith thus,

*In mutuall love men ought a meane to keepe,
That it touch not heart roote nor marrow deepe,
Affections for to change it well best,
To rise and fall, now hot now coole by fits.*

giving us to understand that friendship is to be used according as need requireth more or lesse, like to the helme of a ship, which both holdeth it hard, and also giveth head, or the tackling which spread and draw, hoise and strike saile, as occasion serveth. But contrariwise, rather (good Enripides) we may turne this speech of yours to enmitie, & admonish men that their quarrels & contentions be moderate and enter not to the heart and inward marrow (as it were) of the soule, that hatred (I say) and malice, that anger, offences, defiance, and suspitions, be so intertained as that they may be soone appeased, laid downe & forgotten. A better precept is that yet of Pythagoras, when he teacheth us not to give our right hand to many; that is to say, not to make many men our friends, nor to affect that popular amitie common to all, and exposed or offered to every every one that commeth, which no doubt cannot chuse but bring many passions with it into the heart, among which, to be disquieted for a friend, to condole or grieve with him, to cunct into troubles, and to plunge ones selfe into perils for his sake, are not very easie matters to be borne by those that carie an ingenuous minde with them, and be kind-hearted: but the saying of wife Chilena a professor of philosophie is most true, who answering unto a man that vaunted how he had not an enimie; It should seeme then (quoth he) that thou hast never a friend; for certainly enmities ensue presently upon amities, nay they are both interlaced together; neither is it the part of a friend not to feele the injuries done unto a friend, nor to participate with him in all iniquities, hatred, and quarrels that he incurreth; and one enimie evermore will be sure to suspect the friend of another, yea and be ready to malice him; as for friends oftentimes they 10 envie their owne friends, they have them in jealousie, and traduce them every way. The oracle answered unto Timeus when he consulted about the planting and peopling of a new colonie in this wise:

*Thou shalt not lead a swarme of bees full kind,
But angrie waspes, thou shalt them shortly find.*

Semblable they that seeke after a bee-hive (as it were) of friends, light ere they be aware upon a waspes nest of enmities: where there is a great ods and difference even in this, that the revenging remembrance of an enimie for wrong done, over-weigheth much the thankfull memorie of a friend for a benefit received: and whether this be true or no, consider in what maner Alexander the great entreated the friends of Philotas and Parmenio; how Dionysius the tyrant used the familiars of Dion; after what sort Nero the emperor dealt by the acquaintance of Plautus, or Tiberius Caesar by the well-willers of Sejanus, whom they caused all to be racked, tortured and put to death in the end. And like as the costly jewels of golde, and the rich apparell of king Creens daughter, served him in no stead at all, but the fire that tooke holde thereof, flaming light out suddenly, burned him when he ran unto her to take her in his armes, and so consumed father and daughter together; even so you shall have some, who having never received any benefit at all by the prosperitie of their friends, are entangled notwithstanding in their calamities, and perish together: with them for companie; a thing that ordinarily and most of all they are subject unto, who be men of profession, great clearks, and honourable personages. Thus Thersites, when Perithous his friend was punished and lay bound in prison 30

*With fetters sure to him tied was,
Fare stronger than of iron or brasse.*

Thucydides also writeth; That in the great pestilence at Athens, the best men and such as made greatest profession of vertue, were they who did most with their friends that lay sicke of the plague: for that they never spared themselves, but went to visit and looke to all those whom they loved and were familiarly acquainted with. And therefore it is not meet to make so little regard and reckoning of vertue, as to hang and fasten it upon others, without respect, and (as they say) hand over head, but to reserve the communication thereof to those who be worthy; that is to say, unto such who are able to love reciprocally, and know how to impart the like againe. And verily, this is the greatest contrariety and opposition which crosseth pluralitie of friends, in that amitie in deed is bred by similitude and conformitie: for considering that the very brute beasts not endued with reason, if a man would have to ingender with those that are of divers kinds, are brought to it by force, and thereto compelled, in so much, as they shrinke, they couch downe upon their knees, and be ready to flee one from another; whereas contrariwise, they take pleasure and delight to be coupled with their like and of the same kinde, receiving willingly and entertaining their companie in the act of generation, with gentleness and good contentment: how is it possible that any found and perfect friendship should grow betwene those who are in behaviour quite different, in affections divers, in conditions opposite, and whole course of life tendeth to contrary or sundry ends? True it is, that the harmonie of musicke, whether it be in song or instrument, hath symphony by antiphony (that is to say) the accord ariseth from discord, and of contrarie notes is composed a sweet tune, so as the treble and the base concur, after a sort, (I wot not how) & meet together, bringing forth by their agreement that sound which pleaseth the eare: but in this consonance and harmonie of friendship, there ought to be no part unlike or unequal, nothing obscure and doubtfull, but the same should be composed of all things agreeable, to wit, the same will, the same opinion, the same counsell, the same affection, as if one soule were parted into many bodies. And what man is he, so laborious, so mutable, so variable, and apt to take every fashion & form? who is able to frame unto all patterns, and accommodate himselfe himselfe to so many natures, and will not rather be ready to laugh at the Poet Theognis, who giveth this lesson:

*Put on a minde (I thee do wish)
As variable as Polype fish,
Who as resemble will the rock,
To which he neere doth approach.*

and yet this change and transmutation of the said polype or pourcuttle fish, entrench not deeply in, but appeareth superficially in the skin, which by the closeness or laxitie thereof, as he draws it in or lets it out, receiveth the deflections of the colours from those bodies that are neere unto it; whereas amities do require that the maners, natures, passions, speeches, studies, desires and inclinations may be conformable; for otherwise to doe, were the properie of a Procurer, who was neither fortunate nor yet verie good and honest, but who by enchantment and forcerie could easily transforme himselfe from one shape to another in one and the same instant; and even so he that entertaineth many friends, must of necessitie be conformable to them all; namely, with the learned and studious, to be ever reading; with professors of wrestling, to bestrew his bodie with dust (as they doe) for to wrestle; with hunters, to hunt; with drunkards, to quaffe and carouse; with ambitious citizens, to sue and manage for offices, without any seled mansion (as it were) of his owne nature for his conditions to make abode in. And like as naturall Philosophers do holde: That the substance or matter that hath neither forme nor any colour, which they call Materia prima, is a subject capable of all formes, and of the owne nature so apt to alter and change, that sometimes it is ardent and burning, otherwhiles it is liquid and moist; now rare and of an aircie substance, and afterwards againe grosse and thicke, resembling the nature of earth; even so must the minde applied to this multiplicitie of friends, be subject to many passions, sundry conditions, divers affections pliable, variable and apt to change from one fashion to another. Contrariwise, simple friendship and amitie betwene twaine, requireth a staied minde, a firme and constant nature, permanent and abiding alwaies in one place, and retaining still the same fashions; which is the reason that a fast and assured friend is very generous and hard to be found. 30

OF FORTUNE.

The Summarie.

40 Long time hath this Proverbe bene current, That there is nothing in this world but good fortune and misfortune. Some have expounded and taken it thus; as if all things were carried by meere chance and adventure, or mooved and driven by inconstant fortune, an idle forged in their braine, for that they were ignorant in the providence of the True God who conducteth ordinarily all things in this world by second causes and purpose. Now Plutarch not able to arise and reach up to this divine and heavenly wisdom hidden from his knowledge, staideth below; and yet poore Pagan and Epicure though he were, he consulteth that dangerous opinion of Fortune; shewing that it taketh away all distinction of good and evil, quencheth and putteth out the light of mans life, blending and confounding vice and vertue together. 50 Afterwards he provoveth that prudence and wisdom, over-rules his blind fortune, by considering the maistrie and dominion that man hath above beasts: the arts also and sciences whereof he maketh profession, together with his judgement and will directly opposite and contrarie to all casualties and changes.

OF FORTVNE.

*Lind fortune rul's mans life away,
Sage counsell therein beares no sway,*

said one (who ever it was) that thought all humane actions depended upon meer casualtie, and were not guided by wisdom. What and hath justice and equitie no place at all in this world? Can temperance and modestie do nothing in the direction and managing of our affaires? Came it from fortune; and was it indeed by mere chance that Aristides made choise to continue in povertie, when it was in his power to make himselfe a Lord of much wealth and many goods? or that Scipio when he had forced Carthage, tooke not to himselfe, nor so much as saw any part of all that pillage? And was it long of fortune, or by casualty that Philocrates having received of King Philip a great summe of gold, bought there with harlots and daintie filthes; or that Laisthenes and Euthyrates betrayed the citie Olympus, measuring soveraigne good and felicity of man by belly-cheere, and those pleasures which of all other be most dishonest and infamous? And shall we say, it was a worke of fortune that Alexander, sonne of Philip, not onely himselfe forbore to touch the bodies of the captive women taken in war, but also punished all such as offered them violence and injurie: and contrariwise, came it by ill lucke and unhappie fortune, that another Alexander the sonne of King Priamus slept and lay with his friends wife, when he lodged and entertained him in his house, and not onely so, but carried her away with him, and by that occasion brought all manner of calamitie upon two maine parts of the continent, to wit, Europe and Asia, and filled them both with those miseries that follow warres?

If we graunt that all these occurrents came by fortune, what should let us, but we might as well say that cats, goats and apes be likewise by fortune given to be alwaies lickorous, lecherous, sturewd and sawcy. But in case it be true (as true it is) that the world hath in it temperance, justice and fortitude; what reason is there to say, that there is no prudence and wisdom therein? now if it be yeelded that the world is not void of prudence: how can it be maintained that there should not be in it sage counsell? For temperance (as some say) is a kinde of prudence; and most certaine it is, that justice should be assisted by prudence; or to say more truly, ought to have it present with her continually. Certes, sage counsell & wisdom in the good use of pleasures and delights, whereby we continue honest, we ordinarily do call continence and temperance; the same in dangers and travels, we termne tolerance, patience and fortitude; in contracts and management of State affaires we give the name of loialtie, equitie and justice; whereby it cometh to passe, that if we will attribute the effects of counsell and wisdom unto fortune, we must likewise ascribe unto her the works of justice and temperance. And so (believe me) to rob and steal, to cut purses, and to keepe whores, must proceed from fortune; which if it be so, let us abandon all discourse of our reason, and betake our selves wholly to fortune to be driven and carried to and fro at her pleasure like to the dust, chaffe, or sweepings of the floore, by the puffs of some great wind. Take away sage & discreet counsell; farewell then all consultation as touching affaires, away with deliberation, consideration and inquisition into that which is behovefull and expedient: for surely then, Sophocles talked idly, and knew not what he spake in saying thus:

Seeke, and be sure to finde with diligence,

But loose, what you for-let by negligence.

And in another place where dividing the affaires of man he saith in this wise:

What may be taught, I strive to learne;

what may likewise be found

I seeke, for wishes all I pray,

and would to God be bound.

Now would I gladly know, what is it that men may finde and what can they learne, in case all things in the world be directed by fortune? What Senate house of citie would not be dissolved and abolished? what counsell chamber of Prince should not be overthrowen and put downe, if all were at the disposition of fortune? we doe her wrong in reproching her for blindness, when we runne upon her as we doe, blinde, and debasing our selves unto her; for how can we chuse but stumble upon her indeed, if we plucke out our owne eyes, to wit, our wisdom & dexterie terrie of counsell, and take a blinde guide to lead us by the hand in the course of this our life? Certes, this were even as much, as if some one of us should say, the action of those that see, is fortune, and not sight or eyes, which Plato calleth phantasy, that is, Light-bearers: the action like-wile of them that heare, is nothing else but fortune, and not a naturall power and facultie to receive the stroke or repercussion of the aire, carried by the eare and the braine. But better it were (I trow) and so will everie wise bodie thinke to take heed how to discredit our senses so, as to submit them to fortune: For why? Nature hath bestowed upon us sight, hearing, taste and smelling, with all the parts of the body indued with the rest of their powers and faculties, as ministers of counsell and wisdom. For it is the soule that seeth, it is the soule & understanding that heareth, all the rest are deafe and blinde: and like as if there were no sunne at all we should (for all the starrs besides) live in perpetuall night as Heraclitus saith; even so if man had not reason and intelligence, notwithstanding all his other senses, he should not differ in the whole race of his life from brute and wilde beasts; but now in that we excell and rule them all, it is not by chance and fortune: but Prometheus (that is to say) the use and discourse of reason is the very cause that hath given us in recompence

*Both horse and asse, with breed of beests so strong
To cary us, and ease our labour long.*

according as we read in Aeschylus the poet. Forasmuch as otherwife fortune and nature both have bene more favourable, and beneficiall to most of the brute beasts in their entrance into this life, than unto man; for armed they be with hornes, tusks, spurs, and stings; moreover as Empedocles saith,

*The Urchin strikes with many a pricke,
Which grow on backe both sharpe and thicke.*

Again there be many beasts clad and covered with scales and shag haire; shod also with claws and hard hoofes: onely man as Plato saith is abandoned and forsaken by nature, all naked, unarmed, unshod, and without any vesture whatsoever,

*But by ones gift which she hath given,
Amends she makes, and all is even.*

and that is, the use of reason, industrie, and providence.

*For strength of mortall man is small,
His lims but weake and sinewes all:
Yet by his wit and quick conceit,
By cunning casts and subrill sleight,
No beast in sea, or mount, so fell,
So wilde or ste, but hee doth quell.*

What beast more nimble, more light and swift than is the horse; but for man it is that he runneth in the race: the dogge is couragious and eager in fight, but it is in the defence of man: fishes yeeld a most delicate and sweet meat; and swine be full of good flesh, but both of them serve as viands for the food and nourishment of man: what creature is bigger or more terrible to see to than is the elephant? howbeit he maketh man sport and pastime, he is shewed as a goodly sight in festivall solemnities where people bee assembled, he is taught to friske and daunce his measures, to fall upon his knees likewise and do reverence: and verily these and such like sleights and examples are exhibited not in vaine nor without good profit, but to this end, that thereby we may know how farfoorth reason & wisdom doth advance and lift up a man, above what things it maketh him surmount, and how by means thereof he ruleth all, and surpasseth all:

*As fight with fits we are not good,
nor yet in tripping feet,
In wrestling we may well be blam'd,
our running is not fleet.*

But in all these feats we are inferiour to brute beasts, howbeit for experience, memorie, wisdom and artificiall sleights (as Anaxagoras said) wee go beyond them all, and thereby wee have the mastery and use of them, making them to serve our turnes: we streine honie out of the combs of bees; we presse milke out of beasts udders; we rob and spoile them; we drive and carie them away and whatsoever they have, in so much as in all this there is nothing that can be justly attributed to forme, but all proceeds from counsell and fore-cast.

Furthermore, the works of carpenters are done by hand of man, so are they also of smithes and brasiers, of masons, builders, gravers and imagers: in all which there is nothing to be scene, that a man can say is done by chaunce or fortune, at leastwise when it is wrought absolutely and as it should be. And say that it may fall out otherwhiles that a good artisan, whether he be a cutter in brasie or a mason, a finith or a carpenter, may meet with fortune and doe some little thing by chance; yet the greatest peeces of worke, and the most number are wrought and finished respectively by their arts, which a certeine poet hath given us secretly to understand by these verses,

*March on your way ech artisan
Who live upon your handy-craft,
On soorth I say in comely traine,
Your sacred panniers beare aloft;
Tou that Ergane dread and feare
The daughter grim of Iupiter.*

For this Ergane (that is to say Minerva) all artificers and artificers acknowledge and honor for their patronesse, and not fortune. True it is that the report goes of a certeine painter, who drawing the picture of an horse, had done verie well in all respects, both in portraiture and also colours, save onely that he pleased not himselfe in painting the some and swelling froth which useth to gather about the bit as hee champeth upon the same, and so falleth from his mouth when he snuffeth and bloweth; this I say he liked not, neither thought he it workmanly done, inso much as hee wiped it out many times and began it a new; but never was it to his mind; at last in a pelling chafe because it would frame no better, he takes me his spung full as it was of colours, and flang it against the table wherein hee wrought; but see the wonderfull chance; this sponge lighting as it did upon the right place, gave such a print, and dashed fo, as that it represented the froth that he so much desired most lively; and to my remembrance there is not in anie historie set downe an artificall thing but this that fortune ever did.

Artificers use altogether in everie piece of worke, their Iquires, their rules, their lines and leavels; they goe by measures and numbers, to the end that in all their workes there should not be any thing found done either rashly or at adventure. And verily these arts are petie kindes of Prudence and so called; or rils and riverets flowing from Prudence, or certaine parcels rather of it, sprinkled and dispersed among the necessities of this life: and thus much is covertly signified by the fable of the fire that Promethus divided by sparkles, which flew some heere some there; for semblahy, the small parcels and fragments of wisdom, being cut into sundrie portions, are ranged into their severall ranks and become arts. A woonderfull thing how these arts and sciences should have no dealing with Fortune nor need her helpe, for to attaine unto their proper ends; and yet Prudence which is the greatest soveraigne and most perfect of them all, yea and the verie height of all the glorie, reputation, and goodnesse of man, should be just nothing. In the winding up and letting downe of the strings of an instrument, there is one kind of wisdom, and that is called Musicke; in the dressing and ordering of meates and viands there is another, which they name Cookerie; in washing and scouring of clothes and garments there is a third, to wit, the fullers craft. As for our little children, we teach them to draw on their shoes, to make them readie and dresse themselves in their clothes decendly, to take meat in their right hand, and to hold bread in the left; an evident argument and prooffe, that even such small matters as these, depend not of chance and fortune, but require skill and heed taking. Shall we say then that the greatest and most principall things that are, even those that be most materiall and necessarie for mans felicitie, use not wisdom, nor participate one whit with providence and the judgement of reason? There is no man so blockish and voide of understanding, that after he hath tempered clay and water together, lets it alone and goeth his way when he hath so done, looking that of the owne accord, or by fortune there will be bricks or tiles made thereof: neither is any one such a for, as when he hath bought wool & leather, sits him downe & praies unto fortune, that thereof he may have garments or shooes: and is there any man so foolish thinke you? who having gathered together a great masse of gold and silver, gotten about him a mightie retinue of slaves and servants, and being possessed of divers faire and stately houes with many a doore within and without, and those surely locked on everie side, having before him in his sight a sort of sumptuous beds with their rich and costly furniture, and of tables most precious, will repose soveraigne felicitie therein, or thinke that all this can make him to live happily, without paine, without griefe, secure of chaunge and alteration, if he have not wisdom withall?

There

There was one that cavilled upon a time with Captaine Iphicrates, and by way of reproch & minding to proove that he was of no reckoning, demanded what he was? For (quoth he) you are not a man at armes, nor archer, nor yet targuettier: I am not indeed I confesse (quoth Iphicrates, but I am he who commaund all these, and employ them as occasion serveth; even so wisdom, is neither gold nor silver, it is not glorie or riches, it is not health, it is not strength, it is not beautie: what is it then? Surely even that which can skill how to use all these, and by means whereof each of these things is pleasant, honorable and profitable; and contrariwise, without which, they are displeasing, hurtfull and dangerous, working his destruction and dishonor who possesseth them. And therefore right good counsell gave Promethus in Hesiodus to his brother Epimethus in this one point:

*Receive no gifts at any time,
which heavenly Iove shall send:
But see thou do refuse them all,
and backe againe them send.*

Meaning thereby these outward goods of fortunes gift, as if he would have said: Goe not about to play upon a Flute, if thou have no knowledge in Musicke; nor to reade if thou know never a letter in the booke; mount not on horsebacke, unless thou canst tell how to sit him and ride; and even so he advised him thereby, not to seeke for office and place of government in common-weale, wanting wit as he did; nor to lay for riches, so long as he bare a covetous minde and wist not how to be liberrall; nor to marrie a wife, for to bee his maister and to lead him by the nose: for not onely wealth and prosperitie hapning above desert unto unadvised folke, giveth occasion (as Demosthenes said) unto them for to commit many follies; but also wordly happines beyond all reason and demerit, causeth such as are not wise, to become unhappie and miserable in the end.

OF ENVIE AND HATRED.

The Summarie.

In this briefe Treatise concerning Envie and Hatred, Plutarch after he hath shewed in generall termes that they be two different vices, and declared what the properties of the one and the other, prooveth his difference by divers reasons and arguments ranged in their order: he discovereth the nature of envious persons and malicious; and sheweth by a proper similitude that the greatest personages in the world, be secured from the claws and pawes of envious persons, and yet for all that, cease not to have many enemies. And verily it seemeth that the Author began this little worke, especially for to beat downe envie, and that the insanie thereof might so much more appeere in comparing and matching it with another detestable vice, the which notwithstanding he saith is lesse enormous than it.

OF ENVIE AND HATRED.

Let seemeth at the first sight, that there is no difference between envie and hatred, but that they be both one. For vice (to speake in generally) having (as it were) many hookes or crotchets, by meanes thereof as it sturreth to and fro, it yeeldeth unto those passions which hang thereto many occasions and opportunities to catch holde one of another, and so to be knit and entrelaced one within the other; and the same verily (like unto diseases of the body) have a sympathie and fellow-feeling one of anothers distemperature and inflammation: for thus it commeth to passe, that a malicious and spightfull man is as much grieved and offended at the prosperitie of another, as the envious person: and so we holde, that benevolence and good-will is oppositely unto them both, for that it is an affection of a man, withing good unto his neighbour: and envie in this respect resembleth hatred, for that they have both a will and intention quite contrary unto love: but forasmuch as no things like to the same, and the resemblances betweene them be not so effectual to make them all one, as the differences to distinguish them asunder; let us search and examine the said differences, beginning at the very source and originall of these passions.

Hatred then, is ingendred and ariseth in our heart upon an imagination and deepe apprehension that we conceive of him whom we hate, that either he is naught & wicked in general to every man, or els intending mischief particularly unto our selves: for commonly it falleth out, that those who thinke they have received some injurie at such an ones hand, are disposed to hate him, yea, and those whom otherwise they know to be maliciously bent and wont to hurt others, although they have not wronged them, yet they hate and can not abide to looke upon them with patience; whereas ordinarily they beare envie unto such onely as seeme to prosper and to live in better state than their neighbours: by which reckoning it should seeme that envie is a thing indefinite, much like unto the disease of the eyes Ophthalmia, which is offended with the brightnesse of any light whatsoever; whereas hatred is determinate, being alwaies grounded upon some certaine subject matters respectife to it selfe, and on them it worketh. Secondly, our hatred doeth extend even to brute beasts; for some you shall have, who naturally abhorre and can not abide to see cats nor the flies cantharides, nor todes, nor yet snakes and any such serpents. As for Germanicus Caesar, he could not of all things abide either to see a cocke or to heare him crow. The Sages of Persia called their Magi, killed all their mice and rats, aswell for that themselves could not away with them but detested them, as also because the god (forsooth) whom they worshipped, had them in horror. And in trueth, all the Arabians and Aethiopians generally, holde them abominable. But envie properly is betweene man and man; neither is there any likelihood at all, that there should be imprinted envie in savage creatures one against another; because they have not this imagination and apprehension, that another is either fortunate or unfortunate, neither be they touched with any sense of honour or dishonour; which is the thing that principally and most of all other giveth an edge, and whetteth on envie; whereas it is evident that they hate one another, they beare malice and mainteine enmitie, nay, they go to warre as against those that be disloyall, treacherous, and such as are not to be trusted: for in this wise doe eagles warre with dragons, crows with owles, and the little nonnet or tit-mouse fighteth with the linnet, inasmuch, as by report, the very blood of them after they be killed, will not mingle together; and that which is more, if you seeme to mixe them, they will separate and run apart againe one from the other: and by all likelihood, the hatred that the lion hath to the cocke, and the elephant also unto an hogge, proceedeth from feare: for lightly that which creatures naturally feare, the same they also hate; so that herein also a man may assigne and note the difference betweene envie and hatred, for that the nature of beasts is capable of the one but not of the other.

Over and besides, no man deserveth justly to be envied: for to be in prosperitie and in better state than another, is no wrong or injurie offered to any person; and yet this is it for which men be envied; whereas contrariwise, many are hated worthily, such as those whom in Greeke we call εὐνοῦμενοι, that is to say, worthy of publike hatred, as also as many as do not flie from such, detest them them not nor abhorre their companie. And a great argument to verifie this point, may be gathered from hence, namely, in that some there be who confesse and take it upon them, that they hate many; but no man will be known that he envie any: for in trueth, the hatred of wicked persons and of wickednesse, is commended as a qualitie in men praise-worthy. And to this purpose serveth well that which was said of Charillus, who reigned in Spuria, and was Lycorgus his brothers sonne, whom when there were certaine that commended for a man of milde behaviour and of a relenting and gentle nature: And how can it be (quoth he who was joined with him in the roiall government) that Charillus should be good, seeing he is not sharpe and rigorous to the wicked. And the Poet Homer describing the deformitie of Thersites his bodie, de- painted his defects and imperfections in sundrie parts of his person, and by many circumlocutions; but his perverse nature and crooked conditions he set downe briefly and in one word in this wise:

Worthy Achilles of all the host

for he could not chuse but be sharke naught and wicked in the highest degree, who was so full of hatred unto the best men. As for those who denie that they are envious, in case they be convicted manifestly therein, they have a thousand pretences and excuses therefore, alledging that they are angry with the man, or stand in feare of him whom indeed they beare envie unto, or that they hate him, colouring and cloaking this passion of envie with the vaile of any other whatsoeuer for to hide and cover it, as if it were the only malady of the soule, that would be concealed and dissembled. It cannot chuse therefore, but that these two passions be nourished and grow as plants of one kinde, by the same meanes, considering that naturally they succede one the other: howbeit, wee rather hate those that be given more to leawdnesse and wickednesse, and we envy such rather who seeme to excel others in vertue. And therefore Themistocles (being but a youth) gave out and said, that he had done nothing notable, because as yet he was not envied: for like as the flies cantharides fettle principally upon that wheat which is the fairest and come to full perfection; and likewise sticke unto the roses that are most out, and in the verie pride of their flourishing; even so envie taketh commonly unto the best conditioned persons, and to such as are growing to the height of vertue and honour: whereas contrariwise the leawdest qualities that be, and wicked in the highest degree doe mightily moove and augment hatred: and heereupon it was that the Athenians had them in such detestable hatred, and abhorred them so deadly, who by their slanderous imputations brought good Socrates their fellow-citizen to his death, inasmuch as they would not vouchsafe either to give them a coale or two of fire, or light their candles, or deigne them an answer when they asked a question; nay they would not wash or bathe together with them in the same water, but commanded those servitors in the baines which were called Parachytæ, that is to say, drawers and ladders of water into the bathing vessels, to let forth that as polluted and defiled, wherein they had washed; whereupon they seeing themselves thus excommunicate and not able to endure this publike hatred which they had incurred, being wearie of their lives, hung and strangled themselves. On the contrary side it is often seene, that the excellency of vertue, honor and glory, and the extraordinarie successe of men is so much, that it doth extinguish and quench all envie. For it is not a likely or credible matter that any man beare envie unto Cyrus or Alexander the great, after they were become the onely lords and monarches of the whole world: but like as the sunne when he is directly and plumb over the head or top of any thing, causeth either no shadow at all, or the same very small and short by the reason that his light overspreadeth round about; even so when the prosperitie of a man is come to the highest point and have gotten over the head of envie, then the said envie retireth and is either gone altogether, or els drawn within a little roome by reason of that brightnesse over-spreading it: but contrariwise the grandence of fortune and puffance in the enemies, doth not one jot abbreviate or allay the hatred of their evill willers; and so that this is true, may appeere by the example of Alexander above named, who had not onely that envied him, but many enemies he found and those malicious, and by them in the end he was traiterously for-laied and murdered.

Sensibly, adversities may well stae envie and cause it cease, but enmitie and hatred they do not abolish; for men never give over to despise their enemies, no not when they are brought lowe and oppressed with calamities; whereas you shall not see one in miserie envied. But most true is that laying found of a certaine sophister or great profleour in our daies: That envious persons of all other be ever pittifull and delight most in commiseration: so that herein lieth one of the greatest differences between these two passions; that hatred departeth not from those persons of whom it hath once taken hold; neither in the prosperitie nor adversitie of those whom they hate; whereas envie doth avoid and vanish away to nothing upon extremitie aswell of the one as the other.

Over and besides we may the better discover the difference also of them by the contraries: for hatred, enmitie, and malice cease presently so soone as a man is perswaded that he hath caught no harme nor sustained injurie by the party; or when he hath conceived an opinion that such as he hated for their lewdnesse are reformed and become honest men; or thirdly if he have received some pleasure or good turne at their hand: for evermore the last favor that is shewed (as Thucydides saith) though it be lesse than many others, yet if it come in season and a good time, he is able to do out a greater offence taken before. Now of these three causes before specified, the first doth not wash away envie; for say that men were perswaded at the first that they received no wrong at all; yet they give not over for all that to beare envie still: and as for the two later they do irritate and provoke it the rather: for such as they esteeme men of qualitie and good woorth, those they doe bite more than before, as having vertue the greatest good that is; and notwithstanding that they do reape commoditie & find favour at their hands, who prosper more than they; yet they grieve and vexe thereat, envying them still both for their good mind to benefit them, and for their might and abilitie to performe the same; for that the one proceedeth from vertue, and the other from an happie estate, both which are good things.

We may therefore conclude, that envie is a passion farre different from hatred, since it is so that wherewith the one is appeased and mollified, the other is made more exasperate and greevous. But let us consider a little in the end the scope and intention aswell of the one as the other: Certes the man that is malicious, purposeth fully to do him a mischief whom he hateth; so that this passion is defined to be a disposition and forward will to spie out an occasion & opportunitie to wait another a shrewd turne; but surely this is not in envie: for many there be who have an envious eie to their kinsfolke and companions, whom they would not for all the good in the world see either to perish or to fall into any greevous calamitie; onely they are grieved to see them in such prosperitie, and would impeach what they can their power, and ecclipse the brightnesse of their glorie; many they would not procure nor desire their utter overthrow, nor any distresses remediable or extreame miseries; but it would content and suffice them to take downe their height, and as it were the upmost garret or turret of an high house which overlooketh them.

HOW A MAN MAY RECEIVE PROFIT BY HIS ENEMIES.

The Summarie.

Among the dangerous effects of envie and hatred, this is not the least nor one of the last, that they shooe (as it were) from within our adversaries, for to slide and enter into us and take possession in our hearts, making us believe that we shall impeach one evil by another; which is as much as to desire to cleanse one or dawe by a new, and to quench a great fire by putting into it plenty of oile. As for hatred it hath another effect nothing lesse pernicious, in that it maketh us blinde, and causeth us that we cannot tell at which end or turning to take our enemies, nor know our selves how to reenter into the way of vertue. Plutarch willing to cut off such effects by the helpe of morall Philosophie, raketh occasion to begin this discourse with a sentence of Xenophon; and prooveth in the first place by divers similitudes: That a man may take profit by his enemies: and this he saith abroad in particulars, shewing that their ambushes and inquisitions

inquisitions serve us in very great stead. After this, he teacheth us the true way how to be revenged of those that hate us, and what we ought to consider in blaming another. Now forasmuch as our life is subject to many injuries and calumnies, he instructeth us how a man may turne all to his owne commoditie: which done, he presenteth sower remedies and expedient means against their slanderous language, and how we should confound our enemies: The first is, To comaine our owne tongues, without rendering evil for evil: the second is, To doe them good, to love and praise their vertues: the third, To out-goe them in well doing: and the last, To provide that vertue remaine alwaies on our side, in such sort, that if our enemies be vicious, yet we persist in doing goods; and if they carry some shew and appearance of goodnesse, we endeavour to be indeed and without all comparison better than they.

HOW A MAN MAY RECEIVE profit by his enemies.

See that you have chosen by your selfe (ô Cornelius Pulscher) the meetest course that may be in the government of common-wealth; wherein having a principall regard unto the weale-publike, you shew your selfe most gracious and courteous in private to all those that have access and repaire unto you. Now forasmuch as a man may well finde some country in the world, wherein there is no venomous beast, as it is written of Candie, but the management and administration of State affaires was never knownen yet to this day cleere from envie, jealousy, emulation and contention, passions of all other most apt to engender and breed enmities, unto which it is subject; for that if there were nothing els, even amity & friendship it selfe is enough to entangle and encombe us with enmities; which wise Chilon the Sage knowing well enough, demanded upon a time of one (who vaunted that he had no enemies) whether he had not a friend. In regard hereof a man of State and policie, in mine opinion (among many other things wherein he ought to be well studied) should also thorowly know what belongeth to the having of enemies, and give good care unto the saying of Xenophon, namely: That a man of wit and understanding isto make his profit and benefit by his enemies. And therefore having gathered into a pretie Treatise, that which came into my minde of late to discourse and dispute upon this matter, I have sent unto you written and penned in the very same tearmes as they were delivered, having this eie and regard as much as possible I could, not to repeat any thing of that which heretofore I had written touching the politike precepts of governing the weale publike, for that I see that you have that booke often in your hand.

Our fore-fathers in the olde world contented themselves in this: That they might not be wounded or hurt by strange and savage beasts brought from forren countreys, and this was the end of all those combats that they had against such wilde beasts; but those who came after, have learned moreover, how to make use of them; not onely take order to keepe themselves from receiving any harme or damage by them; but (that which more is) have the skill to draw some commoditie from them, feeding of their flesh, clothing their bodies with their wooll and haire, curing and healing their maladies with their gall & rennet, arming themselves with their hides and skinnies; inso much as now from henceforth, it is to be feared (and not without good cause) lest if beasts should faile, and that there were none to be found of men, their life should become brutish, poore, needie and savage. And since it is so, that whereas other men thinke it sufficient not to be offended or wronged by their enemies, Xenophon writeth: That the wise reape commoditie by their adversaries; we have no reason to derogate any thing from his credit, but to believe him in so saying, yea, and we ought to search for the method & art to attaine and reach unto that benefit, as many of us (at least wise) as can not possibly live in this world without enemies. The husbandman is not able with all his skill to make all sort of trees to cast off their wilde nature, and become gentle and domestically. The hunter can not with all his cunning, make tame and tractable all the savage beasts of the Forrest; and therefore they have fought and devised other means and uses to make the best of them; the one finding good in barren and fruitlesse plants, the other in wilde and savage beasts. The water of the sea is not porable, but brackish and hurtful unto us, howbeit, fishes are nourished therewith, and it serveth mans turne also also to transport passengers (as in a waggon) into all parts, and to carrie whatsoever a man will. When the Satyre would have killed and embraced fire the first time that ever he saw it, Prome- them admonished him and said:

*Thou wilt bewaile thy goat-beard soone,
If thou it touch, it will burne anon.*

but it yeeldeth light and heat, and is an instrument serving all arts, to as many as know how to use it well; sensibly, let us consider and see whether an enemy being otherwise harmefull and intractable, or at least-wile hard to be handled, may not in some sort yeeld as it were a handle to take hold by, for to touch & use him so as he may serve our turne, and minister unto us some commodity. For many things there are besides, which be odious, troublesome, comberous, hurtfull, and contrarie unto those that have them or come neere unto them; and yet you see that the verie maladies of the bodie give good occasion unto some for to live at rest and repose; I meane sequestred from affairs abroad, & the travailes presented unto others by fortune, have so exercised them that they are become thereby strong and hardy: and to say more yet, banishment and losse of goods, hath bene the occasion unto divers, yea and a singular means to give themselves to their quiet studie & to philosophie; like as Diogenes and Crates did in times past. Zen himselfe when newes came unto him that his ship wherein he did venture and traffike was split and cast away: Thou hast done well by me fortune (quoth he) to drive me againe to my scholars weed. For like as those living creatures which are of a most sound and healthfull constitution, & have besides strong stomachs, are able to concoct & digest the serpents & scorpions which they devour; nay some of them there be which are nourished of stones, scales, and shels, converting the same into their nutriment by the strength and vehement heat of their spirits; whereas such as be delicate, tender, soft, and crasse, are ready to cast and vomit if they take a little bread onely, or doe but sip of wine; even so foolish folke doe marre and corrupt even friendship and amitie; but those that are wise can skill how to use enemies to their commoditie, and make them serve their turnes. First and foremost therefore in my conceit, that which in enemie is most hurtfull, may turne to be most profitable unto such as be warie and can take good heed: and what is that you will say? Thine enemie as thou knowest well enough watcheth continually, spying and prying into all thine actions, he goeth about viewing thy whole life, to see where he may finde any vantage to take hold of thee, and where thou liest open that he may assaile and surprise thee; his sight is so quicke that it pierceth not onely through an oke, as Lycene did, or stones and shels; but also it goeth quite through thy friend, thy domestically servants, yea and every familiar of thine with whom thou daily doest converse, for to discover as much as possibly he can what thou doest or goest about; he soundeth and searcheth by undermining and secret waies what thy designs & purposes be. As for our friends, it chaunceth many times that they fall extreme sicke, yea and die thereupon before we know of it, whiles we defer and put off from day to day to go and visit them, or make finall reckoning of them; but as touching our enemies we are so observant, that we curiously enquire & hearken even after their very dreames; the diseases, the debts, the hard usage of men to their owne wives, and the untoward life betweene them, are many times more unknown unto those whom they touch and concerne, than unto their enemie: but above all, he sticketh close unto thy faults, inquisitive he is after them and those he traceth especially: and like as the gaies or vultures flie unto the stinking sent of dead carions and putrified carcases, but they have no finell or sent at all of bodies sound and whole; even so those parts of our life which are diseased, naught and ill affected, be they that move an enemy; to these leape they in great haste who are our ill willers, these they seize upon, and are ready to worry and plucke in peeces; and this it is that profiteth us most, in that it compelleth us to live orderly, to looke unto our steps that we tread not awry, that we neither do or say ought inconsiderately or rashly; but alwaies keepe our life unblameable, as if we observed a most strict and exquisite diet; and verily this heedfull caution repressing the violent passions of our minde in this sort, and keeping reason at home within dores, engendreth a certaine studious desire, an intention and will to live uprightly and without touch: for like as those cities by ordinary warres with their neighbour cities, and by continuall expeditions and voiajes, learning to be wise, take a love at length unto good lawes and sound government of state; even so they that by occasion of enmity be forced to live soberly, to save themselves from the imputation of idleness and negligence, yea, and to do everie thing with discretion and to a good and profitable end, through use and custome shall be brought by little and little (ere they be aware) unto a certaine settled habit that they cannot lightly trip and do amisse, having their manners framed

framed in passing good order, with the least helping hand of reason and knowledge beside; for they who have evermore readily before their eyes this sentence:

This were alone for Priamus,

and his sonnes likewise all,

*Oh how would they rejoyce at heart,
in case this should befall.*

certaine would quickly be diverted, turned and withdrawn from such things, whereat their enemies are wont to joy and laugh a good: see we not many times stage players, chanters, musicians and such artificers in open theaters, who serve for the celebration of any solemnitie unto Bacchus or other gods, to play their parts carelessly, to come unprovided, and to carie themselves I know not how negligently, nothing forward to shew their cunning and doe their best, when they are by themselves alone and no other of their owne profession in place? but if it chance that there be emulation and contention betweene them and other concurrents who shall do best; then you shall see them not onely to come better prepared themselves, but also with their instruments in very good order; then shall you perceive how they will bestir themselves in trying their strings, in tuning their instruments more exactly, & in fitting every thing about their flutes and pipes, and assaying them. Hee then who knoweth that he hath an enemie ready and provided to be the concurrent in his life, and the rivall of his honour and reputation, will looke better to his waies and stand upon his owne guard; he will (I say) sit fast and looke circumspectly about him to all matters, ordering his life and behaviour in better sort: for this is one of the properties of vice, that when we have offended and trespassed, we have more reverence and stand rather in awe of our enemies left we be shamed by them than of our friends. And therefore Scipio Nasica when some there were that both thought and gave out that the Romane estate was not settled and in safetie, considering that the Carthaginians who were wont to make head against them and keepe them occupied, were now vanquished and defeated, the Athenians likewise subdued and brought under subjection: Nay many (quoth he) for it is cleane contrarie, and even now are we in greatest danger, being at this passe that we have left our selves none to feare, none to reverence.

And hereto moreover, accordeth well the answer that Diogenes made, like a Philosopher and a man of State indeed: One asked him how he should be revenged of his enemie: Matie (quoth he) by being a virtuous and honest man thy selfe. Men seeing the horses of their enemies highly accounted of, or their hounds praised and commended, do grieve thereat, if they perceive also their land well tilled and husbanded, or their gardens in good order, fresh and flourishing, they fetch a sigh and sorrow for the matter. What (thinke you then) will your enemie do? how will he fare, when you shall be seene a just man, wife and prudent, honest and sober, in words well advised and commendable, in deeds pure and cleane, in diet neat and decent?

*Reaping the fruit of wisdom and prudence,
Sown in deepe furrow of heart and conscience,
From whence there spring and bud continually Counsels full sage, with fruits abundantly.*

Pindarus the Poet said: That those who are vanquished and put to foile, are so tongue-tied, that they can not say a word; howbeit, this is not simply true, nor holdeth in all, but in such as perceive themselves overcome by their enemies, in diligence, goodnesse, magnanimity, humanity, bounty and beneficence: for these be the things (as Demosthenes saith) which stent the tongue, close up the mouth, stop the wind-pipes and the breath, and in one word, cause men to be silent and dumbe.

*Resemble not leav'd folke, but them out-goe
In verriest deeds, for this thou maist well doe.*

Wouldst thou doe thine enemie who hateth thee a great displeasure in deed? Never call to him by way of reproch, buggerer, wanton, lascivious, ruffian, scurrile scoffer, or covetous micher; but take order with thy selfe to be an honest man every way, chaste, continent, true in deed and word, courteous and just to all those that deale with thee: but if thou be driven to let fall an opprobrious speech, and to revile thine enemy, then take thou great heed afterwards that thou come not neere in any wise to those vices which thou reprochest him with, enter into thy selfe, and examine thine owne conscience, search all the corners thereof, looke that there be not in thy soule some putrified matter and rotten corruption, for feare lest thine owne vice within may hit thee home, and requite thee againe with this verse out of the tragical Poet:

*Alcech he is, others to cure,
Pestred himselfe with sores impure.*

If thou chance to upbraid thine enemy with ignorance, and call him unlearned, take thou greater paines at thy booke, love thou thy studie better, and get more learning: if thou twit him with cowardise, and name him dastard, stirre up the vigour of thine owne courage the rather, and shew thy selfe a man so much the more: hast thou given him the tearmes of beastly whoremaster or lascivious lecher, wipe out of thy heart the least taint and spot that remaineth hidden therein of concupiscence and sensualitytie; for nothing is there more shamefull or causeth greater griefe of heart, than an opprobrious and reprochfull speech returned justly upon the author thereof. And as it seemeth that the reverberation of a light doth more offence unto the feeble eyes; even so those reproches which are retorted and sent backe againe by the truth, upon a man that blafed them before, are more offensive: for no lesse than the North-east winde Cassius doth gather unto it clouds; so doth a bad life draw unto it opprobrious speeches; which Plato knowing well enough, whensoever he was present in place, and saw other men do any unseemly or dishonest thing, was wont to retire apart, and say thus secretly unto himselfe: Doe not I also labour other-while of this disease? Moreover, he that hath blamed and reproched the life of another, if presently withall he would goe and examine his owne, reforming the same accordingly, redressing and amending all that he findes amisse, untill he have brought it to a better state, shall receive some profit by that reproving and reviling of his; otherwise it may both seeme (as it is no lesse indeed) a vaine and unprofitable thing. Commonly men cannot chuse but laugh at when they see either a bald-pate or a bunch-backe to taunt and scoffe at others for the same defects or deformities; and so in truth, it were a ridiculous thing and a meere mockerie, to blame or reproch another in that, for which he may be mocked and reproched himselfe. Thus Levi the Byzantine cut one home that was crumpe shouldered and bunch-backe, when he seemed to hit him in the teeth with his dimme and feeble eye-sight: *Doe*st thou twit me (quoth he) by any imperfection of nature incident unto a man, when as thy selfe art marked from heaven, and deriect the divine vengeance upon thy backe? Never then reprove thou an adulterer, if thy selfe be an uncleane wanton with boies; nor seeme thou to upbraid one with prodigality, if thou be a covetous miser thy selfe. Alcemon reviled Adrastus (upon a time) in this wise: Thou

*A sister hast by parents twaine,
Whose hands her husband deare haveaine.*

But what answered Adrastus? He objected not unto him the crime of another, but paict him home with his owne, after this manner:

*But thou thy selfe hast murdered
Thine owne kinde mother, who thee bred.*

In like sort, when Domitius (upon a time) seemed to reproch Craffus, saying: Is it not true, that when your lamprey was dead which was kept full deintily for you in a stew, you wept therefore? Craffus presently came upon him againe with this bitter reply: And is it not true, that you when you followed three wives of yours one after another to their funerall fire, never shed teare for the matter? It is not so requisite or necessarie iwis (as the vulgar sort doe thinke) that hee who checketh and rebuketh another, should have a ready wit of his owne, and a naturall gift in doing it, or a loud and big voice, or an audacious and bold face; no, but such an one he ought to be, that cannot be noted and taxed with any vice: for it should seeme that Apollo addressed this precept of his [Know thy selfe] to no person so much as to him who would blame and finde fault with another; for feare lest such men, in speaking to others what they would, heare that againe which they would not. For it happeneth ordinarily as Sophocles saith: That such an one

*Who lets his tongue runne foolishly,
In noting others bitterly,
Shall heare himselfe (unwillingly)
The words he gave so wisely.*

Lo what commoditie and profit ensueth upon reproching an enemy.

Neither commeth there lesse good and advantage unto a man by being reproched by another, and hearing himselfe reviled by his enemies: and therefore it was well and truly saide of Antisthenes, that such men as would be saved and become honest, another day ought of necessity to have either good friends, or most spitefull and bitter enemies: for as they with their kind remonstrances and admonitions; so these with their reprochfull tearmes were like to reforme their sinfull life. But forasmuch as amity and friendship nowadaies speaketh with a small and low voice when faults should freely be reprovved, and is very audible and full of words in flattering, altogether mute and dumbe in rebukes and chastisements; but what remaineth now but that we should heare the truth from the mouth of our enemies? much like unto Telephus, who for default of a physician that was a friend to cure him, was forced to commit his wound or ulcer to the iron head of his enemies: speare for to be healed; and even so those that have no well willers that dare freely reprove their faults, must perforce endure with patience the stinging tongue of their enemies and evill willer in chastising and rebuking their vices, not regarding so much the intent and meaning of the ill speaker, as the thing it selfe, and the matter that he speaketh; and looke how he who enterprised the killing of Prometheus the Thessallian, ran him so deepe with his sword into the impostume or swelling borch which he had about him, that he le forth the corruption, and saved his life by the breaking and issue thereof; even so for all the world it falleth out many times, that a reprochfull speech delivered in anger or upon evill will is the cause of healing some maladie of the soule, either hidden or unknowne altogether, or else neglected; but the most part of those who are in this manner reproched, never consider whether the vice wherewith they are touched be in them or no, but they looke rather if they can finde some other vice to object unto him, who hath thus challenged them; and much like untid wrestlers, they never wipe away their owne dust, that is to say, the reproches that be fastned upon themselves, and wherewith they be defamed, but they bestrew one another with dust, and afterwards trip up one anothers heeles, and tumble downe one upon another, weltering in the same, and loiling one another therewith: whereas indeed it behooved rather that a man which he findeth himselfe tainted by his enemy, to endeavour for to do away that vice wherewith he is noted and defamed, much rather than to fetch out any spot or steine out of his garment, which hath bene shewed him: and although there be charged upon us some slanderous imputation that is not true; yet nevertheless we are to search into the occasion whereupon such an opprobrious speech might arise and proceed, yea and take heed we must and feare, lest ere we be aware we commit the like or come neere unto that which hath bene objected unto us. Thus for example sake Lacydes king of the Argives, for that hee did weare his haire curiously set, in manner of a peruke, and because his gate or maner of going, seemed more delicate and nice than ordinary, grew into an ill name and obloquy of effeminate wantonnesse. And Pompeius the great could not avoid the like suspition, because he used otherwhiles to scratch his head with one finger onely, and yet otherwise he was so farre from feminine wantonnesse and incontinence as any man in the world. Craffus was accused for to have had carnall company with one of the religious nuns or votaries of Pesta, for that being desirous to purchase of her a faire peece of land and house of pleasure which he had, he resorted oftentimes privately unto her, spake with her apart, and perhaps made court unto her for to have her good wil in that respect onely. Posthumia likewise another vestall virgin, for that she was given much to laugh upon a small occasion, and withall would not sticke to enterteine talke with men, more boldly peradventure than became a maiden of her profession, was so deeply suspected of incontinence, that she was brought judicially into question about it, howbeit found unguilty, and acquit the was; but when Spurium Alutium the high-priest for the time being, affoiled her and pronounced the sentence of her absolution, minding to dismishe her of the court; he gave her a gentle admonition by the way, that from thence forward she should forbear to use any words lesse modest & chaste then the cariage of her life was. Themistocles likewise notwithstanding he was most innocent indeed, was called into question for treason, because he entertained amitie with Perseus, sent and wrote oftentimes unto him, and so by that meanes gave suspition that he minded to betray all Greece. When as therefore thou art charged with a false crimination by thine enemy, thou must not neglect it and make final account thereof because it is not true, but rather looke about thee and examine what hath bene done or said, either by thee or any one of those who affect and love thee, or converse with thee, founding and tending any way to so that imputation which might give occasion or likelihood thereof, and carefully to beware and avoid the same: for if by adverse and heavy fortune whereunto others have inconsiderately fallen, they are deere taught what is good for them, as Alceop saith in one tragedie:

*Fortune hath taken for her salary,
My dearest goods of which I am bereft,
But we she taught by this great misery
For to be wise, and lest she hath misleft.*

What

What should let or hinder us, but that we may learne by a master that costeth us nought, nor taketh nothing for his teaching (even our enemies) to profit and learne somewhat that we knew not before? for an enemy perceiveth and findeth in us many things more than a friend, by reason that (as Plato saith) That which loveth is alwaies blinde in the thing that is loved; whereas he who hateth us, besides that he is very curious and inquisitive into our imperfections, he is not meale mouthed (as they say) nor will spare to speake, but is ready enough to divulge and blab all abroad. King Hierax chanced upon a time being at words with one of his enemies, so he told in reprochfull manner by him of his stinking breath; whereupon being somewhat dismained in himselfe, he was no sooner returned home to his owne house, but he chid his wife: How comes this to passe (quoth he?) what say you to it? how hapneth it that you never told me of it? she the woman being a simple, chaste, & harmlesse dame; Sir (saith she) I had thought all mens breath had smelled so. Thus it is plaine, that such faults as be object and evident to the senses, grosse and corporall, or otherwise notorious to the world, we know by our enemies sooner than by our friends and familiars.

Over and besides, as touching the continence and holding of the tongue, which is not the least point of vertue, it is not possible for a man to rule it alwaies, and bring it within the compass and obedience of reason, unless by use and exercise, by long custome and painfull labour he have tamed and mastered the worst passions of the soule, such as anger is: for a word that hath escaped us against our willes, which we would gladly have kept in; of which, Homer saith thus:

*Out of the mouth a word did fly
For all the range of teeth fast-by.*

And a speech that we let fall at adventure (a thing hapning often-times, and especially unto those whose spirits are not well exercised, and who want experience, who runne out, as it were, and breake forth into passions) this (I say) is ordinary with such as be hastic and cholericke, whose judgement is not seised and staid, or who are given to a licentious course of life: for such a word, being (as divine Plato saith) the lightest thing in the world, both gods and men have many a time paid a most grievous and heavey penalty; whereas Silence is not only (as Hippocrates saith) good against thirst, but also is never called to account, nor amerced to pay any fine; and that which more is, in the bearing and putting up of taunts and reproches, there is observed in it a kinde of gravitie becoming the person of Socrates, or rather the magnanimity of Hercules, if it be true that the Poet said of him:

Of bitter words he lesse account did make Than death he feare, which no regard doth take.

Neither verily is there a thing of greater gravitie, or simply better, than to heare a malicious enemy to revile, and yet not to be moved nor grow into passions therewith,

*But to passe by a man that loves to raile,
As rocke in sea, by which we swimme or saile.*

Moreover, a greater effect will ensue upon this exercise of patience, if thou canst accustomethy selfe to heare with silence thine enemy whiles he doth revile; for being acquainted therewith, thou shalt the better endure the violent fits of a curst and threwd wife chiding at home; to heare also without trouble the sharpe words of friend or brother; and if it chance that father or mother let thee bitter rebukes at thee or beat thee, thou wilt suffer all, and never shew thy selfe displeased and angrie with them. For Socrates was wont to abide at home Xanthippe his wife, a peevish shrewd woman and hard to be pleased, to the end that he might with more ease converse with others, being used to endure her curtnesse. But much better it were for a man to come with a minde prepared and exercised before-hand with hearing the scoffes, railing language, and grie taunts; outrageous and foule words of enemies and strangers, and that without anger and shew of disquietnesse, than of his domestical people within his owne house. Thus you see how a man may shew his meeknesse and patience in enmities; and as for simplicity, magnanimity, and a good nature in deed, it is more seene here than in friendship: for it is not so honest and commendable to do good unto a friend, as dishonest, not to succour him when he standeth in need and requesteth it.

Moreover, to forbear to be revenged of an enemy if opportunitie and occasion is offered, and to let him goe when he is in thy hands, is a point of great humanitie and courtesie; but him that hath compassion of him when he is fallen into adversity, succor him in distresse, at his request quest is ready for to shew good will to his children, and an affection to susteine the state of his house and familie being in affliction; whosoever doth not love for this kindnesse, nor praise the goodnesse of his nature.

*Of colour blacke (no doubt) and tincture swart,
Wrongs of stiffe Steele or yron he hath an heart,
Or rather forg'd out of the Diamant,
Which will not stirre heret, nor once relent.*

Cesar commanded that the statues erected in the honour of Pompeius, which had bene beaten downe and overthrown, should be set up againe; for which act Cicero said thus unto him: In rearing the images of Pompeius, O Cesar, thou hast pitched and erected thine owne. And therefore we ought not to be sparing of praise and honour in the behalfe of an enemy especially when he deserveth the same; for by this meanes the partie that praiseth shall winne the greater praise himselfe; and besides, if it happen againe that he blame the said enemy, his accusation shall be the better taken, and carie the more credit, for that he shall be thought not so much to hate the person as disallow and mislike his action.

But the most profitablie and goodliest matter of all, is this: That he who is accustomed to praise his enemies, and neither to grieve or envie at their well-fare, shall the better abide the prosperitie of his friend, and be furthest off from envying his familiars in any good successe or honour that by well-doing they have achieved. And is there any other exercise in the world, that can bring greater profit unto our soules, or worke a better disposition and habit in them, than that which riddeeth us of emulation and the humour of envie? For like as in a city, wherein there be many things necessarie, though otherwise simply evill, after they have once taken sure footing, and are by custome established in manner of a law, men shall hardly remove and abolish, although they have bene hurt and endamaged thereby; even so enmity, together with hatred and malice, bringeth in envie, jealousie, contentment and pleasure in the harme of an enemy, remembrance of wrongs received, and offences passed, which it leaveth behinde in the soule, when it selfe is gone; over and besides, cunning practises, fraud, guile, deceit, and secret for-layings or ambushes, which seeme against our enemies nothing ill at all, nor unjustly used, after they be once seised and have taken root in our hearts, remaine there fast, and hardly or un-neth are removed; insomuch as if men take not heed how they use them against enemies, they shall be so inured to them that they will be ready afterwards to practise the same with their verie friends. If therefore Pythagoras did well & wisely in acquainting his scholars to forbear cruelty and injustice, even as farre as to dumb and brute beasts; whereupon he misliked fowlers, and would request them to let those birdes die againe which they had caught; yea and buy of fishers whole draughts of fishes, and give order unto his disciples to put them alive into the water againe, insomuch as hee expressely forbad the killing of any tame beast whatsoever; certes it is much more grave and decent, that in quarrells, debates, and contentions among men; an enemy that is of a generous minde, just, true, and nothing treacherous, should repell, keepe downe, and hold underfoot the wicked, malicious, cautelous, base, and ungentleman-like passions; to the end that afterwards in all contracts and dealings with his friend they breake not out, but that his heart being cleere of them, he may abstaine from all mischievous practises. Scannius was a professed enemy and an accuser of Domitius judicially; now there was a domestical servant belonging to the said Domitius, who before the day of trial and judgement, came unto Scannius saying, That he would discover unto him a thing that he knew not of, the which might serve him in good steed when he should plead against his master; but Scannius would not so much as give him the hearing; nay he laid hold on the party, and sent him away bound unto his lord and master; Cato (the younger) charged Murana, and indicted him in open court for popularitie and ambition, and declaring against him that he sought indirectly to gaine the peoples favour and their voices to be chosen Consul; now as he went up and downe to collect arguments and proofes thereof, and according to the manner and custome of the Romanes, was attended upon by certaine persons who followed him in the behalfe of the defendant, to observe what was done for his better instruction in the proceesse & suit commenced; these fellows would oftentimes be in hand with him and aske whether he would to day search for ought, or negotiate any thing in the matter and cause concerning Murana? If he said, No; such credite and trust they reposed in the man that they would rest in that answer, and go their waies; a singular argument this was of all other to prove his reputation, and what opinion men conceived of him for his justice; but sure a farre greater testimonie is this, and that passeth al the rest, to proove that if we be accustomed to deale justly by our very enemies, we shal never shew our selves unjust, cautelous, and deceitfull with our friends. But forasmuch as every lake (as Simonides was wont to say) must needs have a cop or crest growing upon her head; and so likewise all men by nature do carie in their head I wot not what jealousie, emulation, and envie, which is if I may use the words of Pindarus,

A mate and fellow (to be plaine)

Of brain-sicke fooles and persons vaine.

A man should not reape a small benefit & commoditie by discharging these passions upon his enemies, to purge & cleanse himselfe quite thereof, & as it were by certene gutters or channells, to derive and drein them as farre as possibly he can from his friends and familiar acquaintances, whereof I suppose Onomademus a great politician, & wise Statel-man in the Isle Chios was well advised, who in a civile dissention being sided to that faction which was superior, & had gotten the head of the other; coulselled the rest of his part not to chafe & banish out of the city al their adversaries, but to leave some of them still behind: For feare (quoth he) least having no enemies to quarrel withall, we our selves begin to fall out and go together by the eares; semblably if we spend these vicious passions of ours upon our enemies, the lesse are they like to trouble & molest our friends: for it ought not thus to be as Hesiodus saith: That the potter should envy the potter, or one minstrell or musician spite another; neither is it necessarie that one neighbor should be in jealousie of another; or cousins and brethren be concurrents & have emulation one at another, either striving to be rich or speeding better in their affaires: for if there be no other way or meanes to be delivered wholly from contentions, envies, jealousies, & emulations, acquaint thy selfe at leastwise to be stung and bitten at the good successe of thine enemies; whet the edge & sharpen the point (as it were) of thy quarrelous & contentious humour, & turne it upon them and spare not: for like as the most skilfull and best gardeners are of this opinion, that they shall have the sweeter roses and more pleasant violets, if they set garlick or fow onions neere unto them, for that all the strong and stinking favour in the juice that feedeth and nourish the saide flowers, is purged away and goeth to the saide garlick and onions; even so an enemie drawing unto himselfe and receiving all our envie and malice, will cause us to be better affected to our friends in their prosperitie, and lesse offended if they out-go us in their estate; and therefore in this regard we must contend and strive with our enemies about honour, dignities, government, and lawfull meanes of advancing our owne estates, and not onely to be grieved and vexed to see them have the better and the vantage of us, but also to marke and observe everie thing whereby they become our superiors, and so to straine and endeavour by carefull diligence, by labour and travell, by parsimonie, temperance, and looking neerely to our selves, to surpasse and go beyond them; like as Themistocles was wont to say: That the victorie which Miltiades achieved in the plaine of Marathon brake his sleepes, and would not let him take his nights rest: for he who thinketh that his enemie surmounteth him in dignities, in patronage of high matters and pleading of great causes, in management of state affaires, or in credit and authoritie with mightie men and grand Segniors, and in stead of striving to enterprise and do some great matter by way of emulation, betaketh himselfe to envie onely, and so sits still doing nothing, and looseth all his courage, surely he bewraith that he is possessed with naught else but an idle, vaine, & enervat kind of envy. But he that is not blinded with the regard & sight of him whom he hateth, but with a right & just eie, doth behold & consider al his life, his maners, descensions, words and deeds, shall soone perceive & find that the most part of those things which he envieth were achieved and gotten by such as have them, which their diligence, wisdom, foresight & vertuous deeds: he thereupon bending all his spirits & whole mind therto, wil exercise (I trow) & sharpen his owne desire of honor, glory & honesty, yea & cut off contrariwise, that yawning drowlines & idle loth that is in his hart. Set safe moreover, that our enemies by flattery, by cautelous shifts & cunning practises, by pleading of causes at the bar, or by their mercenarie and illiberall service in dishonest & foule matters, seem to have gotten some power, ether with princes in courts, or with the people in States & cities; let the same never trouble us, but contrariwise cheere up our harts and make us glad in regard of our owne libertie, the purenesse of our life and innocencie unreachible, which we may oppose against those indirect courses and unlawfull meanes. For all the gold that is either above ground or underneath (according as Plato saith) is not able to weigh against vertue. And evermore this sentence of Solon we ought to have in readines:

Many a wicked man is rich;

And vertuous men are many poore:

*But change we never will with such Nor give our goodnesse for their store,
And why? vertue is durable, much lesse then, will we exchange the acclamations and shouts of a popular multitude in theaters, which are woon with a feast; nor the honors and prerogatives to sit uppermost at a table neere unto the chamberlaines, minions, favorites, concubines, or lieutenants generall of Kings and Princes. For nothing is desireable, nothing to be affected, nothing indeed honest that proceedeth from an dishonest cause: But he that loveth (according as Plato saith) is alwaies blinded by the thing which is loved, and sooner do we perceive and marke any unseemly thing that our enemies doe. Howbeit to conclude, neither our joy and contentment conceived by observing them to do amisse, nor our griefe and displeasure in seeing them do well, ought to be idle & unprofitable unto us; but this reckoning and account we are to make of both; that in taking heed how we fall into their faults we may become better, and in imitating their good parts not worse than they.

HOW A MAN MAY PER- CEIVE HIS OWNE PROCEE- DING AND GOING FORWARD IN VERTUE.

The Summarie.

Hercules can be defined, whether of these two extremities is more to be feared, to wit, blockish stupidity or vaine presumption, considering the dangerous effects proceeding as well from the one as the other. And contrariwise, an excellent master it is to be able for to teach menthe means to avoid both extreames, and to hold the meane betwene. And this is the verie thing that our Author doth in this present treatise: for as he laboureth to disrobe as it were the lovers of vertue and turne them out of their habit of perverse ignorance, wherewith most part of the world is alwaies clad; so he is desirous to keep them from putting on the habilliment and garment of pride and vaine ostentation, that they might be arrayed with the apparell of vertue, in such sort that in taking knowledge of that good whereof they have already some part, they might endeavour and do what they can to get a greater portion from day to day, until they come unto an assured contentment wherein they may rest. Then teacheth he how to know what a man hath profited in the schoole and exercise of vertue, shewing that he ought to consider first, whether he recule from vice by little and little; wherein he consulteth the opinion of the Stoicks, who imagined that no man was good, unless he became vertuous all at once. This done, he adjoineth foure rules to know the said profit and progresse in vertue, to wit, When we perceive our heart to tend unto good without any intermission: When our affection redemeth and regaineth the time that is lost, growing so much the more, as it was before stained and hindred: When we begin to take our whole pleasure and delight therein: lastly, When we surmount and overcome all impeachments that might turne us aside out of the way of vertue. After all this, he entreth unto the master more specially, and sheweth how a man is to employ himselfe in the studie of wisdom; what vices he ought to flee; wherein his mind and spirits should be occupied; and the profit that he is to reape and gather from Philosophers, Poets and Historians. Item, wit what affection we ought to speake in the presence of our neighbours, whether it be publicly or in private; of what sort our actions should be; and to what end and scope we are to adreffe and direct them, giving a lustre unto all these discourses by excellent similitudes; taxing and reprooving the faults committed ordinarily by them who make a certaine semblance and outward shew shew of aspiring unto vertue. Having thus discoursed of these points aforesaid, he propoeth and setteth downe againe diuers rules which may resolue us in this advancement and proceeding forward of ours in godnesse, namely: That we ought to loue reprehensions; to take heed even unto our dreames; to examine our passions, and so to hope well, if we perceiue that they waxe milde and gentle to imitate good things; in no wise to heare any speech of euill; to take example by the best persons, to reioice and be glad, to haue witnesses and beholders of our good will and intentions; and not to esteeme any times irreparable small, but to auoide and shun them all: last of all, he closeth up his treatise with an elegant similitude, wherein he discovereth and laith open the nature as well of the vicious as the vertuous; thereby to make the meanes of aspiring and attaining unto vertue, so much the more amiable to each person.

HOW A MAN MAY PER- ceive his owne proceeding and going forward in Vertue.

It is not possible (my good friend Sofista Senecio) that a man by any meanes should haue a feeling in himselfe, and a conscience of his owne amendment and progresse in vertue, if those good proceedings do not daily make some diminution of his follie, but that the vice in him weighing in equall ballance against them all, doe holde him downe

*Like as the lead plucks downe the net,
Which for to catch the fish was set.*

For so verily in the art of Musicke or Grammar, a man shall neuer know how farre he is proceeded, so long as in the studying and learning thereof, he diminish no part of his ignorance in those arts, but still findeth himselfe as unmusically and unlettered as he was before; neither the cure which the Physician emploiech about his patient, if it worke no amendment at all, nor alleviation of the disease seeming in some sort to yeeld unto medicines and to slake, can procure any sensible difference and change unto a better state, before that the contrary disposition and habit be restored perfectly to the former health, and the body made found and strong againe. But certainly, as in these cases there is no amendment to be accounted of, if those that seeme to amend do not perceive the change by the diminution and remission of that which weighed them downe, and finde themselves to encline and bend (as it were) in a ballance to the contrary; even so it fareth with those that make profession of philosophie; it can not be granted that there is any progresse or sense at all of profiting, so long as the soule cast not off by little and little, and purge away her folly, but until such time as shee can attaine (forsooth) unto the soveraigne and perfect good, continueth in the meane while fully possessed of vice and sinne in the highest degree; for by this meanes it would follow, if at one instant and moment of time a wise man should passe from extreme wickednes unto the supreme and highest disposition of vertue: That he had all at once and in the minute of an houre shed vice and cast it from him fully, whereof in a long time before he was not able to be rid of one little portion. But you know full well already that those who holde such extravagant opinions as these, make themselves worke enough, and raise great doubts and questions about this point, namely, How a man should not perceive and feele himselfe when he is become wise, and be either ignorant or doubtfull that this growth and increase commeth in long processe of time by little and a little, partly by addition of some thing, and partly by subtraction of other, until one arrive gently unto vertue, before he can perceive that he is going toward it. Now if there were so quicke and sudden a mutation, as that he who was to day morning most vicious, should become in the evening as vertuous; and if there ever were known to happen unto any man such a change, that going to bed a very foole and so sleeping, should awake and rise a wise man, and taking his leave of yesterdaies follies, errors and deceits, say unto them:

*My vaine lying dreames so vaine, a day, aday,
Nought worth you were, I now both see and say.*

Is it possible that such a one (I say) should be ignorant of this sudden change, and not perceive to great a difference in himselfe, nor feele how wisdom all at once hath thus lightened and illuminated

illuminated his soule? for mine owne part, I would rather thinke that one upon earnest prayer transformed by the power of the gods from a woman to a man (as the tale goes of Ceneu) should be ignorant of this Metamorphosis, than he who of a coward, a foole and a dissolute or loose person become hardie, wise, sober and temperate; or being transported from a sensuall and beastly life unto a divine and heavenly life, should not marke the very instant wherein such a change did befall. But well it was said in olde time: That the stone is to be applied and framed unto the rule, and not the rule or squire unto the stone. And they (the Stoicks I meane) who are not willing to accommodat their opinions unto the things indeed, but wrest and force against the course of nature, things unto their owne conceits and suppositions, have filled all philosophie with great difficulties and doubtfull ambiguities; of which this is the greatest: In that they will seeme to comprise all men, excepting him onely whom they imagine perfect, under one and the same vice in general: which strange supposition of theirs hath caused that this progresse and proceeding to vertue, called Uegium, seemeth to be a darke and obscure riddle unto them, or a meere fiction little wanting of extreme follie; and those who by the meanes of this amendment be delivered from all passions and vices that be, are held thereby to be in no better state, nor lesse wretched and miserable, than those who are not free from any one of the most enormous vices in the world; and yet they refuse and condemne their owne selves; for in the disputations which they holde in their schooles, they set the iniustice of Aristides in equall ballance to that of Phalaris; they make the cowardice and feare of Brasidas, all one with that of Dolon; yea, and compare the follie or error of Melinus and Plato together, as in no respect different; howbeit, in the whole course of their life, and management of their affaires, they decline and avoid those as implacable and intractable; but these they use and trust in their most important businesse, as persons of great worth and regard: but we who know and see that in every kinde of sinne or vice, but principally in the inordinate and confused state of the soule there be degrees according to more or lesse; and that heerein differ our proceedings and amendments, according as reason by little and little doth illuminate, purge and cleanse the soule in abating and diminishing evemore the viscositie thereof, which is the shadow that darkeneth it, are likewise fully persuaded that it is not without reason to be assured, that men may have an evident sense and perceivance of this mutation, but as if they were raised out of some deepe and darke pit, that the same amendment may be reckoned by degrees in what order it goeth forward. In which computation we may goe first and foremost directly after this maner, and consider, whether like as they who under saile set their course in the maine and vast ocean, by observing together with the length and space of time, the force of the winde that driveth them, doe cast and measure how farre they have gone forward in their voyage, namely, by a probable conjecture how much in such a time and with such a gale of winde it is like that they may passe; so also in philosophie a man may give a gesse and conjecture of his proceeding and going forward, namely, what he may gaine by continuall marching on still, without stay or intermission otherwhiles in the mids of the way, and then beginning a fresh againe to leape forward, but alwaies keeping one pace, gaining and getting ground still by the guidance of reason. For this rule

If little still to live thou do ad,

A shape at length, and mickle will be had.

was not given respectively to the encrease of summes of money alone, and in that point truly spoken, but it may likewise extend and reach to other things, and namely to the augmentation of vertue, to wit, when with reason and doctrine continuall life and custome is joyned, which maketh maistrise and is effectual to bring any worke to end and perfection; whereas these intermissions at times without order and equalitie, and these coole affections of those that studie philosophie, make not onely many staies and lets in proceeding forward as it were in a journey, but that which is worse, cause going backward, by reason that vice which evermore lies in wait to set upon a man that idly standeth still never so little haleth him a contrary way. True it is that the Mathematicians do call the planets Stationarie, and say they stand still, while they cease to moove forward; but in our progresse and proceeding in philosophie, that is to say, in the correction of our life and maners, there can be admitted no intervall, no pause or cessation, for that our wit naturally being in perpetual motion in maner of a ballance, alwaies casteth with the least thing that is, one way or other, willing of it selfe either to encline with the better or else is forcibly caried by the contrary to the worse. If then according to the oracle delivered unto the inhabitants of Corinthus, which willed them if they minded afterwards to live in peace, they should make war both night and day without intermission; thou finde in thy selfe, and

thine owne confidence, that thou hast fought continually with vice as well by night as by day, or at leastwise that thou hast not often left thy ward, and abandoned thy station in the garrison, nor continually admitted the heralds or messengers from comming from far as it were to palle and compound, to wit, pleasures, delights, negligences, and amusements upon other matters, by all likelihood thou maist with confidence and alacritie be assured to go forward and make an end of thy course behind.

Moreover, say that there fall out some interruptions and staies betweene, that thou live not altogether canonically and like a philosopher, yet if thy latter proceedings be more constant than the former, and the fresh courses that thou takest longer than the other, it is no bad signe, but it testifieth, that by labour and exercise idleness is conquered, and sloth utterly chased away; whereas the contrary is a very ill signe, to wit, if by reason of many cessations and those comming thicke one after another, the heat of the former affection be cooled, languish and weareth to nothing: for like as the shoote of a cane or reed whiles it hath the full strength and greatest force, putteth forth the first stem reaching out in length, streight, even, smooth, & united in the beginning, admitting few knots in great distances between, to stay and put backe the growth and rising thereof in height; but afterwards as if it were checked to mount up aloft by reason of short winde and failing of the breath, it is held downe by many knots, and those neere one to another, as if the spirit therein which covereth upward found some impeachment by the way, smiting it backe, and causing it as it were to pant and tremble; even so as many as at first tooke long courses, and made haste unto philosophie or amendment of life, and then afterwards meet with stumbling blocks, continually turning them out of the direct way, or other meanes to distract and plucke them aside, finding no proceeding at all to better them, in the end are wearie, give over, & come short of their journeyes end; whereas the other above-said hath his wings growing still to helpe his flight, and by reason of the fruit which he findeth in his course goeth on apace, cutteth off all pretences of excuse, breaketh through all lets, (which stand as a multitude in the way to hinder his passage) which he doth by fine force and with an industrious affection to attaine unto the end of his enterprise. And like as to joy and delight in beholding of beautie present is not a signe of love beginning, for a vulgar and common thing this is, but rather to be grieved & vexed when the same is gone or taken away; even so many there be who conceive pleasure in philosophie, and make semblance as if they had a fervent desire to the studie thereof; but if it chance that they be a little retired from it by occasion of other businesse and affaires, that first affection which they tooke unto it vanisheth away, and they can well abide to be without Philosophie;

*But he who feeleth indeed the pricke
Of love that pierceth neerer be quicke.*

as one poet saith; will seeme unto thee moderate, and nothing hot in frequenting the philosophical schoole and conferring together with thee about philosophie; but let him be plucked from it, and drawn apart from thee, thou shalt see him enflamed in the love thereof, impatient, and weary of all other affaires and occupations; thou shalt perceive him even to forget his own friends, such a passionate desire he will have to philosophie. For we ought not so much to delight in learning and philosophie whiles we are in place, as we do in sweet odors, perfumes, and ointments, and when we are away and separated therefro, never grieve thereat, nor seeke after it any more; but it must imprint in our hearts a certaine passion like to hunger and thirst when it is taken from us, if we will profit in good earnest & perceive our owne progresse and amendement; whether it be, that marriage, riches, some friendship, expedition or warfare come between, that may drave him away and make separation, for the greater that the fruit is which he gathered by Philosophie, so much the more will the griefe be to leave and forgoe it. To this first signe of progresse in Philosophie may be added another of great antiquitie out of Hesiodus; which if it be not the verie same, certes it commeth neere unto it, and this he describeth after this sort, namely, VVhen a man findeth the way no more difficult, rough & craggy, nor exceeding steep & upright, but easie, plaine, with a gentle descent, as being indeed laid even and smooth by exercise, and wherein now there begins light cleerely to appeere and shine out of darkenes, in stead of doubts, ambiguities, errors, and those repentances and changes of minde, incident unto those who first betake themselves to the studie of Philosophie; after the manner of them who having left behinde them a land which they know well enough, are troubled whiles they cannot descrite and discover that for which they set saile and bend their course; for even so it is with these persons, who when they have abandoned these common and familiar studies whereto they were inured

ured before they came, to learne, apprehend and enjoy better, oftentimes in the verie middle of their course are caried round about and driven to returne backe againe the same way they came. Like as it is reported of Sextus a noble man of Rome, who having given over the honorable offices and magistracies in the citie, for love of Philosophie, afterwards finding himselfe much troubled in that studie, and not able at the beginning to brooke and digest the reasons and discourses thereof, was so perplexed, that he went verie neere to have throwen himselfe into the sea out of a gallee.

The semblable example we read in histories, of Diogenes the Sinopian, when he first went to the studie and profession of Philosophie: for when about the same time it chanced that the Athenians celebrated a publike solemnitie with great feasting and sumptuous fare, with theatri-call plaies and pastimes, meeting in companies and assemblies to make merrie one with another, with revels and daunces all night long, himselfe in an odde corner of the market place lay lapped round in his cloathes, purposing to take a nap and sleepe; where and when he fell into certain fantasticall imaginations which did not a little turne and trouble his braines, yea and brake his heart, discouraging thus in his head: That he upon no constraint or necessitie, should thus wilfully betake himselfe to a laborious & strange course of painful life, sitting thus by himselfe moping, sequestred from all the world, & deprived of all earthly goods; In which thoughts and conceits of his, he spied (as the report goeth) a little mouse creeping & running towards the crums that were fallen from his lofe of bread, and was verie busie about them, whereupon hee tooke heart againe, reprooved and blamed his owne feeble courage, saying thus to himselfe: What saiest thou Diogenes? Seest thou not this sillie creature what good cheere it maketh with thy leavings? how merrie she is whiles she feedeth thereupon? and thou (like a trim man indeed as thou art) dost waile, weepe and lament, that thou drinkest not thy selfe drunke as those doe yonder; nor lie in soft and delicate beds, richly set out with gay and costly furniture. Now when such temptations and distractions as these be, returne not often, but the rule and discourse of reason presently riseth up against them, maketh head, turneth upon them suddenly againe (as it were) in the chace and pursued in the route by enemies, and so quickly discomfited and dispatched the anxietie and dispaire of the minde, then a man may be assured that he hath profited indeed in the schoole of Philosophie, and is well seled and confirmed therein. But forasmuch as the occasions which doe thus shake men that are given to Philosophie, yea and otherwhiles plucke them a contrarie way, doe not onely proceed from themselves by reason of their owne iniquitie and so gather strength; but the sad and serious counsels also of friends, together with the reprooves and contradictorie assaults made upon them by adversaries, betweene good earnest and game, doe mollifie their tender hearts, and make them to bow, bend and yeeld, which otherwhiles have beene able in the end to drive some altogether from Philosophie, who were well entred therein: It may be thought no small signe of good proceeding, if one can endure the same meekly without being mooved with such temptations, or any waies troubled and pinched when hee shall heare the names and surnames of such and such companions and equals otherwise of his, who are come to great credit and wealth in Princes courts; or be advanced by marriages, matching with wives who brought them good dowries & portions; or who are wont to go into the common Hall of a citie, attended upon and accompanied with a traine and troupe of the multitude, either to attaine unto some place of government, or to plead some notable cause of great consequence: for he that is not disquieted, astonished, or overcome with such assaults; certaine it is and we may be bold to conclude that he is arrested (as it were) and held sure as he ought to be by Philosophie. For it is not possible for any to cease affecting and loving those things, which the multitude doth so highly honor and adore, unless they be such as admire nothing else in the world but vertue. For to brave it out, to contest, and make head against men, is a thing incident unto some by occasion of choler, unto others by reason of folly; but to contemne and despise, that which others esteeme with admiration, no man is able to performe, so without a great measure of true and resolute magnanimitie: In which respect such persons comparing their state with others magnifie themselves, as Solon did in these words:

*Many a wicke man is rich,
And good men there be many poore:
But we will not exchange with rich,
Nor give our goodnes for their store.
For vertue is durable,
Whereas riches be mutable.*

And Diogenes compared his peregrination and flitting from the city of Corinth to Athens; and againe his removing from Thebes to Corinth, unto the progresses and changes of abode that the great king of Persia was wont to make; who in the Spring season held his Court at Susa in Winter, kept house at Babylon and during Summer, passed the time and sojourned in Media. Aeschylus hearing upon a time the said king of Persia to be named, The great king: And why (quoth he) is he greater than my selfe? unless it be that he is more just and righteous. And Aristotle writing unto Antipater as touching Alexander the great, said: That it became not him only to vaunt much and glorifie himselfe for that his dominions were so great; but also any man els hath no lesse cause who is instructed in the true knowledge of the gods. And Zeno seeing Thales flourish in great admiration because he had many scholars: Indeed (quoth he) his auditory or quite is greater than mine, but mine accordeth better and makes sweeter harmonie than his. Which as therefore thou hast so grounded and established in thine heart that affection unto vertue, which is able to encounter and stand against all externall things, when thou hast voided out of thy soule all envies, jealousies, and what affections soever are wont either to tickle or to fret, or otherwise to deprelle and cast downe the minds of many that have begunne to professe philosophie; this may serve for a great argument and token that thou art well advanced forward; and hast profited much; neither is it a small signe thereof, if thou perceive thy language to be changed from that it was wont to be; for all those who are newly entred into the schoole of philosophie (to speake generally) affect a kinde of speech or stile which aimeth at glory and vaine ostentation: some you shall heare crowing aloud like cocks and mounting up aloft, by reason of their levity and haughty humour, unto the sublimity and splendor of physycall things or secrets in nature; others take pleasure (after the maner of wanton whelps, as Plato saith) in tugging and tearing evermore whatsoever they can catch or light upon; they love to be doing with litigious questions, they goe directly to darke problemes and sophistical subtilties; and most of them being once plunged in the quillits & quiddities of Logicke, make that (as it were) a means or preparative to flesh themselves for Sophistrie: many there be, who goe all about collecting and gathering together sententious sawes and histories of ancient times; and as Anaxarxis was wont to say: That he knew no other use that the Greeks had of their coined pieces of money, but to tell and number them, or els to cast account and reckon therewith; even so do they nothing els but count and measure their notable sentences and sayings, without drawing any profit or commodity out of them: and the same befallth unto them, which one of *Plato*s familiars applied unto his scholars by way of allusion to a speech of Asiphanes: this Antiphanes was wont to say in merriment: That there was a city in the world, whereas the words so soone as ever they were out of the mouth and pronounced, became frozen in the aire, by reason of the coldnesse of the place, and so when the heat of Summer came to thaw and melt the same, the inhabitants might heare the talke which had bene uttered and delivered in Winter; even so (quoth he) it is with many of those who come to heare Plato when they be young; for whatsoever he speaketh and readeth unto them, it is very long ere they understand the same, and hardly when they are become olde men: and even after the same sort it fareth with them above said, who stand thus affected universally unto Philosophie, untill their judgement being well feted and grown to a found resolution, begin to apprehend those things which may deeply imprint in the minde a morall affection and passion of love, yea, and to search and trace those speeches, whereof the tracts (as Aesop was wont to say) leade rather in, than out. For like as Sophocles said merrily upon a time, by way of derision: That he would fitt cut off the haughtie and stately invention of Aeschylus, and then abridge his affected, curious and artificiall disposition, and in the third place change the maner and forme of his elocution, which is most excellent, and fullest of sweet affections; even so, the students in Philosophie, when they shall perceive that they passe from orations exquisitely penned and framed: for ostentation in frequent and solemne assemblies, unto morall speeches, and those that touch the quicke, as well the milde and gentle motions, as the hote and violent passions of the minde, then begin they indeed to lay downe all pride and vanity, and profit truly in the schoole of Philosophie.

Consider then, not onely in reading the works of Philosophers, or in hearing their lectures, first and foremost, whether thou art not more attentive to the words than to the matter; or whether thou be not carried with a greater affection to those who deliver a more subtil and curious composition of sentences, than such as comprise profitable, commodious, substantiall & fleshy matters (if I may so say) but also in perusing Poemes, or taking in hand any history, observe well and take heed, that there escape thee not any one good sentence tending properly to the reformation

mation of manners or the alleviation of passions: for like as (according to Symonides) the bee setteth upon flowers for to sucke out of it the yellow honie, whereas others love onely their colour or pleasure sent, and neither care nor seeke for any thing els therewith; even so, when other men be conversant in Poemes for pleasure onely and pastime, thou finding and gathering somewhat out thereof woorth the noting, shalt seeme at the first sight to have some knowledge already thereof by a certaine custome and acquaintance with it, and a love taken unto it as a good thing and familiar unto thee. As for those that read the books of Plato and Xenophon, in no other regard but for the beautie of their gallant stile, seeking for nought els but for the purity of speech, and the very naturall Atticke language, as if they went to gather the thin dew or tender moss or downe of herbs; What will you say of such? but that they love physicke drugs, which have either a lovely colour or a pleasant finell onely; but otherwise the medicinable vertues thereof and properties either to purge the bodie or mitigate any paine, they neither desire to know nor are willing to use.

Moreover, such as are proceeded farther, yet profited more, have the skill and knowledge how to reape fruit not onely out of words (spoken or books written, but also to receive profit out of all sights, spectacles; and what things soever they see, gathering from thence whatsoever is fit and commodious for their purpose; as it is reported of Aeschylus and other such as he: For Aeschylus being upon a time at the Isthmian games, beheld the fight of the sword-fencers that fought at sharpe, and when one of the said champions had received a grievous wound, whereupon the whole theater set up a crie, he jogging one that was by him (named Ion of Chios) See you not (quoth he) what use and exercise is able to do? the partie himselfe that is hurt faith never a word, but the lookers on crie out. Brasides chanced among drie figs to light upon a fillee moulte that bit him by the finger, and when he had shaken her off and let her goe, said thus to himselfe: See how there is nothing so little and so feeble, but it is able to make shift and save it life, if it dare onely defend it selfe. Diogenes when he saw one make meanes to drinke out of the ball of his hand, cast away the dish or cuppe that hee carried in his budget. Loe, how attentive taking heed and continuall exercise maketh men ready and apt to marke, observe and learne from all things that make any way for their good. And this they may the rather doe when the joine wordes and deedes together, not onely in that sort (as Thucydides speaketh of) by meditating, and exercising themselves with the experience of present perils, but also against pleasures, quarrels, and altercations in judgements about defences of causes and magistracies; as making prooffe thereby of the opinions that they holde, or rather by carriage of themselves, teaching others what opinions they are to holde. For such as yet bee learners, and notwithstanding that, intermeddle in affaires like pragmaticall persons, spying how they may catch any thing out of philosophie, and goe therewith incontinently in maner of jugglers with their boxe, either into the common place and market, or into the schoole which young men frequent; or els to princes tables, there to let them abroad; we are not to thinke them philosophers; no more than those to be physicians, who only sell medicinable spices, drugs or compound confectiions; or to speake more properly, such a sophister or counterfeited philosopher as this, resemblth the bird that Homer describeth, which forsooth, so soone as he hath gotten any thing, carrieth it to his scholars (as the said bird doth in her mouth convey meat to her naked young ones that cannot fie)

And so himselfe he doth beguile

And thereby take much harme the while.

converting and distributing naught of all that which he hath gotten to his owne nourishment, nor so much as concocting and digesting the same: and therefore we ought of necessity to regard and consider well whether we use any discourse and place our words so, that for our selves they may do good; and in regard of others, make no shew of vaine-glorie nor ambitious desire to be knowne abroad, but onely of an intention rather to heare, or els to teach.

But principally we are to observe whether our wrangling humour and desire to be cavilling about questions disputable, be allaid in us or no, as also whether we have yet given over to devise reasons and arguments to assaile others; like as champions armed with hurlebats of tough leather about their armes and bials in their hands, to annoy their concurrents, taking more pleasure and delight to fell and astonish with one rap our adversarie, and so to lay him along on the earth, than to learne or teach him: for surely modestie, mildenesse and courtesie in this kinde will doe well; and when a man is not willing to enter into any conference or disputation, with a purpose to put downe and vanquish another, nor to breake out into fits of choler; nor having ving evicted his adversarie to be readie as they say to tread and trample him under foot, nor seeme displeased and discontent if himselfe have the foile and be put to the worke; be all good signes of one that hath sufficiently profited. And this shewed Aristippus very well upon a time when he was so hardly pressed and overlaid in a certaine disputation, that he knew not what answer to make presently unto his adversarie a jolly bold and audacious sophister; but otherwise a brainicke foole and without all judgement: for Aristippus seeing him to vaunt himselfe, puffed up with vaine glorie, that he had put him to a non plus: Well (quoth he) I see that for this time I go away with the worke, but surely when I am gone I will sleepe more foundly and quietly than you that have gotten the better. Moreover we may also proove and sound ourselves, whether we have profited or no, even whiles we speake in publicke place; namely, if neither upon the sight of a greater audience than we looked for, we shrinke not for feare and halfe heart, nor contrariwise be discouraged to see fewer come to heare our exercises than we hoped for; neither when we are to make a speech to the people, or before a great magistrate, we lesse the opportunitie thereof, for that we have not well premeditated thereof before, nor come provided of apt words to declare our mind, a thing that by report befell unto Demosthenes & Alcibiades: for Alcibiades as he was passing ingenious and inventive of matter, so he wanted audacitie, and was not so ready as some other to utter the same, but troubled oftentimes in his pleading and deliverie of it, insomuch as many times in the very mids of his oration he would be out and to seeke for a proper and fit terme to expresse the conception of his minde, or els to recover that word againe which was sliped and escaped out of his memorie. As for Homer he had such an opinion of his owne perfection, and his poetickall veine in the rest of all his worke, that he stucke not to set downe the very first verse of his poeme defective in measure, and not answerable to the rules of versifying. So much the rather therefore likely it is, that they who set nothing before their eyes, nor aime at ought els but vertue onely and honestie, will make use of the present occasion and the occurrence of affaires, fall out as they will, without regard of applause, hissing or any other noyse whatsoever in token of liking or disliking their speech.

Now every man ought to consider not onely his owne speeches, but also his actions, namely whether they carie with them more profit and sound trueth, than vaine pompe and ostentation; for if the true love indeed of young folke, man or woman, requireth no witnesses, but resteth in the private contentment & enjoying of their sweet delights, although the same were performed and their desires fully accomplished secretly betwene them without the privitie of any person: how much more credible is it that he who is enamoured of honestie and wisdom, using the company and fellowship familiarly of vertue by his actions; and enjoying the same, shall finde in himselfe without saying one word an exceeding great contentment; and demaund no other hearers or beholders but his owne conscience? For like as he was but a vaine foole who called unto his maid in the house and cried with a loud voice: Dionysia come and see I am not proud and vain glorious now as I was wont to be; even so hee that hath done some vertuous and commendable act, and then goes forth to tell it abroad and spread the fruit thereof in every place, certaine it is that such an one regards still outward vanities, and is caried with a covetous desire of vaine-glorie, neither hath he ever had as yet a true sight indeed and perfect vision of vertue, but onely a fantastickall dreame of her, imagining as hee lies asleepe, that hee seeth some wandring shadow and image thereof, and then afterward representeth thus unto his view that which he hath done, as a painted table to looke upon. Well then, it is the propertie of him that proceededeth in vertue, not onely when he hath bestowed something upon his friend, or done a good turne unto one of his familiars, for to make no words thereof; but also when hee hath given his voice justly, or delivered his opinion truly, among manie others that are unjust and untrue; or when he hath flatly denied the dishonest request, or stoutly crossed a bad motion of some rich man, great Lord or mightie Magistrate; or refused gifts and bribes; or proceeded so farre that being athirst in the night he hath not drunke at all; or hath refused to kisse a beautiful boy or faire maiden & turned away from them comming toward him as Agefilus did; to keepe al this to himselfe and say nothing: For such a one as is content to be proved and tried by his owne selfe, not setting light by that triall and judgement, but joying and taking delight in his conscience, as being a sufficient wimes and beholder, both of good things and commendable actions, sheweth that reason hath turned in, to lodge and keepe residence with him, that it hath taken deepe root there; and as Democritus saith: That he is well framed, and by custome brought to rejoyce and take pleasure in himselfe. And like as husbandmen are more glad and willing to see the eares of corn hang downe their heads, and bend toward the

the earth, than those who for their lightnes stand straight, upright, and staring aloft, for that they suppose such eares are emptie, or have liule or nothing in them, for all their faire shew; even so, among young men, students in Philosophie, they that have least in them of any weight, and be most voide, be those that are at the verie first most confident; set the greatest countenance; carrie the biggest port in their gate, and have the boldest face, shewing therein how full they are of pride in themselves, contempt of all others, and sparing of none: but afterwards as they begin to grow on and burnish, surmounting and filling themselves with the fruits indeed of reason and learning; then and never before they lay away these proude looks; then downe goes this vaine pride and outward ostentation. And like as we see in vessels, wherinto men use to powre in liquor, according to the quantitie and measure of the said liquor that goeth in, the aire which was there before flieth out; even so to the proportion of those good things which are certaine and true indeed, wherewith men are replenished, their vanitie giveth place, all their hypocritie vanisheth away, their swelling and puffing pride doth abate and fall, and giving over then to stand upon their goodly long beards and fine robes, they transerre the exercise of outward things into the minde and soule within, using the sharp bit of bitter reprehension principally against themselves. And as for others, they can finde in their hearts to devise, confesse, and talke with them more graciously and with greater countesse; the manner of Philosophie, and reputation of Philosophers, they do not usurpe nor take upon them, neither do they use it as their addition in former time; and if haply one of them by some other be called by that name, he will not answer to it; but if he be a young gentleman indeed, after a smiling and pleasant manner, yea and blushing withall for shame, he will say thus out of the Poet Homer:

I am no God nor heavenly light:

Why dost thou give to me their right?

For true it is as Aeschylus saith:

A dam'sell young if she have known,

And tasted man once carnally;

Her eie doth it bewray anon,

It sparkles fire suspiciously.

But a young man having truly tasted the profit and proceeding in Philosophie, hath these 30 signes following him, which the Poetesse Sappho setteth downe in these verses:

When I you see, what do I aile?

First suddenly my voice doth faile,

And then like fire a colour red,

Under my skinne doth run and spread.

It would do you good to view his settled & staied countenance, to behold the pleasant and sweet regard of his eie, and to heare him when he speaketh: for like as those who are professed in any confraternity of holy mysteries, at their first assembly & meeting together, hurry in tumultuous sort with great noyse, insomuch as they thrust and throng one another; but when they come to celebrate the divine service thereto belonging, and that the sacred reliques and ornaments are once shewed, they are verie attentive with reverent feare and devout silence; so, at the beginning of the studie of Philosophie, and in the verie entrie (as it were) of the gate that leadeth unto it, a man shall see much adoe, a foule stirre, great audaciousnes, insolencie, and jangling words more than enough; for that some there be, who would intrude themselves rudely, and thrust into the place violently, for the greedie desire they have to winne reputation and credit: but he that is once within and seeth the great light, as if the sanctuaries and sacred cabinets or tabernacles were set open, anon he putteth on another habit, and a divers countenance with silence and astonishment, he becometh humble, pliable and modest, readie to follow the discourse of reason and doctrine, no lesse than the direction of some god. To such as these, me thinks, I may do verie well to accommodate that speech which Menedemus sometime in mirth spake pleasantly: Many there be that faile to Athens (quoth he) for to goe to schoole there, who when they come first thither keeme * Sophi, that is, be wise, and afterwards proove * Philosophi, that is, lovers of wisdom; then of Philosophers they become * Sophisters, that is, professors and readers, untill in proceesse of time they grow to be * Idiots, that is to say, ignorant and fooles to see to: for the neerer that they approach to the use of reason and to learning indeed, the more do they abridge the opinion that they have of themselves, and lay downe their presumption. Among those that have need of plyticke, some that are troubled with the tooth-ach, or have a felon or whitlaw on their finger, goe themselves to the physician for to have remedie; others who

who are sicke of an ague send for the physician home to their houses, and desire to be eased and cured by him; but those that are fallen either into a fit of melancholy, or phrensie, or otherwise be distracted in their braines and out of their right wits, otherwhiles will not admit or receive the physicans, although they came of themselves uncalled, but either drive them out of doores, or else hide themselves out of their sight, and so farre gone they bee and dangerously sicke, that they feele not their owne sicknesse; semblably of those who sinne and doe amisse, such bee incorrigible and incurable, who are grievously offended and angry, yea, and in mortall hatred with those who seeme to admonish and reprove them for their misbehaviour; but such as will abide them, and are content to receive and entertaine them, be in better state and in a readier way to recover their health: marie he that yeeldeth to himselfe to such as rebuke him, confessing unto them his errors, discovering of his owne accord his povertie and nakednesse, unwilling that any thing as touching his state should be hidden, not loving to be unknownen and secret, but acknowledging and avowing all that he is charged with, yea, and who praith a man to checke, to reprove, to touch him to the quicke, and so craveth for helpe; certainly herein he sheweth no small signe of good progresse and amendment; according to that which Diogenes was wont to say: He that would be saved (that is to say) become an honest man, had need to seeke either a good friend or a sharpe and bitter enemy, to the end that either by gentle reproofe and admonition, or els by a rigorous cure of correction, he may be delivered from his vices. But how much soever a man in a glorious bravery sheweth to those that be abroad either a foule and thred-bare coat or a steined garment, or a rent shoo, or in a kinde of a presumptuous humilitie mocketh himselfe in that peradventure he is of a very low stature, crooked or bunch-backed, and thinketh herein that he doth a woorthy and doughtie deed; but in the meane while covereth and hideth the ordures and filthinesse of his vile life, cloaketh the villanous enormities of his manners, his envie, maliciousnesse, avarice, sensual voluptuousnesse, as if they were beastly botches or ugly ulcers, suffering no bodie to touch them, nay, not so much as to see them, and all for feare of reproofe and rebuke, certes, such a one hath profited but a little, or to speake more truly, never a whit at all; but he that is ready to encounter and set upon these vices, and either is willing and able (which is the chiefe and principall) to chastise and condemne, yea, and put himselfe to sorrow for his faults; or if not so, yet in the second place at the least can endure patiently, that another man by his reprehensions & remonstrances should cleanse and purge him; certes evident it is, that such an one hateth and detesteth wickednesse indeed, and is in the right way to shake it off: and verily, we ought to avoid the very name and apperance onely thereof, and to be ashamed for to be thought and reputed wicked; but hee that grieveth more at the substance of vice it selfe, than the infamie that cometh thereof, will never be afraid, but can very well abide both to speake hardly of himselfe, and to heare ill by others, so he may be the better thereby. To this purpose may very wel be applied a pretty speech of Diogenes unto a certain yonker, who perceiving that Diogenes had an eye on him within a taverne or tipling house, withdrew himselfe quickly more inward, for to be out of his sight: Never do so (quoth he) for the farther thou sleest backward, the more shalt thou be fill in the taverne; even so a man may say of those that be given to vice, for the more that any one of them seemeth to denie his fault, the farther is he engaged, and the deeper funke in sinne; like as poore men, the greater shew that they make of riches, the poorer they be, by reason of their vanity and bragging of that which they have not. But hee that profiteth in deed, hath for a good president and example, to follow that famous Physician Hippocrates, who both openly confessed and also put downe in writing, that he was ignorant in the Anatomie of a mans head, and namely, as touching the veines or situes thereof; and this account will he make, that it were an unworthy indignitie, if (when such a man as Hippocrates thought not much to publish his owne error and ignorance, for feare that others might fall into the like) hee who is willing to save himselfe from perdition, can not endure to be reprov'd, nor acknowledge his owne ignorance and follie. As for those rules and precepts which are delivered by Pyrrho and Bion in this case are not in my conceit the signes of amendment and progresse so much, as of some other more perfect and absolute habit rather of the minde; for Bion willed and required his scholars and familiars that conversed with him, to thinke then (and never before) that they had proceeded and profited in Philosophie, when they could with as good a will abide to heare men revile and raile at them, as if they spake unto them in this manner:

*Good sir, you seeme no person leawd,
nor foolish for, twi:*

All

*All haile, Faire chieve you and adien,
God send you alwaies blis.*

And Pyrrho (as it is reported) being upon a time at sea, and in danger to be cast away in a tempest, shewed unto the rest of his fellow passengers a porker feeding hard upon barley cast before him on ship board: Loe, my masters (quoth he) we ought by reason and exercise in Philosophie, to frame our selves to this paffe, and to attaine unto such an impossibilitie, as to be moved and troubled with the accidents of fortune no more than this pig.

But consider furthermore, what was the conceit and opinion of Zeno in this point; for hee was of mind that every man might and ought to know whether he profited or no in the schoole of vertue, even by his very dreames; namely, if hee tooke no pleasure to see in his sleepe any filthy or dishonest thing, nor delighted to imagine that he either intended, did or approved any leawd, unjust or outrageous action; but rather did beholde (as in a feeded calme, without winde, weather and wave, in the cleere bottom of the water) both the imaginative and also the passive facultie of the soule, wholly overspread and lightened with the bright beames of reason: which Plato before him (as it should seeme) knowing well enough, hath prefigured and represented unto us, what fantastick motions they be that proceed in sleepe from the imaginative & sensual part of the soule given by nature to tyrannize & overrule the guidance of reason; namely if a man dreame that he seeketh to have carnall company with his owne mother, or that he hath a great minde and appetite to eate all strange, unlawfull and forbidden meats; as if then the said tyrant gave himselfe wholly to all those sensualities & concupiscences as being let loose at such a time, which by day the law either by feare or shame doth repress & keepe downe. Like as therefore beasts which serve for draught or saddle, if they be well taught and trained, albeit their governors and rulers let the reines loose and give them the head, fling not out nor goe aside from the right way, but either draw or make pace forward still, & as they were wont ordinarily keepe the same traine and hold on in one course and order, even so they whose sensual part of the soule is made trainable and obedient, tame, and well schooled by the discipline of reason, will neither in dreames nor sicknesses easily suffer the lusts and concupiscences of the flesh, to rage or breake out unto any enormities punishable by law; but will observe and keepe still in memorie that good discipline and custome which doth ingenerate a certaine power and efficacie unto diligence, whereby they shall and will take heed unto themselves: for if the mind hath bene used by exercise to resist passions and temptations, to hold the bodie and all the members thereof as it were with bit & bridle under subjection, in such sort that it hath at command the eies not to shed teares for pity; the heart likewise not to leape & part in feare; the naturall parts not to rise nor stirre but to be still & quiet without any trouble at all, upon the sight of any faire and beautiful person, man or woman; how can it otherwise be but that there should be more likelihood that exercise having seized upon the sensual part of the soule and tamed it, should polish, lay even, reforme, and bring unto good order all the imaginations and motions thereof, even as farre as to the very dreames and fantasies in sleepe: as it is reported of Stilpo the philosopher, who dreamed that he saw Neptune expostulating with him in anger, because he had not killed a beeste to sacrifice unto him as the manner was of other priests to doe, and that himselfe nothing altonied or dismayd at the said vision should answer thus againe: What is that thou faist Neptune? comest thou to complaine indeed like a child (who pules and cries for not having a peece big enough) that I take not up some money at interest, and put my selfe in debt, to fill the whole citie with the sent and savor of rost and burnt, but have sacrificed unto thee such as I had at home according to my abilitie and in a meane? whereupon Neptune (as hee thought) should merrily smile and reach forth unto him his right hand, promising that for his sake and for the love of him he would that yeere send the Megarians great store of raine and good foison of sea-loaches or fishes called Aphyra by that meanes comming unto them by whole sculles. Such then, as while they lie asleepe have no illusions arising in their braines to trouble them, but those dreames or visions onely as be joyous pleasant, plaine and evident, not painfull, nor terrible, nothing rough, maligne, tortuous and crooked; may boldly say that these fantasies and apparitions be no other than the reflexions and raies of that light which rebound from the good proceedings in philosophie; whereas contrariwise the furious pricks of lust, timorous frights, unmanly and base flights, childish and excessive joies, dolorous sorrowes, and dolefull mones by reason of some piteous illusions strange and absurd visions appeering in dreames, may be well compared unto the broken waves and billowes of the sea beating upon the rocks and craggie banks of the shore; for that the soule having not as yet that fected perfection in it selfe which should keep it in good order, but holdeth on a course still according to good lawes onely and sage opinions, from which when it is farthest sequestred and most remote, to wit, in sleepe, it suffereth it selfe to returne againe to the old wont and to be let loose and abandoned to her passions: But whether these things may be ascribed unto the profit and amendment whereof we treat, or rather to some other habitude, having now gathered more strength and firme constancie not subject by meanes of reasons and good instruction to shaking, I leave that to your owne consideration and mine together.

But now forasmuch as this total impassibilitie (if I may so speake) of the mind, to wit, a state so perfect that it is void of all affections, is a great and divine thing; and seeing that this profit and proceeding whereof we write consisteth in a kind of remission and mildnesse of the said passions, we ought both to consider each of them apart and also compare them one with another, thereby to examine and judge the difference: conferre we shall every passion by it selfe, by observing whether our lusts and desires be more calme and lesse violent than in former time, by marking likewise our fits of feare and anger, whether they be now abated in comparison of those before, or whether when they be up and enflamed, we can quickly with the helpe of reason remove or quench that which was wont to set them on worke or a fire: compare we shall them together, in case we examine our selves whether we have now a greater portion of grace and shame in us than of feare; whether we finde in our selves emulation and not envie; whether we cover honor rather than worldly goods; and in one word, whether after the manner of musicians we offend rather in the extremitie and excesse of harmonic called Dorian, which is grave, solemne, and devout, than the Lydian, which is light and galliard-like, that is to say inclining rather in the whole maner of our life to hardnes and severitie, than to effeminate softnesse; whether in the enterprise of any actions we shew timiditie and slacknesse, rather than merittie and rashnesse, and last of all, whether we offend rather in admiring too highly the sayings of men and the persons themselves, than in despising and debasing them too low: for like as we say in physicke it is a good signe of health when diseases are not diverted and translated into the noble members & principal parts of the body; even so it seemeth that when the vices of such as are in the way of reformation and amendment of life change into passions that are more milde and moderate, it is a good beginning of ridding them away cleane by little & little.

The Lacedaemonian Ephori, which were the high countrollors of that whole State, demanded of the Musician Phrynis, when he had set up two strings more to his seven stringed instrument, whether he would have them to cut in (under the trebles or the basses, the highest or the lowest? but as for us, we had need to have our affections cut both above and beneath, if we desire to reduce our actions to a meane and mediocritie. And surely this progresse or proceeding of ours to perfection, professeth rather to let downe the lightest first, to cut off the extremitie of passions in excesse, and to abate the acrimonie of affections before we doe any thing else, in which as saith Sophocles:

Most furious be and violent.*

As for this one point, namely that we ought to transferre our judgement to action, and not to suffer our words to remaine bare and naked words still in the aire, but reduce them to effect, we have already said, that is the chiefe propertie belonging to our progresse and going forward: now the principall arguments and signes thereof be these; if we have a zeale and fervent affection to imitate those things which we praise; if we be forward and readie to execute that which we so much admire, and contrariwise will not admit nor abide to heare of such things as we in our opinion dispraise and condemne. Probable it is and standeth with great likelihood that the Athenians al in general praised and highly esteemed the valour and prowesse of Miltiades; but when Themistocles said; that the victorie and Trophie of Miltiades would not give him leave to sleepe, but awakened him in the night, plaine it is and evident, that he not onely praised and admired, but had a desire also to imitate him, and do as much himselfe; semblably, we are to make this reckonings, that our progresse and proceeding in vertue is but small, when it reacheth no farther than to praise onely and have in admiration that which good men have woorthily done, without any motion and inclination of our will to imitate the same and effect the like. For neither is the carnall love of the bodie effectually, unless some little jealousie be mixed withall, not the praise of vertue fervent and active, which doth not touch the quick, and pricke the heart with an ardent zeale in stead of envie, unto good and commendable things, and the same desirous to performe and accomplish the same fully. For it is not sufficient that the heart should be turned upside downe onely, as Alcibiades was wont to say by the words and precepts of the Philosopher reading out of his chaire, even untill the teares gush out of the eyes: but he that truly doth profit & go forward, ought by comparing himselfe with the works & actions of good men, and those that be perfectly vertuous, to feele withall in his owne heart, as well a displeasure with himselfe, and a griefe in conscience for that wherein he is short and defective, as also a joy and contentment in his spirit upon a hope and desire to be equal unto them, as being full of an affection and motion that never resteth and lieth still, but remembreth for all the world (according to the similitude of Simonides.)

*The sucking foale that keeps just pace,
And runs with dam in everie place.*

affecting and desiring nothing more than to be wholly united and conporate with a good man, by imitation. For surely this is the passion peculiar and proper unto him that truly taketh profit by the studie of Philosophie; To love and cherish tenderly the disposition & conditions of him whose deeds he doth imitate and desire to expresse, with a certaine good will to render alwaies in words, due honor unto them for their vertue, and to assay how to fashion and conforme himselfe like unto them. But in whomsoever there is instilled or infused (I wot not what) contentious humor, envie, and contestation against such as be his betters, let him know that all this proceedeth from an heart exulcerated with jealousie for some authoritie, might and reputation, and not upon any love, honor, or admiration of their vertues. Now, when as we begin to love good men in such sort that (as Plato saith) we esteeme not only the man himselfe happy who is temperate; or those blessed who be the ordinarie hearers of such excellent discourses which daily come out of his mouth; but also that we do affect and admire his countenance, his port, his gate, the cast and regard of his eye, his smile and maner of laughter, inasomuch as we are willing, as one would say to be joined, sodered, and glued unto him; then we may be assured certainly that we profit in vertue; yea and so much the rather, if we have in admiration good and vertuous men, not onely in their prosperitie, but also (like as amorous folke are well enough pleased with the lipping or flammering tongue; yea and do like the pale colour of those whom for the flower of their youth and beautie they love and thinke it bescometh them, as we reade of Ladie Panthea, who by her teares and sad silence, all heavie, afflicted and blubbered as she was, for the dolor and sorrow that she tooke for the death of her husband, seized Araffes so as hee was enamoured upon her) in their adversitie, so as we neither start backe for feare, nor dread the banishment of Aristides, the imprisonment of Anaxagoras, the povertie of Socrates, or the condemnation of Phocion, but repute their vertue, desireable, lovely and amiable even with all these calamities, and runne directly toward her for to kisse and embrace her by our imitation, having alwaies in our mouth at everie one of these croffe accidents this notable speech of Euripides:

*Oh how each thing doth well become,
Such generous hearts both all and some!*

For we are never to feare or doubt that any good or honest thing shall ever be able to avert from vertue this heavenly inspiration and divine instinct of affection, which not onely is not grieved and troubled at those things which seeme unto men most full of miserie and calamitie, but also admireth & desireth to imitate the. Hereupon also it followeth by good consequence, that they who have once received so deepe an impression in their hearts, take this course with themselves: That when they begin any enterprise, or enter into the administration of government, or when any sinister accident is presented unto the, they set before their eyes the examples of those who either presently are or heretofore have bene worthy persons, discoursing in this maner: What is it that Plato would have done in this case? what would have Epaminondas said to this? how would Lycorgus or Agefilus have behaved themselves herein? After this sort (I say) will they labour to frame, compose, reforme and adorne their manners as it were before a mirror or looking-glasse, to wit, in correcting any unseemly speech that they have let fall, or repressing any passion that hath risen in them. They that have learned the names of the demi-gods called Idai Dactyli, know how to use them as counter-charmes or preservatives against sudden frights, pronouncing the same one after another readily and ceremoniously; but the remembrance and thinking upon great and worthy men represented suddenly unto those who are in the way of perfection, and taking holde of them in all passions and perplexions which shall encounter them, holdeth them up, and keepeth them upright, that they can not fall; and therefore this also may go for one argument and token of proceeding in vertue.

Over and besides, not to be so much troubled with any occurrent, nor to blush exceedingly

OF SUPERSTITION.

The Summaric.

T should seeme that Plutarch composed this booke in mockerie and derision of the Jewes whom he toucheth, and girdest at in one place, and whose religion he mingelith with the superstition of the Egyptians; to asmuch purpose (I wis) as that which he delivereth in a discourse at the table, where he comparcth the Feast of the Tabernacles ordered by the eternall and almighty God, with the Bacchanalles and such stinking ordures of idolaters; thinking verily that Bacchus was the godd of the Iewes. This slander of his and false calumniasion ought to be imputed unto that ignorance of the true God, wherein Plutarch did so remaine invayped: it is not be the man alone who hath derived and sowed the religion of the Jewes: but such coffer and derisions of the Ages and wiser men of this world, especially and above all when they be addresed against God, fall upon the head of the authors and devisers thereof; so their art confoundeth themselves against God, full upon the head of the authors and devisers thereof; so their art confoundeth themselves against God, full upon the head of the authors and devisers thereof; so their art confoundeth themselves against God, full upon the head of the authors and devisers thereof.

Moreover as touching this point, that some have thought this present discourse wherin he endavour and labourth to prove superstition to be more perilous than Atheisme is dangerous to be read, & conteneith false doctrine; for that superstition of the twaine is not so bad: I say that in regard of the foolish devotion of Plutarch and such as himselfe, which in no wise deserveth the name of religion, superstition is more wretched and miserable than Atheisme, considering that lesse hurtfull and dangerous it is for a man not to have his minde and soule troubled at all and disquieted with a fantastical illusion of idoles and Chimeras in the aire, than to feare, honor and serve them in such sort as justice & humanity should in manner be abolished by such superstitious idolaters. To be short, that it were better to desert and overthrow at once all false gods, than to lodge any one in his head, for so languish thereby in perpetuall miserie. Concerning true religion and the extremities thereof, the case is otherwise, and the question disputable, which we leave to Divines and Theologians to scan upon, to discourse and determine, since our intencion and purpose useth us not at this time to discourse hereof.

Atheist cannot find how upon.

But to returne unto our author, considering that which we come to touch; Atheists cannot find how to prevaile and maintaine their opinion: for sufficient proesse and accusation against themselves, they carry every minute of an houre in their canterized & seered conscience: but he sheweth that to worship
40 and serve many idols, is a thing without comparison more deplorable than to disavow and disclaime them all. But to prove this, after he had discovered the course of Superstition & Atheisme, and declared the difference of these two extremities, he saith in the first place, that superstition is the most unworthy by and unseemly of all the passions of the soule, proving the same by divers reasons, to wit; That the superstitious man is in continuall perplexity, he dreadeth his owne idole no lesse than a cruel tyrant, and imagineth a thousand evils even after his death. After this he taketh a view of the Atheist, and opposeth him against the superstitious, resolving upon this point; that the superstitious person is more miserable of the twaine, as well in adversitie as prosperitie, and so confirme and satisfie his assertion, he setteth downe many arguments and notable examples. Moreover he sheweth that the superstitious
50 person is an enemy to all dettie or goodbood, he putteth cleane out of his heart, and treadeth under foote all humanitie and righteousnesse for to please his idols, and in one word, that he is the most wretched cattife in the world. And for a conclusion he exhorteth us so to flee superstition, that we hold our selves from falling into Atheisme, keeping in the middle betweene; of which point every good man ought to consider and thinke upon well and in good earnest in these latter times of the world, albeit he who advertiseth us thereof in this place, never knew what was true religion.

OF SUPERSTITION.

He ignorance and want of true knowledge as touching the gods divided even from the beginning into two branches, meeting on the one side with stubborne and obdurate natures, as it were with a churlish peece of ground, hath in them engendred Impietie and Atheisme; and on the other side, lighting upon gentle and tender spirits like a moist and soft soile, hath bred and imprinted therein superstition: now as all error in opinion and judgement, and namely in these matters, is hurtfull and dangerous enough; so if it be accompanied with some passion of the minde it is most pernicious. For this we must thinke, that every one of these passions resembleth a deception that is feaverous and inflamed; and like as the dislocations of any joints in a mans bodie out of their place joined with a wound be woofe than others to be cured; even so the distortions and errors of the minde meeting with some passion are more difficult to be reformed. As for example, let case that one doe thinke that the little moles and indivisible bodies called Atomi, together with voidnesse and emptinesse be the first elements and principles whereof all things are made; certainly this is an erroneous and false opinion of his; howbeit the same breedeth no ulcer, no feaver causing disordinate pulse in the arteries, nor yet any pricking and trouble some paine. Doth some one hold that riches is the soveraigne good of man? This error and false opinion hath a rust or canker and a worme that eateth into the soule and transporteth the same besides it selfe, it suffreth it not to take any repose, it stingeth, it pricketh it and setteth it a gadding, it throweth it downe headlong (as it were) from high rocks, it flitteth and strangleth it, and in one word it bereaveth it of all libertie & franke speech. Againe, are there some perswaded, that vertue and vice be substances corporall and materiall? this haply is a grosse ignorance and a foule error, howbeit not lamentable nor worthie to be deplored: but there be other judgements and opinions like unto this:

*O vertue wretched and miserable,
Nought else but words and windes variable;
Thee serv'd I daily with all reverence,
As if thou hadst beene some reall essence:
Whereas injustice neglected I have,
Which would have made me a man rich and brave;
Intemperance eke have I cast behind.
Of pleasures all, she mother deere and kind.*

Such as these verily we ought to pittie, yea and withall to be offended at, because in whose minds they are once entered and settled they engender many maladies and passions like unto wormes and such filthly vermine. But now to come unto those which at this present are in question: Impietie or Atheisme, being a false perswasion and lewd belief, that there is no soveraigne Nature most happie and incorruptible, seemeth by incredulitie of a God-head to bring miscreants to a certaine stupiditie, bereaving them of all sense and feeling, considering that the end of this misbeleefe that there is no God, is to be void altogether of feare. As for superstition, according as the nature of the Greeke word (which signifieth Fear of the Gods) doth imply, is a passionate opinion and turbulent imagination, imprinting in the heart of man a certaine fearfulnesse, which doth abate his courage and humble him downe to the verie ground, whiles he is perswaded that they be gods indeed, but such as be noyome, hurtfull, and doing mischief unto men: In such sort, that the impious Atheist having no motion at all as touching the Deitie and Divine power, and the superstitious person mooved and affected thereto after a perverse sort, and otherwise than he should, are both out of the right way. For ignorance as it doth ingenerate in the one an unbelief of that soveraigne Nature which is the cause of all goodness; so it imprinteth in the other a misbeleefe of the Deitie, as being the cause of evill: so that as it should seeme, Impietie or Atheisme is a false judgement and opinion of the God-head; and superstition a passion proceeding from an erroneous perswasion. True it is that all maladies of the soule are foule and the passions naught; howbeit in some of them, there is a kinde of (I wot not what) alacritie, haughtines and jollitie, proceeding from the lightnesse of the minde; and to say in a word, there is in manner not one of them all, destitute of one active motion or other, serving for action; but a common imputation this is and a blame laid generally upon all passions, that with their violent prick (as it were) they incite, provoke, urge, compell, and force reason; onely feare, which being no lesse void of audacitie and boldnesse, than of reason; carrieth with it a certaine blockishnesse or stupiditie, destitute of action, perplexed, idle, dead, without any exploit or effect whatsoever; whereupon it is named in Greeke Δειμα, that is to say, a Bond, and Ταλας, that is to say, Trouble, for that it both bindeth and also troubleth the minde. But of all sorts of feare, there is none so full of perplexitie, none so unfit for action as that of superstition. The man who feareth not, is not afraid of the sea; neither feareth he the warres, who followeth not warfare; no more than he who keepeth home and stirreth not out of doores, is afraid of thieves that rob by the high way side; or the poore man that hath nought to loose, of the Sycophant or promotor; nor he that liveth in meane estate, of envie; no more (I say) than he that is in Gaulle feareth earth-quake, or in Aethiopia thunder and lightning: but the superstitious man that stands in feare of the gods, feareth all things, the land, the sea, the aire the skie, darknesse, light, silence and his verie dreames. Servants whiles they be a sleepe, forget the rigour and hardnesse of their masters. Sleepe easeth the cheines, gives and feters, of those that ly by the heeles bound in prison; dolorous inflammations, smart wounds, painfull ulcers and marimuls that eate and consume the flesh, yeeld some ease and alleviation unto patients whiles they be asleepe, according as he saith in the Tragedie:

*O sweet repose, O sleepe so gracious
That dost allay our maladies,
How welcome art thou unto me,
Bringing in season remedies?*

Thus said he: But superstition will not give a man leave thus to say: For it alone maketh no truce during sleepe; it permitteth not the soule at any time to breath and take rest, no nor suffereth it to plucke up her spirits and take heart againe by removing out of her the unpleasant, tart and trouble some opinions as touching the divine power; but as if the sleepe of superstitious folke were a verie hell and place of damned persons, it doth present unto them terrible visions and monstrous fantasies; it raiseth devils, fiends and furies, which torment the poore and miserable soule; it driveth her out of her quiet repose by her owne fearfull dreames, wherewith she whippeth, scourgeth, and punisheth herselfe (as if it were) by some other, whose cruell and unreasonable commandments she doth obey; and yet here is not all; for, that which worke is, such superstitious persons after they be awakened out of their sleepe and waken, do not as other men, despise their dreames, and either laugh thereat or take pleasure therein, for that they see there is nothing true in all their visions and illusions which should trouble and terrifie them; but being escaped out of the shadow of those false illusions, wherein there is no harme or hurt at all, they deceive and trouble themselves in good earnest, spending their substance and goods infinitely upon magicians, jugglers, enchanters, and such like deceivers whom they light upon, who beare a man in hand and thus say unto him:

*If frighted thou be with fantasies in sleepe,
Or haunted with Hecate that beneath doth keepe.*

Call for an old trot that tends thy backhouse, and plunge thy selfe in the sea water, and sit a whole day upon the ground,

*O Greekes, you that would counted be most wise,
These barbarous and wicked totes devise,*

namely, upon a vaine and foolish superstition, enjoining men to begrime and beray themselves with dirt, to lie and wallow in the mire, to observe Sabbaths and cease from worke, to lie prostrate and groveling upon the earth with the face downeward, to sit upon the ground in open place, and to make many strange and extravagant adorations. In times past the manner was, among those especially who would entertaine and observe lawfull musike, to command those that began to play upon the harpe or citterne, to sing thereto with a just mouth, to the end they should speake no dishonest thing; and even we also require and thinke it meet to pray unto the gods with a just and right mouth, & not to prie in the beast sacrificed, to looke into the intrails, to observe whether the tongue thereof be pure and right, and in the meane time perverting and polluting our owne tongues with strange and absurd names, infecting and defiling the same with barbarous tearmes, offending thereby the gods, and violating the dignitie of that religion which is received from our ancestours, and authorised in our owne country. The Comicall

Poet

Poet said pleasantly in one Comedie, speaking of those who laied their bedfeds thicke with golde and silver: Why do you make your sleepe deare and costly unto your selves, which is the only gift that the gods have given us freely: even so may a man very wel say (and with great reason) unto those that are superstitious: Seeing that the gods have bestowed upon us sleepe, for the oblivion and repose of our miseries, why makest thou it a very hel & place of continuall and dolorous torment to thy poore soule, which can not slee nor have recourse unto any other sleep but that which is troublesome unto thee? Heraculus was wont to say: That men all the whiles they were awake, enjoied the benefit of no other world, but that which was common unto all; but when they slept, every one had a world by himselfe: but surely, the superstitious person hath not so much as any part of the common world, for neither whiles hee is awake hath hee the true use of reason and wisdom, nor when he slepeeth is he delivered from feare & secured; but one thing or other troubleth him still: his reason is asleepe, his feare is alwaies awake; so that neither can he avoid his owne harme quite, nor finde any meanes to put it by, and turne it off. Polyarches the tyrant was dread and terrible in Samos, Periander in Corinth, but no man feared either the one or the other, who withdrew himselfe into any free city or popular State; as for him who standeth in dread and feare of the imperiall power of the gods, as of some rigorous and inexorable tyranny, whither shall he retire & withdraw himselfe? whither shall he flee? where shall he find a land, where shall he meet with sea, without a god? into what secret part of the world (poore man) wilt thou betake thy selfe, wherein thou maiest lie close and hidden, and be assured that thou art without the puissance and reach of the gods? There is a law that provideth for miserable slaves, who being so hardly intreated by their masters, are out of all hope that they shall be enfranchised and made free, namely: that they may demand to be sold againe and to change their master, if haply they may by that meanes come by a better and more easie servitude under another: but this superstition alloweth us not that libertie to change our gods for the better, nay, there is not a god to be found in the world, whom a superstitious person doth not dread, considering that he feareth the tutelard gods of his native countrey, and the very gods protectors of his nativitie: he quaketh even before those gods which are known to be favourable propitious and gracious; he trembleth for feare, when he thinketh of them at whose hands we crave riches, abundance of goods, concord, peace, and the happie successe of the best words and deeds that we have. Now if these thinke that bondage is a great calamitie, saying thus:

*O heavie crosse and wofull miserie,
Man and woman to be in thrall & ease:
And namely, if their slavery
Be under lords unfortunate.*

how much more grievous thinke you is their servitude which they endure, who can not flee, who can not runne away and escape, who can not change and turne to another. Altars there be, unto which bad servants may flee for succour; many sanctuaries there be and priviledged churches for thieves and robbers, from whence no man is so hardy as to plucke and pull them out. Enemies after they are defeated and put to flight, if in the very rout and chase they can take holde of some image of the gods, or recover some temple and get it over their heads once, are secured and assured of their lives; whereas the superstitious person is most affrighted, scared, and put in feare by that, wherein all others who be afraid of extreamest evils that can happen to man, repose their hope and trust. Never goe about to pull perforce a superstitious man out of sacred temples, for in them he is most afflicted and tormented. What needs many words? In all men death is the end of life; but it is not so in superstition, for it extendeth and reacheth farther than the limits and utmost bounds thereof, making feare longer than this life, and adjoining unto death an invagination of immortall miseries; and even then, when there seemeth to be an end and cessation of all sorrows & travels, be superstitious men perswaded that they must enter into others which be endlesse & everlasting: they dream of (I wot not what) deepe gates of a certain Pluto or infernall God of hell, which open for to receive them; of fierie rivers alwaies burning; of hollow gulfs and foulds of Stryx to gape for them; of ugly and hideous darknesse to overspread them, full of sundry apparitions; of gasty ghosts and sorrowfull spirits, representing unto them grizlie and horrible shapes to see, and as fearefull and lamentable voices to heare: what should I speake of judges, of tormentors, of bottomlesse pits, and gaping caves, full of all sorts of torture and infinite miseries. Thus unhappy and wretched superstition, by feareing overmuch and without reason, that which it imagineth to be nought, never taketh heed how it submitteeth it selfe to all miseries; and for want of knowledge how to avoid this passionate trouble, occasioned

occasioned by the feare of the gods, forgeth and deviseth to it selfe an expectation of inevitable evils even after death. The impietie of an Atheist hath none of all this geere; most true it is, that his ignorance is unhappie, and that a great calamitie and miserie it is unto the soule, either to see amisse or wholly to be blinded, in so great & woorthy things, as having of many eies the principall and clearest of all, to wit, the knowledge of God extinct and put out; but surely (as I said before) this passionate feare, this ulcer and sore of conscience, this trouble of spirit, this servile abjection is not in his conceit; these goe alwaies with the other, who have such a superstitious opinion of the gods. Plato saith that musike was given unto men by the gods, as a singular meanes to make them more modest and gracious, yea and to bring them as it were into tune, and cause them to be better conditioned, and nor for delight and pleasure, nor to tickle the eares: for falling out as it doth many times, that for default and want of the Muses and Graces, there is great confusion & disorder in the periods and harmonies, the accords and consonances of the minde, which breaketh out otherwhiles outrageously by meanes of intemperance and negligence; musike is of that power that it setteth every thing againe in good order and their due place; for according as the poet Pindarus saith:

*To what soever from above,
God Jupiter doth cast no love,
To that the voice melodious
Of Muses seemeth odious.*

In so much as they fall into fits of rage therewith, and be very fell & angrie, like as it is reported of tygers, who if they heare the sound of drums or tabours round about them, will grow furious and startle mad, untill in the end they teare themselves in peeces: so that there cometh lesse harme unto them who by reason of deafnesse or hard hearing, have no sense at all of musike, and are nothing moved and affected therewith: a great infortunite this was of blind Tirifus, that hee could not see his children and friends; but much more unfortunate and unhappie were Athamas and Agave, who seeing their children, thought they saw lions and stags. And no doubt when Hercules fell to be enraged and mad, better it had beene and more expedient for him, that he had not knowne his owne children, than so to deale with those who were most deere unto him, and whom he loved more than all the world besides, as if they had beene his mortall enemies. Thinke you not then, that there is the same difference between the passions of Atheists and superstitious folke? Atheists have no sight nor knowledge of the gods at all; and the superstitious thinke there are gods, though they be perswaded of them amisse; Atheists neglect them altogether as if they were not; but the superstitious esteeme that to bee terrible, which is gracious & amiable; cruel and tyrannike, which is kind and fatherlike; hurtfull and damageable unto us, which is most carefull of our good and profit; rough, rigorous, savage and fell of nature, which is void of choler and without passion. And hereupon it is that they beleeve brasse founders, cutters in stone, imagers, gravers and workers in waxe, who shape, & represent unto them gods with bodies to the likeness of mortall men, for such they imagine them to be, such they adorne, adore and worship, whiles in the meane time they despise philosophers and grave personages of State and government, who do teach and shew that the majestie of God is accompanied with bountie, magnanimitie, love and carefull regard of our good: So that as in the one sort we may perceive a certaine senselesse stupiditie and want of beleife in those causes from whence proceed all goodnesse; so in the other we may observe a distrustfull doubt and feare of those which cannot otherwise be than profitable and gracious. In sum, impietie and Atheisme is nothing else but a meere want of feeling and sense of a divie power, for default of understanding and knowing the soveraigne good; and superstition is a heape of divers passions, suspecting and supposing that which is good by nature to bee bad; for superstitious persons feare the gods, and yet they have recourse unto them; they flatter them, and yet blasphem and reproch them; they pray unto them, and yet complaine of them. So a common thing this is unto all men, not to be alwaies fortunate, whereas the gods are void of sicknesse, not subject to old age, neither taste they of labour or paine at any time: and as Pindarus saith,

*Escape they do the passage of the firth
Of roaring Acheron, and live away in mirth.*

But the passions and affaires of men be intermeddled with divers accidents and adventures which run as well one way as another. Now consider with me first and formost the Atheist in those things which happen against his minde, and learne his disposition and affection in such occurrences:

rences: if in other respects he be a temperate and modest man, beare he will his fortune patiently without saying a word; seeke for aide he will and comfort by what means he can; but if he be of nature violent, and take his misfortune impatiently, then he directeth and opposeth all his plaints and lamentations against fortune and casualtie; then he crieth out that there is nothing in the world governed either by justice or with providence, but that all the affaires of man run confusedly headlong to destruction: but the fashion of the superstitious is otherwise, for let there never so small an accident or mishap befall unto him, he sits him downe sorrowing, and thereto he multiplieth and addeth other great and greivous afflictions, such as hardly be remooved; he imagineth sundry frights, feares, suspitions, and troublefome terrors, giving himselfe to all kinde of wailing, groaning, and dolefull lamentation; for he accuseth not any man, fortune, occasion, or his owne selfe; but he blameth God as the cause of all, giving out in plaine termes, that from thence it is that there falleth and runneth over him such a celestiall influence of all calamitie and misery, contesting in this wise, that an unhappie or unluckie man he is not, but one hated of the gods, woorthily punished and afflicted, yea and suffering all deservedly by that divine power and providence: now if the godlesse Atheist be sicke, he discourseth with himselfe and calleth to minde his repletions and full feedings, his surfeiting upon drinking wine, his disorders in diet, his immoderate travell & paines taken, yea and his unusuall and absurd change of aire, from that which was familiar, unto that which is strange and unnatural: moreover, if it chance that he have offended in any matter of government touching the State, incurred disgrace and an evil opinion of the people and country wherein he liveth, or beene falsely accused and slandered before the prince or soveraigne ruler, he goeth no farther than to himselfe and thole about him, imputing the cause of all thereto and to nothing els, and thus he reasoneth:

Where have I beene? what good have I done? and what have I not done?

Where have I sinned? what dutie begun is left by me undone?

whereas the superstitious person will thinke and say, that everie disease and infirmite of his bodie, all his losses, the death of his children, his evil successe and infortunie in managing civil affaires of State, and his repulses and disgraces, are so many plagues inflicted upon him by the ire of the gods, and the verie assaults of the divine justice; in so much as he dare not go about to seeke for helpe and succour, nor avert his owne calamitie; he will not presume to seeke for remedie, nor oppose himselfe against the invasion of adverse fortune, for feare (forsooth) lest he might seeme to fight against the gods, or to resist their power and will when they punish him: thus when he lieth sicke in bed, he driveth his physician out of the chamber, when he is come to visit him; when he is in sorrow, he shutteth and locketh his doore upon the Philosopher, that cometh to comfort him and give him good counsell: Let me alone (will he say) and give me leave to suffer punishment as I have deserved, wicked and profane creature that I am, accursed, hated of all the gods, demi-gods, and saints in heaven. Whereas if a (man who doth not beleve nor is perswaded that there is a God) be otherwise in exceeding griefe and sorrow, it is an ordinarie thing with him to wipe away the teares as they gush out of his eyes, and trickle downe the cheekes, to cause his haire to be cut, and to take away his mourning weed. As for a superstitious person; how should one speake unto him, or which way succour and helpe him? without the doores he sits clad in sackcloth, or else girded about his loines with patched clothes and tattered rags; oftentimes he will welter and wallow in the mire, confessing and declaring (I wot not) what finnes and offenses that he hath committed; to wit, that he hath eaten or drunketh this or that, which his god would not permit; that he hath walked or gone some whither against the will and leave of the divine power. Now, say he be of the best sort of these superstitious people, and that he labour but of the milder superstition; yet will he at leastwise sit within houle, having about him a number of all kinds of sacrifices and sacred aspersions; yee shall have old witches come and bring all the charmes, spels, and forceries they can come by, and hang them about his necke or other parts of his bodie (as it were) upon a stake, as Bion was wont to lay.

It is reported that Tyriabastus when he should have beene apprehended by the Persians, drew his cimeter, and (as hee was a valiant man of his hands) defended himselfe valiantly; but so soone as they that came to lay hands on him, cried out and protested that they were to attach him in the kings name & by commission from his Majestie, he laid downe his weapon aforesaid immediately, and offered both his hands to be bound and pinnioned. And is not this whereof we treat the semblable case? whereas others withstand their adversitie, repell and put backe their afflictions, and worke all the means they can for to avoide, escape, and turne away that which they

they would not have to come upon them. A superstitious person will heare no man, but speake in this wise to himselfe: Wretched man that thou art, all this thou suffrest at the hands of God, and this is befallen unto thee by his commandement, and the divine providence; all hope hee rejecteth, he doth abandon and betray himselfe, and looke whosoever come to succour and helpe him, those he shunneth and repelleth from him. Many crosses these be and calamities in the world, otherwise moderate and tolerable, which superstition maketh mischievous and incurable.

That ancient King Nidas in old time being troubled and disquieted much in his minde (as it should seeme) with certaine dreames and visions, in the end fell into such a melancholy and despair, that willingly he made himselfe away by drinking bulls blood. And Aristodemus king of Messenians in that warre which he waged against the Lacedaemonians, when it hapned that the dogs yelled and howled like wolves, and that there grew about the altar of his houle the herbe called Dent de chien, or Dogs grasse, whereupon the wifards and soothsayers were afraid (as of some tokens presaging evil) conceived such an inward griefe, & tooke so deepe a thought, that he fell into desperation and killed himselfe. As for Nicias the Generall of the Athenian armie, haply it had beene farre better that by the examples of Nidas and Aristodemus he had beene delivered and rid from his superstition, than for feare of the shadow occasioned by the eclipse of the moone to have sitten still as he did and do nothing, untill the enemies environed and enclosed him round about; and after that fortie thousand of Athenians were either put to the sword or taken prisoners, to come alive into the hands of his enemies, and lose his life with shame and dishonor: for in the darkenesse occasioned by the opposition of the earth just in the mids, betweene the sunne and the moone, whereby her body was shadowed and deprived of light, there was nothing for him to feare, and namely at such a time, when there was cause for him to have stood upon his feet and served valiantly in the field; but the darkenesse of blinde superstition was dangerous, to trouble and confound the judgement of a man who was possessed therewith, at the very instant, when his occasions required most the use of his wit and understanding:

*The sea already troubled is
With billowes blew within the sound,
Up to the capes and cliffs arise
Thicke mistie clouds which gather round
About their tops, where they do feare,
Fore shewing shortly tempests great.*

A good and skilful pilot seeing this, doth well to pray unto the gods for to escape the imminent danger, and to invoke and call upon those saints for helpe, which they after call Saviours: but all the while that he is thus at his devout prayers, he holdeth the helme hard, he letteth downe the crosse saile-yard,

*Thus having struck the maine saile downe the mast,
He seapes the sea, with darknesse overcast.*

He should giveth the husbandman a precept, before he begin to drive the plough or sow his seede:

*To Ceres chaste his wives to make,
To Jove likewise god of his land,
Forgetting not the while to take
The end of his plough-taile in hand.*

And Homer bringeth in Ajax being at the point to enter into combat with Hector, willing the Greeks to pray for him unto the gods; but whiles they praied, he forgot not to arme himselfe at all pieces. Semblable, Agamemnon after he had given commandement to his souldiours who were to fight,

*Ech one his lance and spear to whear,
His shield likewise fitly to set.*

then, and not before, praith unto Jupiter in this wise:

*O Iupiter vouchsafe me of thy grace,
The stately hall of Priamus to raise.*

for God is the hope of vertue and valour, not the pretense of sloth and cowardise. But the Jewes were so superstitious, that on their Sabbath (sitting still even whiles the enemies reared their scaling ladders and gained the walles of their citie) they never stirred foot, nor rose for the matter, but remained fast tied and inwrapped in their superstition as it were in a net. Thus you see what superstition is in those occurrences of times and affaires which succeed not to our minde, but contrary to our will (that is to say) in adversity: and as for times and occasions of mirth, when all things fall out to a mans desire, it is no better than impietie or atheisme; and nothing is so joyous unto man, as the solemnities of festivall holidays, great feasts and sacrifices before the temples of the gods, the mysticall and sacred rites performed when wee are purified and cleansed from our sinnes, the ceremoniall service of the gods when wee worship and adore them; in which all, a superstitious man is no better than the Atheist: for make an Atheist in all these, he will laugh at them untill he be ready to go beside himselfe; these toies will fet him (I say) into a fit of Sardonian laughing, when he shall see their vanities; and other-whiles he will not sticke to say softly in the eare of some familiar friend about him: VVhat mad folke be these? how are they out of their right wits, and enraged, who suppose that such things as these doe please the gods? Setting this aside, there is no harme at all in him. As for the superstitious person, willing he is, but not able, to joy and take pleasure: for his heart is much like unto that city which Sophocles describeth in these verses:

*Which at one time is full of incense sweet,
Resounding mirth with loud triumphant song,
And yet the same doth shew in every street
All signes of griefe, with plaints and groanes among.*

he looketh with a pale face, under his chaplet of flowers upon his head; he sacrificeth, & yet quaketh for feare; he maketh his prayers with a trembling voice; he putteth incense into the fire, and his hand shaketh withall; to be short, he maketh the speech or sentence of Pythagoras to be vaine and foolish, who was wont to say: That we are then in best case, when we approach unto the gods and worship them. For verily even then it is, when superstitious people are most wretched & miserable, to wit, when they enter into the temples & sanctuaries of the gods, as if they went into the denes of beares, holes of serpents and dragons, or caves of whales & such monsters of the sea. I marvel much therefore at them, who call the miscreance & sinne of atheists, impietie, & give not that name rather to superstition. And yet Anaxagoras was accused of impietie; for that he held and said that the Sun was a stone: whereas never man yet called the Cimmerians impious or godlesse, because they suppose & beleve there is no Sun at all. VVhat say you then? shall he who thinketh that there be no gods at all, be taken for a profane person and excommunicate? and shall not he who beleeveth them to be such as superstitious folke imagine them, be thought infected with more impious and wicked opinions? For mine owne part, I would be better pleased and content, if men should say of me thus: There neither is nor ever was in the world a man named Plutarch, than to give out of me and say: Plutarch is an unconstant man, variable, cholericke, full of revenge for the least occasion that is, or displeased and given to grieve for a small matter; who if when you invite others to supper, he be left out and not bidden, or if upon some businesse you be let and hindered, so that you come not to his doore for to visit him, or otherwise do not salute and speake unto him friendly, will be ready to eat your heart with salt, to set upon you with his fangs, and bite you, will not sticke to catch up one of your little babes and worry him, or will keepe some mischievous wild beast of purpose, to put into your corne-fields, your vineyard or orchards, for to devour and spoile all your fruits. VVhen Timosheus the musician one day in an open Theater at Athens chanted the praises of Diana, giving unto her in his song the attributes of Thyas, Phaebus, Mænus, and Lyssas, that is to say, Furious, Possessed, Enraged, and Starke mad; as Poets are wont to doe, Cineas another minstrell or musician, rose up from out of the whole audience, and said thus aloud unto him: VVould God thou haddest a daughter of those qualities. And yet these superstitious folke thinke the same of Diana, yea, and worse to: neither have they a better opinion of Apollo, Iuno, and Venus; for all of them they feare and tremble at. And yet what blasphemie uttered Niobe against Lato, like unto that which superstition hath perswaded foolish people to beleve of that goddesse? to wit, that she being displeased with the reprochfull words that Niobe gave her, killed with her arrowes all the children of that filly woman,

*Even daughters fixe, and sonnes as many fast,
Of ripe yeeres all, no helpe, but die they must.*

so insatiable was she of the calamities of another, so implacable was her anger. For grant it were so, that this goddesse was full of gall and choler; say, that she tooke an hatred to lewd and wicked persons, or grieved & could not endure to heare herselfe reproched, or to laugh at humane follie follic and ignorance, certes she should have bene offended and angry, yea, and discharged her arrowes upon these, who untruly impute and ascribe unto her that bitterness and exceeding crueltie, and sticke not both to deliver in words and also to set downe in writing, such things of her. Wee charge Hecuba with beastly and barbarous immanitie, for saying thus in the last booke of Homers Iliads:

*O that I could hit her eye
Amid his corpes, so bite and ear.*

As for the Syrian goddesse, superstitious folke are perswaded, that if any one do eate Enchirides or such little fish as Asphyx, she will likewise gnaw their legs, fill their bodies with ulcers, and yo purifie or rot their liver. To conclude therefore, is it impiously done to blasphemie the gods and speake badly of them; and is it not as impious to thinke and imagine the same, considering that it is the opinion and conceit of the blasphemous and foule-mouthed profane person which maketh his speech to be reputed naught and wicked? For even we our selves detest and abhorre foule language, for nothing so much as because it is a signe of a malicious minde, and those we take for to be our enemies who give out bad words of us, in this respect that we suppose the to be faithlesse and not to be trusted, but rather ill affected unto us, and thinking badly of us: Thus you see what judgement superstitious folke have of the gods, when they imagine them to be dull and blockish, treacherous and disloyall, variable and fickle minded, full of revenge, cruell, melancholike and apt to fret at every little matter: whereupon it must needs follow, that the superstitious man doth both hate and also dread the gods; for how can it otherwise be, considering that he is perswaded that all the greatest calamities which either he hath endured in times past, or is like to suffer hereafter proceed from them; now whosoever hateth and feareth the gods, he is no doubt their enemy; neither is it to be woondered at for all this, that although he stand in dread of them, yet he adoreth and worshippeth them, he praieth and sacrificeth unto them, frequenteth duly and devoutly their temples, and is not willingly out of them; for do we not see it ordinarily, that reverence is done unto tyrants, that men make court unto them, and erie: God save your grace; yea and erect golden statues to the honour of them: howbeit as great devotion and divine honour as they doe unto them in outward appareance, they hate and abhorre them secretly to the heart. Hermolaus courted Alexander, and was serviceable about 30 him: Pausanias was one of the squires of the bodie to king Philip, and so was Chereas to Caligula the Emperour; but there was not of these but even when he served them, said thus in his heart,

*Certes in case it did now lie in mee,
Of thee (thou tyrant) revenged would I be.*

Thus you see the Atheist thinketh there be no gods; but the superstitious person wisheth that there were none; yet he beleeveth even against his will that there be, nay he dare not otherwise doe for feare of death. Now if he could (like as Tantalus desired to goe from under the stone that hung over his head) be discharged of this feare which no lesse doth presse him downe, surely he would embrace, yea and thinke the disposition and condition of an Atheist to be happie, as the state of freedome and libertie: but now the Atheist hath no sparke at all of superstition; 40 whereas the superstitious person is in will and affection a miere Atheist, howbeit weaker than to beleve and shew in opinion that of the gods, which he would and is in his minde. Moreover, the Atheist in no wise giveth any cause, or ministreth occasion that superstition should arise; but superstition not onely was the first beginning of impietie and Atheisme, but also when it is sprung up and growne, doth patronise and excuse it, although not truly and honestly, yet not without some colourable pretence: for the Sages and wise men in times past grew not into this opinion, that the world was wholly voide of a divine power and deitie, because they beheld and considered any thing to be found fault withall in the heaven, some negligence and disorder to be marked, some confusion to be observed in the starres in the times and seasons of the yeere, in the revolutions thereof, in the course and motions of the sunne round 50 about the earth, which is the cause of night and day, or in the nouriture and food of beasts or in the yeerely generation and increase of the fruits upon the earth; but the ridiculous works and deeds of superstition, their passions woorthy to be mocked and laughed at, their words, their motions and gestures, their charmes, forceries, enchantments and magicall illusions, their runnings up and downe, their beating of drums & tabours, their impure purifications, their filthy castimonies and beastly sanctifications, their barbarous and unlawfull corrections and chastisements, their inhumane and shamefull indignities practized even in temples; these things (I say) gave occasion first unto some for to say, that better it were there had bene no gods at all, than to admit such for gods who received and approved these abuses, yea and tooke pleasure therein, or that they should be so outrageous, proud, and injurious, so base and pinching, so easie to fall into choler upon a small cause, and so heard to be pleased againe. Had it not bene farre better for those Gaules, Scythians, or Tartarians in old time to have had no thought, no imagination, no mention at all delivered unto them in histories, of gods; than to thinke there were gods delighting in the bloodshed of men, and to beleewe that the most holie and accomplished sacrifice and service of the gods was to cut mens throates and to spill their blood: and had it not bene more expedient for the Carthaginians by having at the first for their law-givers either Critias or Diagoras to have bene perswaded that there was neither God in heaven nor divell in hell, than to sacrifice so as they did to Saturne, who not (as Empedocles said) reprooving, and taxing those that killed living creatures in sacrifice;

The fire lifts up his deere beloved son,

Who first some other forme and shape did take:

He doth him slay, and sacrifice anon,

And sheweth vows and foolish prayers doth make.

but witting and knowing killed their owne children indeed for sacrifice; and looke who had no issue of their owne, would buie poore mens children, as if they were lambs, young calves, or kiddes, for the saide purpose. At which sacrifice the mother that bare them in her wombe would stand by without any thew at all of being mooved, without weeping or fighting for pittie and compassion; for otherwife if the either fetched a sigh or shed a teare, shee mult looke the price of her childe, and yet notwithstanding suffer it to be slaine and sacrificed. Moreover, before and all about the image or idoll to which the sacrifice was made, the place resounded and rung againe with the noise of flutes and hautboies, with the sound also of drums and timbrels, to the end that the pittifull crie of the poore infants should not be heard. Now if any Tryphons or other such like giants, having chased and driven out the gods, should usurpe the empire of the world and rule over us: what other sacrifices would they delight in, or what offerings else and service besides could they require at mens hands? Andrius the wife of the great Monarch Xerxes, buried quicke in the ground twelve persons, and offered them for the prolonging of her owne life unto Pluto; which god (as Plato saith) was named Pluto, Dia, and Hades, for that being full of humanitie unto mankind, wife and rich besides, he was able to entertaine the foules of men with perswasive speeches and reasonable remonstrances.

Xenophanes the Naturalist, seeing the Egyptians at their solemne feasts knocking their breasts, and lamenting pittifully, admonished them verie fully in this wise: My good friends, if these (quoth he) be gods whom you honor thus, lament not for them; and if they be men, sacrifice not unto them. But there is nothing in the world so full of errors, no maladie of the minde so passionate and mingled with more contrarie and repugnant opinions, as this of superstition; in regard whereof, we ought to shunne and avoide the same, but not as many who, whiles they seeke to elchue the assaults of theeves by the high way side, or the invasion of wilde beasts out of the forest, or the danger of fire, are so transported and caried away with feare that they looke not about them, nor see what they doe or whither they goe, and by that meanes light upon by-waies, or rather places having no way at all, but in stead thereof bottomlesse pits and gulfs, or else steepe downe-falls most perilous; even so, there be divers that seeking to avoide superstition, fall headlong upon the cragged rocke of perverse and stiff-necked Impietie and Atheisme, leaping over true religion which is seated just in the mids betweene both.

The Summarie.

Here is not a man, how well so ever framed to the world and settled therein, who can promise unto himselfe any peaceable and assured state, throughout the course of his whole life; but according as it seemeth good to the eternall and wise providence of the Almighty (which governeth all things) to chastise our faults, or to try our constancy in faith by the ought in time of a calone, to prepare himselfe for a tempest, and not to attend the mids of a danger, before he provide for his safetie; but betimes and long before to fortifie and furnish himselfe with that, whereof he may have need another day in all occurrences and accidents what-soever. Our Author therefore in this Treatise writing to comfort and encourage one of his friends, cast downe with anguish occasioned by his banishment, sheweth throughout all his discourse, that vertue it is which maketh us happy in everie place, and that there is nothing but vice that can hurt and endamage us. Now as touching his particularizing of this point, in the first place he treateth what kinde of friends we have need of in our affliction, and how we ought then to serve our turnes with them: and in regard of exile more particularly, he adjoyneth this advertisement, above all other things to see unto those goods which we may enjoy during the same, and to oppose them against the present griefe and sorrow: Afterwards he proveth by severall and divers reasons, that banishment is not in it selfe simply naughty; he discovereth and layeth open the folly and miserie of those, who are too much addicted unto one country, shewing by notable examples that a wife man may live at ease and contentment in all places; that the habitation in a strange region, and the same limited and confined straightly within certaine precincts, doth much more good or divinity than harme; that a large country lying out faire everie way, maketh a man never a whit the more happy: whereas contrariwise to be enclosed and pent up, bringeth many commodities with it, declaring that this is the onely life, and that it is no life at all to be evermore sitting to and fro from place to place. Now when he hath beautified this theme above said with many faire similitudes and proper inductions, he comforteth those who are debarred and excluded from any citie or province; refusing with very good and sound arguments certaine persons who held banishment for a note of infamie; shewing withall, that it is nothing else but sinne and vice which bringeth a man into a lamentable state and condition: concluding

OF EXILE OR BANISHMENT.

Emblable is the case of wise sentences and of good friends; the best and most assured be those reputed, which are present with us in our calamities, not in vaine and for a shew, but to aide and succour us: for many there be who will not stick to present themselves, yea, and be ready to conferre and talke with their friends in time of aduersitie; howbeit, to no good purpose at all, but rather with some danger to themselves, like as unskillfull diuors, when they goe about to helpe those that are at point to be drowned, being clasped about the body, sink together with them for company. Now the speeches and discourses which come from friends and such as would seeme to be helpers, ought to tend unto the consolation of the partie afflicted; and not to the defence and justification of the thing that afflicteth: for little need have we of such persons as should weepe and lament with us in our tribulations & distresses, as the manner is of the Chori or quires in Tragedies, but those rather, who will speake their minds frankly unto us, and make remonstrance plainly: That for a man to be sad and sorrowfull, to afflict and cast downe himselfe, is not onely every way bootlesse and unprofitable, but also most vaine and foolish: but where the aduerser currents themselves being well handled and managed by reason, when they are discovered what they be, give a man occasion to say thus unto himselfe:

*Thou hast no cause thus to complaine;
Unlesse thou be disposed to faime.*

A meere ridiculous follie it were, to aske either of bodie and flesh, what it ailoth, or of soule, what it suffereth; and whether by the occurrence of this accident it fare worse than before; but to have recourse unto strangers without, to reach us what our griefe is, by wailing, sorrowing and grieving together with us: and therefore when wee are apart and alone by our selves, wee ought each one to examine our owne heart and soule, about all and every mishap and infortunie, yea, and to peise and weigh them, as if they were so many burdens; for the bodie is pressed downe onely by the weight of the fardell that loadeth it; but the soule often-times of it selfe giueth a surcharge over and above the things that molest it. Althome of the owne nature is hard, and yce of it selfe colde; neither is there any thing without, that giueth casually to the one the hardnesse to resist, or to the other the coldnesse to congeale; but banishments, disgraces, repulse and losse of dignitie, as also contrariwise, crownes, honours, soveraigne magistracies, preeminences, and highest places, being powerfull either to afflict or reioyce hearts, in some measure more or lesse, not by their owne nature; but according to judgement and opinion, every man maketh to himselfe light or heauie, easie to be borne or contrariwise intolerable: whereupon we may heare Polynices answering thus to the demand made unto him by his mother:

*How then? is it a great calamitie,
To quit the place of our misfortunes?*

POLYNICES.

*The greatest crosse of all it is doubtlesse,
And more indeed: than my tongue can expresse.*

but contrariwise, you shall heare Alcman in another song, according to a little Epigram written of him by a certaine Poet:

*At Sardes, where mine ancefours sometime abode did make,
If I were bred and nourished, my surname I should take
Of some Celinus or Baelus, in robes of golde array'd,
And jewels fine, while I upon the tabour play'd.
But now Alcman I cleped am, and of that Sparta great
A citizen, and poet: for in Greekeish muse my vaine
Exalts me more than Dalcyles or Gyges, tyrants twaine.*

for it is the opinion, and nothing els, that causeth one and the same thing to be unto some, good and commodious, as currant and approved money, but to others, unprofitable and hurtfull.

But for ease, that exile be a grievous calamitie, as many men doe both say and sing; even so, among those meats which we eat, there be many things bitter, sharpe, hote and biting in taste, howbeit, howbeit, by mingling therewith somewhat which is sweet and pleasant, we take away that which disagreeeth with nature; like as there be colours also offensive to the sight, in such sort, as that the eyes be much dazed and troubled therewith, by reason of their unpleasant hew, or excessive and intolerable brightnesse. If then, for to remedie that inconvenience by such offensive and repellent colours, we have devised meanes, either to intermingle shadows withall, or turne away our eyes from them unto some Greene and delectable objects; the semblable may we doe in those sinister and crosse accidents of fortune; namely, by mixing among them those good and desirable blessings which a man presently doth enjoy, to wit, wealth and abundance of goods, a number of friends, and the want of nothing necessarie to this life: for I do not thinke, that among the Sardinians there be many, who would not be very wel content with those goods and that estate which you have even in exile, and chuse rather with your condition of life otherwise, to live from home and in a strange countrey, than (like snails, evermore sticking fast to their shels) be without all good things els, & enjoy only that which they have at home in peace, without trouble and molestation. Like as therefore in a certaine Comedie, there was one who exhorted his friend being fallen into some aduersitie, to take a good heart, and fight against fortune; who when he demanded of him againe, how he should combat with her, made answer: Marie after a Philosophicall maner; even so let us also mainteine battel, and be revenged of aduersitie, by following the rule of Philosophie, & being armed with patience as becommeth wise men. For after what sort doe we defend our selves against raine? or how be we revenged of the North winde? Marie we seeke for fire, we go into a stouph, we make provision of clothes, and we get an house over our heads; neither doe we sit us downe in the raine, untill we be thorowly wet to the skime, and then weepe our fill; and even so, have you also in those things which are presently about you, good meanes, yea, and better than any other, to revive, refresh, and warme this part of your life which seemeth to be frozen and benumbed with colde, as having no need at all of any other helps and succours, so long as you will use the foresaid meanes, according as reason doth prescribe & direct. For true it is, that the ventoses or cupping-glasses that Physicians use, drawing out of mans body the worst & most corrupt blood, do disburden & preserve all the rest. But they that are given to heavinesse & sorrow, who love also evermore to whine and complaine, by gathering together & multiplying continually in their cogitations the worst matters incident unto them, and estoones confirming themselves with the dolorous accidents of their fortune, cause those meanes to be unprofitable unto them, which otherwise are wholesome and expedient, and even at such a time, especially when they should do most good. As for those two runnes my good friend which Homer saith to bee set in heaven full of mens destinies, the one replenished with good and the other with bad, it is not Jupiter who sitteth to disperse and distribute them abroad, sending unto some milde and pleasant fortunes intermingled alwaies with goodnesse, but unto others continual streames (as a man would say) of meere misfortunes without any temperature of any goodnesse at all: but even among our owne selves as many as be wise and are of any sound understanding, draw out of their happy fortunes whatsoever crosse and aduerser matter is mingled therewith, and by this meanes make their life the pleasanter; and as a man would say more portable; whereas contrariwise, many men doe let their fortunes runne (as it were) through a colander or streiner, wherein the worst stick and remaine in the way behind, whiles the better do passe and runne out; and therefore it behooveth that although we be fallen into any thing that is in truth naught and grievous unto us, we set a cheereful countenance on the matter, and make the best supplie and recompence that we can by those good things that otherwise we have and doe remaine with us besides, lenifying and polishing the strange and aduerser accident which hapneth without by that which is milde and familiar within.

But as touching those occurrents that simply of their owne nature be not ill, and wherein whatsoever doth trouble and offend us, ariseth altogether and wholly upon a vaine conceit and foolish imagination of our owne; we ought to doe as our maner is with little children that bee afraid of masks and disguised visours; for like as we hold the same close and neere unto them, handle and turne them in our hands before them every way, and so by that meanes acquaint them therewith, untill they make no reckoning at all of them; even so by approaching neere, by touching and perusing the said calamities with our understanding and discourse of reason, wee are to consider and discover the false apparence, the vantage and feigned tragadie that they pretend; like to which, is that present accident which now is befallen unto you, to wit, the banishment out of that place, which according to the vulgar error of men you suppose to be your your native country. For to say a truth, there is no such distinct native soile that nature hath ordeined, no more than either house, land, smiths forge or chirurgians shop is by nature, as Ariston was wont to say; but every one of these and such like according as any man doth occupie or use them, are his, or to speake more properly, are named and called his: for man, according to the saying of Plato is not an earthly plant, having the roote fixed fast within the ground and unmoveable, but celestiall and turning upward to heaven, whose body from the head as from a roote that doth strengthen the same abideth streight and upright. And hereupon it is that Hercules in a certaine tragædie said thus:

What tell you me of Argive or Thebain,

I do not want of any place certain,

No burrough towne, nor city comes amia

Through out all Greece, but it my country is.

And yet Socrates said better than so; who gave it out; That he was neither Athenian nor Grecian, but a citizen of the world; as if a man should say for example sake, that he were either a Rhodian or a Corinthian; for he would not exclude himselfe within the precincts and limits of the promontories Samion or Tenarum, nor yet the Ceraunian mountains,

But seest thou this starrie firmament,

So high above and infinitely vast,

Inosome moist of water element,

The earth beneath how it enloseth fast.

These are the bounds of a native country within the pourprife and compasse whereof whoe ever is, ought not to thinke himselfe either banished, pilgrime, stranger or forrener; namely, whereas he shall meete with the same fire, the same water, the same aire, the same magistrats, the same governors and presidents; to wit, the sunne, the moone, and the morning starre; the same lawes throughout, under one and the selfe same order and conduct; the solstice and tropicke of summer in the north; the solstice and tropicke of winter in the south; the æquinoxes both of spring and fall, the starres Pleiades and Arcturus; the seasons of seedtime, the times of planting; one King, and the same prince of all, even God, who hath in his hand the beginning, the mids, and the end of the whole and universall world; who by his influence goeth according to nature, directly through and round about all things, attended upon with righteousnesse and justice, to take vengeance and punishment of those who transgresse any point of divine law: which all we likewise that are men doe exercise and use by the guidance and direction of nature against all others, as our citizens and subjects. Now say that thou dost not dwell and live in Sardis, what matter is that? surely it is just nothing: No more doe all the Athenians inhabite the burroughs or tribe Colyttus; nor the Corinthians in the street Cranium; ne yet the Lacedæmonians in the village Pythæ: are those Athenians then to be counted strangers, and not inhabitants of the citie, who have remooved out of Melie into Diomea: considering that even there they doe solemnize yet the moneth of their transmigration named thereupon Metageitnion; yea and do celebrate a festivall holiday and sacrifice, which in memoriall of that remooving they call Metageitnia, for that this passage of theirs into another neighbourhood, they received and interteined right willingly with joy and much contentment? I suppose you will never say so. Now tell me what part of this earth habitable or rather of the whole globe and compasse thereof, can be said farre distant or remote one from the other, seeing that the Mathematicians are able to prove and make demonstration by reason, that the whole in comparison and respect of heaven or the firmament is no more than a very pricke which hath no dimension at all: But we like unto pismires driven out of our hole, or in manner of bees dispossest of our hive, are cast downe and discomforted by and by, and take our selves to be foreiners and strangers, for that we know not how to esteeme and make all things our owne, familiar and proper unto us, as they be. And yet we laugh at the folly of him who said: That the moone at Athens was better than at Corinth; being in the meane while after a sort in the same error of judgement, as if when we are gone a journey from the place of our habitation, we should mistake the earth, the sea, the aire and the skie, as if they were others and farre different from those which we are accustomed unto: for Nature hath permitted us to goe and walke through the world loose and at libertie: but we for our parts imprison our selves, and we may thanke our selves that we are pent up in straight roomes, that we be housed and kept within wals; thus of our owne accord we leape into close and narrow places; and notwithstanding that we do thus by our selves, yet we mocke the Persian Kings, for that (if it be true which is reported of them) the drinke all of the water only of the river Chaspeus, by which means they make all the continent besides waterlesse, for any good they have by it: whereas, even we also when we travell and remooove into other countries, have a longing desire after the river Cephissus or Emoras; yea and a minde unto the mountaine Taigetus or the hill Parnassus; whereby upon a most vaine and foolish opinion, all the world besides is not onely void of water, but also like a desert, without citie, and altogether inhabitable unto us. Contrariwise, certaine Egyptians by occasion of some wrath and excessive oppressing of their King, minding to remooove into Ethiopia, when as their kinsfolke and friends requested them to turne backe againe, and not to forsake their wives and children, after a shamelesse manner shewing unto them their genitall members, answered them: That they would neither want wives nor children, so long as they carried those about them. But surely a man may avouch more honestie, and with greater modestie and gravitie; that hee who in what place soever feeleth no want or misse of those things which be necessarie for this life, cannot complaine and say: That he is there out of his owne country, without citie, without his owne house and habitation, or a stranger at all; so as he onely have as he ought, his eie and understanding bent hereunto, for to stay and governe him in manner of a sure anchor, that he may be able to make benefit and use of any haven or harborough whatsoever he arriveth unto. For when a man hath lost his goods, it is not so easie a matter to recover them soone againe; but surely everie citie is straight waies as good a native country unto him, who knoweth and hath learned how to use it; to him (I say) who hath such rootes as will live, be nourished and grow in every place and by any means, such as Themistocles was furnished with; and such as Demetrius the Phalerian was not without; who being banished from Athens, became a principall person in the court of King Ptolemæus in Alexandria, where he not onely himselfe lived in great abundance of all things, but also sent unto the Athenians from thence rich gifts and presents. As for Themistocles living in the estate of a Prince, through the bountifull allowance and liberalitie of the King of Persia, he was wont (by report) to say unto his wife and children: We had beene utterly undone for ever, if we had not beene undone. And therefore Diogenes surnamed the Dog, when one brought him word and said, the Sinopians have condemned thee to be exiled out of the kingdome of Pontus: And I (quoth he) have confined them within the country of Pontus with this charge,

That they shall never passe the utmost bounds

Of Euxine sea that hems them with her strands.

Stratonius being in the Ile Seriphos, which was a verie little one, demanded of his host, for what crimes the punishment of exile was ordained in that country; and when he heard and understood by him, that they used to banish such as were convicted of falsehood and much: Why then (quoth he againe) hast not thou committed some false and leawd act, to the end that thou mightest depart out of this straight place and be enlarged? whereas one Comical Poet said: A man might gather and make a vintage (as it were) of figs with slings, and soison of all commodities might be had, which an Iland wanted. For if one would weigh and consider the truth indeed, setting aside all vaine opinion and foolish conceits, he that is affected unto one citie alone, is a verie pilgrim and stranger in all others; for it seemeth neither meete, honest, nor reasonable, that a man should abandon his owne for to inhabite those of others. Sparta is taken to thy lot (saith the proverbe) adorne and honor it, for so thou art bound to doe; be it that it is of small or no account; say that it is seated in an unwholesome aire, and subject to many diseases, or be plagued with civill dissensions, or otherwise troubled with turbulent affaires. But who soever he be whom fortune hath deprived of his owne native country; certes she hath granted and allowed him to make choice of that which may please and content him. And verily the precept of the Pythagoreans serveth to right good steed in this case to be practised: Choose (say they) the best life; use and custome will make it pleasant enough unto thee. To this purpose also it may bee wisely and with great profit said: Make choice of the best and most pleasant citie, so time will cause it to be thy native country, and such a native country as shall not distrust and trouble thee with any businesse, nor impole upon thee these and such like exactions: Make payment and contribute to this levie of money: Goe in embassage to Rome: Receive such a capitaine or ruler into thine house, or take such a charge upon thee at thine owne expensies. Now he that calleth these things to remembrance, if he have any wit in his head, and be not overblind every way in his owne opinion and selfe-conceit, will wish and choose, if he be banished out of his owne country, to inhabite the verie Ile Gyaros, or the rough and barraine Iland Cinamus, where trees or plants do hardly grow, without complaining with griefe of heart, without lalamenting and breaking out into these plaints and womanly moanes, reported by the Poet Symonides in these words:

*The roaring noise of purple sea, resounding all about,
Doth fright me much, and so in close,
that I can not get out.*

but rather he will beare in minde and discourse with himselfe the speech that Philip king of Macedonie, sometime delivered: for when his hap was in the wrestling place to fall backward and lie along on the ground; after he was up againe upon his feet, and saw the whole proportion and print of his bodie in the dust of the floore: O Hercules (quoth he) what a small deale of the earth is our portion by the appointment of nature, and yet see how we will not rest, but covet to conquer the whole world that is habitable. You have seene (I suppose) the isle Naxos; if not, yet at leastwise the island Thurina neere by; of which twaine, this was in olde time the habitation of Orion; but in the other there dwelt Ephialtes and Otus: as for Alcmaon, he made his abode and residence upon the muddy banke, which the river Achelous had newly gathered and cast up, after it was a little dried and compact together, to avoid the pursute (as the Poets) say of the Furies; but in my conceit rather, because he would decline the offices of State, civill magistracies, seditions broiles, and biting calumniationes fit to furies in hel, he chose such a streight and narrow place to inhabit, where he might leade a life in quietnesse and repose, secured from all such busie affaires. And Tiberius Caesar in his latter daies, lived seveh yeaes (even untill his death) in the little island Caprea, in such wise, as the very temple and imperial throne of the whole world retired and drawn in (as it were) into the heart, for all that time never went out from thence; and yet for his part, the ordinarie cares incident unto the empire, which were brought from all parts and came upon him to amuse his head continually, on every side, would not permit him to enjoy cleerely without turbulent anguish of minde, that intended rest and quietnesse of his, in the said island. But even that man, who may by his departure into some little island be freed and delivered from no small troubles and calamities, is notwithstanding miserable, if he do not efflowres say unto himselfe when he is apart, yea, and chaunt oftentimes these verses of Pindarus:

*Love well the place where Cypres trees do grow,
But thin and small. The Forrest great let go
Of Candie isle, about the Ida hill:
As for my selfe, small lands I hold and will,
By fortune given, and those without an oke;
My heart likewise no griefs nor cares do yoke.*

exempt I am from civill tumults and seditions; I am not subject to the command of princes and governours; my hand is not in the charge and administration of State affaires, nor in any publike ministries or services, which hardly admit excuse or refusall. For considering that Culimachus seemeth not unwisely in one place to say thus: Measure not wisdom by the Persian Schoene: why then should we (meting felicitie with Schenes & Parasanges) complaine, lament and torment our selves, as if we were unhappie, if our fortune be to dwell in a little isle which is not in circuit above two hundred furlongs, and nothing nere foure daies sailing about, as Sticilia is? for what good can a spacious and large region do, for to procure felicitie, or make a man to leade a quiet and peaceable life? Heare you not how Tantalus in the Tragedie crieth out, and saith thus?

*The spacious land and countrey large,
call'd Berecymbian plaine, Daies journeyes twelve right out, I sow cheerely with corne and graine.*

and a little after, he proceedeth to this speech;

*But now my soule, sometime an heavenly power,
Descended thence into this earthly bower,
Speaks thus to me: Learn, and betimes take heed,
Love not this world too much, I do thee need.*

And Naustibolus leaving the wide and large countrey Hyperia, for that the Cyclopes were so neere neighbours unto it, and departing into an island farre remote from other men, where he lived alone by himselfe without conversing with any people:

*From other mortall men apart,
Offurging sea within the hart.*

provided for his citizens and subjects a most pleasant life. As for the islands called Cyclades, they were at first (by report) inhabited by the children of Mimas, and afterwards the offspring of Co-drus and Nelcus held the same, into which, foolish persons now adies thinke themselves fore punished and undone for ever, if they be confined. And yet, what island is there destined and appointed for exiled and banished people, but it is larger than the territorie Scyllantia, wherein Xenophon after that renowned expedition and voiage of his into Perfia, passed his olde age in elegancie and much happinesse? semblably, the Academic; a little pingle or plot of ground, the purchase whereof cost not above three thousand drachmes, was the habitation of Plato, Xenocrates, and Polemon, wherein they kept their schooles, and lived at repose all their life time: and yet I must needs except one day every yeere, upon which, Xenocrates was wont to go downe to the city, for to see the plaies and pastimes exhibited with new Tragedies at the feast called Bacchanales, onely to honour (as folke said) and countenance that solemnitie with his personall presence. Altho Theoricus of Chios challenged and reproched Aristotle many times, for that to live in the court of Philip and Alexander,

*upon the mouth of Borborus to dwell
He chose, and Academic bad farewell.*

Now was this Borborus a river, so called by the Macedonians, which ran along the citie of Pella in Macedonie. As for islands, Homer the Poet doth of purpose and expressly recommend unto us, and celebrate them with heavenly and divine praises, in this wise:

*At Lemnos he arrived then,
whereas the citie stood,
In which sometime that prince divine,
king Thoas made abode:
And what so ever Lesbos isle,
the pallace and the seat
Of gods above come in: enclos'd within her powrie great.*

Also,
*When wooen he had the stately isle,
which Scytos sometime light,
The native place and towne of Mars,
the god of armes and fight.
Likewise,
And those came from Dulichium,
and eke the sacred isles, Against Elis, Eclimades, within sea many miles.*

Moreover it is said, that of famous and renowned men, devout Aeolus, and best beloved of the gods, dwelt in one isle; the most prudent and wise Ulysses in another; Ajax likewise, that right valiant and hardie warriour; and Aleimus the most courteous prince for hospitalitie and entertainment of strangers, were islanders. Zeno the Philosopher when newes was brought unto him: That the ship of his which remained alone of all the rest, was drowned in the sea with all the freight and merchandise therein: Thou hast done well o fortune (quoth he) to drive us to our studying gowne and Philosophers life againe; even so, in mine opinion, there is no reason that a man (unlesse he be very much besotted and transported with the vaine wind of popularity) when he is confined and inclosed within an island, should complaine of fortune therefore, but rather praise her, for that she hath rid him of much anguish of spirit and trouble of his head, delivered him from tedious travell and wandering pilgrimages up and downe in the world from place to place; freed him from the perils of sea, removed him from the tumultuous stirs of the multitude in judicall courts and publicke assemblies of the citie; and reduced him to a seled and staid life, full of rest and tranquillitie, not distracted with any superfluous and needlesse occupations, wherein he may live indeed properly to himselfe, being ranged within the center and circumference of those things which are required onely for necessitie. For what island is there which hath not housen, walking places, stoupes and baines, or that is without fishes or hares, if a man be disposed to passe the time in fishing or hunting; and that which is the greatest matter of all, you may oftentimes there enjoy fully your rest and repose, which other do so much thirst and hunger after; for whereas when we are haply playing at dice, or otherwise keeping close at home, there will be some of these sycophants or busie priers and curious searchers into all our actions, ready to draw us out of our houses of pleasure in the suburbs, or out of our delightful gardens, to make our appearance judicially in the common place, or to performe our service and give attendance in the court: there will be none such about to faile into the Island where thou art confined for to trouble thee; none will come to thee to demand or crave any thing, to borrow monie, to request thy suretyship, or thy assistance for to second him in the sute of any office and magistracie; unless peradventure some of thy best friends onely and neereft kinsfolke, of mere love and affectionate desire to see thee, faile over to for thy sake; for the rest of thy life besides is permitted to be as free and safe as a sanctuary, not subject to any spoile, trouble, or molestation, if thou be willing & can skill to use thy liberty and repose. As for him who thinketh those to be happy who trudge up and downe in the world abroad, spending most part of their time out of their owne houses, either in common innes and hostleries, or els in ferrying from place to place, he is much like unto him that supposeth the wandering planets to be in a better state than the other starres which be fixed in the firmament and remove not; and yet there is not one of the said planets but is carried round in a peculiar and proper sphere of the owne, as it were in a certaine Isle, keeping alwaies a just order in their revolution: for according as Heracitus saith; The very sunne himselfe will never passe beyond his bounds; and if he do, the furies which are the ministers of justice will finde him out and be ready to encounter him. But these and all such like reasons my good friend we are to alledge unto them and sing in their eares, who being sent away and confined to some one Isle, can not possibly change for another country, nor have commerce and dealing in any place els whatsoever, those I say,

*Whom surging waves of sea both night and day
Enclose perforce, and cause them thereto stay.*

As for you unto whom no certaine place is limited and assigned for to inhabit, but who are debarred and excluded onely out of one, are thus to thinke, that the exclusion out of one citie alone, is an overture and ready way made unto all others.

Now if any man will object and say; In this case of exile and banishment we are disabled for bearing rule and office of State, we sit not at counsell table in the Senate house; we are not presidents in the publicke plaies and solemnities &c. You may answere and reply againe in this manner; neither are we troubled with factions and civil dissensions; we are not called upon, nor charged with payments in publicke levies and exactions; neither be we bound to make court unto great governors, and to give attendance at their gates; nor to take care and regard whether he who is chosen to succeede us in the government of our province, be either halzie and cholericke, or otherwise given to oppression and hard dealing; but as Archilochus making no account at all of the fruitfull corne-fields and plenteous vineyards in Thasos, despised and contemned the whole Isle because of some other rough, hard, and uneven places in it, giving out thereof in these termes,

*This Island like an asses baske doth sticke,
All over spread with woods so wild and thicke.*

even so we casting our eies and fixing them upon that part onely of exile which is the worst and vilest of the rest, doe contemne and make no reckoning of the repose from businesse, the libertie also and leisure which it doth afford. And yet the kings of Persia be reputed happy, in that they passe their winter time in Babylon, the summer in Media, and the most sweet and pleasant part of the spring at Susa. May not hee likewise who is departed out of his owne native country during the solemnities of the mysteries of Ceres, make his abode within the city Eleusine; all the time of the Bacchanales, celebrate that feast in Argos; and when the Pythian games & plaies are exhibited, go to Delphos; as also when the Isthmain pastimes be represented, make a journey likewise to Corinth; in case he be a man who taketh pleasure in the diversitie of shewes and publicke spectacles, if not, then either sit still and rest, or else walke up and downe, reade somewhat, or take a nap of sweet sleepe without molestation or interruption of any man; and according as Diogenes was wont to say, Aristotle dineth when it pleaseth king Philip; but Diogenes taketh his dinner when Diogenes thinketh it good himselfe, without any businesse & affaires to distract him, and no magistrate, ruler, or captain there was to interrupt his ordinary time and manner of diet. This is the reason why very few of the wisest and most prudent men that ever were,

were, have beene buried in the countries where they were borne; but the most part of them without any constraint or necessitie to enforce them, have willingly weighed anker, and of their owne accord failed to another roade or haven to harbour in, and there to lead their life; for some of them have departed to Athens, others have forsaken Athens & gone to other places: for what man ever gave out such a commendation of his owne native country as did Empirides in these verses, in the person of a woman:

*Our people all at first no strangers were,
From foraine parts who thither did arrive;
Time out of minde those that inhabite here,
Were borne in place, and so remain'd alive.
All cities else and nations at one word
With aliens peopled be, who like to men
At table play or else upon cheffe-board
Removed have, and leapt some now some then.
If women we may be allow'd a grace
Our native soile, and with proude words exalt,
Presume we dare to say that in this place,
A temperate aire we have without default,
Where neither heat nor cold excessive is;
If ought there be that noble Greece doth yeeld,
Or Asia rich of best commodities,
And daintiest fruits, by river or by field,
We have it here in soile plentifull
To hunt, to catch, to reape, to crop and pull.*

And yet even he who hath set such goodly praises upon his native country, left the same, went into Macedonia, and there lived in the court of King Archelaus. You have heard likewise (I suppose) this little Epigram in verse:

*Enterred and entomb'd lieth here,
Euphorion, sonne the Poet Aeschylus
(In Athens towne though borne sometime he were)
To Gelas neere, in corne so plenteous.*

For he also abandoned his owne country, and went to dwell in Sicilie, like as Simonides did before him. And whereas this title or inscription is commonly read (This is the Historie written by Herodotus the Halicarnassian) many there be who correct it and write in this manner; Herodotus the Thurian, for that he removed out of the country wherein he was borne, became an inhabitant among the Thuriens, and enioied the freedome of that colonie. As for that heavenly and divine spirit in the knowledge of Muses and Poetrie,

*Homerus, who with wooddrom pen,
Set forth the battels Phrygien.*

what was it that caused so many cities to debate about the place of his nativitie, chalingeing everie one unto themselves, but onely this; that hee seemed not to praise and extoll any one citie above the rest. Moreover, to Jupiter surnamed Hospital, know we not that there be many, & those right great, honors done. Now if any one shall say unto me, that these personages were all of them ambitious, aspiring to great honor and glorie, doe no more, but have recourse unto the Sages, and those wise schooles and learned colledges of Athens; call to minde and consider the renowned clerkes and famous Philosophers, either in Lycæum or the Academie: go to the galerie Stoa, the learned schoole Palladium, or the Musicke-schoole Odæum. If you affect, love and admire above all other the sect of the Peripateticks, Aristotle the prince thereof was borne in Stagira, a citie of Macedonia; Theophrastus in Ereus; Strato came from Lampascus; Glycon from Troas; Ariston from Chios; and Critolaus from Phaselus. If your minde stand more to praise the Stoicks, Cleanthes was of Assos; Zeno was a Citizen; Chrysippus came from Soli; Diogenes from Babylon; and Antipater from Tharum; and Archidamus being an Athenian borne, went to dwell among the Parthians, and left behind him at Babylon in succession, the Stoicke discipline and Philosophie. Who was it that chased and drave these men out of their native countries? certes none, but even of their owne accord and voluntary motion they sought all abroad for their contentment and repose; which hardly or not at all can they enjoy at home in their owne houses, who are in any authoritie and reputation; so that, as they have taught us verie well out of their bookes,

bookes, other good sciences which they professed; for this one point of living in quietnes and rest they have shewed unto us by practise and example. And even in these daies also, the most renowned and approved clerkes, yea and greatest men of make and name, live in strange countreies, farre remote from their owne habitations; not transported by others, but of themselves remooving thither; not banished, sent away, and confined; but willing to flie and avoide the troublesome affaires, negotiations and businesse, which their native countreies amuse them with. That this is true, it may appeere by the most approved, excellent, and commendable workes and compositions, which ancient writers have left unto posteritie; for the absolute finishing whereof it seemeth that the Muses used the helpe and meanes of their exile. Thus Thucydides the Athenian penned the warre betweene the Peloponnesians and the Athenians whiles he was in Thracia, and namely neere unto a place called the Forest of the Poese. Xenophon compiled his storie at Scillus in Elea; Philip wrote in Epirus; Timaeus who was borne at Taurumini in Sicilie, became a writer in Athens; Andronion the Athenian at Megara, and Bacchides the Poet in Peloponnesus; who all and many others besides, being banished out of their countreies, were never discouraged nor cast downe, but shewed the vivacitie and vigor of their good spirits, and tooke their exile at fortunes hands as a good maintenance and provision of their journey; by meanes whereof they live in fame and renowne now after their death: whereas on the other side, there remaineth no memoriall at all of those, by whose factions and sidings they were driven out and exiled. And therefore he deserveth to be well mocked, who thinketh that banishment carrieth with it some note of infamie and reproch, as necessarily adherent thereto. For what say you to this? Is Diogenes to be counted infamous, whom when King Alexander saw sitting in the sunne, he approached neere and standing by him, demanded whether he stood in need of any thing or no? he had no other answer from him but this, that he had need of nothing else; but that he should stand a little out of the sunne-shine, and not shadow him as he did; whereupon Alexander wondering at his magnanimitie and haughtie courage, said presently unto those friends that were about him; If I were not Alexander I would be Diogenes. And was Camillus disgraced any way for being banished out of Rome, considering that even at this daie he is reputed and taken for the second founder thereof? Neither lost Themistocles the glorie which he had woen among the Greekes by his exile, but rather acquired thereto great honor & estimation with the Barbarians. And no man is there so base minded and carelesse of honor and credit, but he would choose rather to be Themistocles banished as he was, than Leobates his accuser, and the cause of his banishment; yea, and to be Cicero who was exiled, than Clodius who chased him out of Rome; or Timotheus, who was constrained to abandon and forsake his native countrey, than Aristophan who enticed him and caused him to leave the same. But for that the authoritie of Euripides who seemeth mightily to defame and condemne banishment, mooveth many men; let us consider what be his severall questions and answeres to this point:

IOCASTA.

How then is it a great calamitie
To loose the place of our nativitie?

POLYNICES.

The greatest crosse I hold it is doubtlesse,
And more indeede than my tongue can expresse.

IOCASTA.

The manner would I gladly understand,
And what doth grieve man but from native land?

POLYNICES.

This one thing first, the forest grieve must be,
That of their speech they have not libertie.

IOCASTA.

A spite it is no doubt, and that of severile kind,
For men to be debarred to speake their mind.

POLYNICES.

Besides, they must endure the foolishnesse,
And ignorance of rulers more or lesse.

But herein I cannot allow of his sentence and opinion as well and truly delivered. For first and foremost, not to speake what a man thinketh, is not the point of a slavish and base person, but rather he is to be counted a wise and prudent man, who can hold his tongue at those times and in such such occasions as require taciturnitie and silence; which the same Poet hath taught us in another place more wisely, when he saith,

*Silence is good when that it doth avails,
Likewise to speake in time and not to faile.*

And as for the folly and ignorance of great and mightie persons, we must abide no lesse when we tarrie at home, than in exile; nay it falleth out many times, that men at home feare much more the calumniation and violence of those who unjustly are in high places of authoritie within cities, than if they were abroad and out of their owne countreies. Again, this also is most false and absurd, that the said Poet depriveth banished persons of their libertie and franke speech. Certes, this were a wonderfull matter, that Theodorus wanted his freedome of tongue, considering that when King Lyfimachus said unto him: And hath thy countrey chafed and cast thee out, being so great a person among them; Yea (quoth he againe) for that it was no more able to beare me, than Semele to beare Bacchus: neither was he daunted and afraid, notwithstanding that the King shewed unto him Telephorus enclosed within an iron cage, whose eies he had caused before to be pulled out of his head, his nose and eares to be cropt, and his tongue to be cut, adding withal these words: See how I handle those that displease and abuse my person. And what shall we say of Diogenes? VVanted he (thinke you) his libertie of speech? who being come into the campe of King Philip, at what time time as he made an expedition against the Grecians, invaded their countrey and was ready to give them battell, was apprehended and brought before the king as a spie, and charged therewith: I am indeed (quoth he) come hither to spie your invincible avarice, ambition, and folly, who are about now to hazard in one houre (as it were) with the cast of a die, not onely your crowne and dignitie, but also your life and person; feebly, what thinke you of Annibal the Carthaginian? was he tongue-tied before Antiochus, banished though himselfe were, and the other a mightie monarch? For when he advised Antiochus to take the opportunite presented unto him, and to give battell unto the Romans his enemies, and the king having sacrificed unto the gods answered againe, that the entrails of the beast killed for sacrifice, would not permit but forbid him so to do: Why then (quoth he by way of reproofe and rebuke) you will doe that belike, which a peece of dead flesh biddeth you, and not that which a man of wisdom and understanding counsellith you unto. But neither Geometricians, nor those that use linearie demonstrations, if haply they be banished, are deprived of their libertie, but that they may discoure & speake frankly of their art, and science of such things as they have learned and known: how then should good, honest and honorable persons be debarred of that freedome, in case they be exiled? But in truth, it is cowardise and basenes of minde, which alwaies stoppeth the voice, tieth the tongue, fliteth the wind-pipe, and causeth men to be speechlesse. But proceed we to that which followeth afterwards in Euripides:

IOCASTA.

But thus we say, those that are banished
With hopes alive of better daies be fed.

POLYNICES.

Good eies they have, as farre off they doe see,
Staying for things that most uncertaine be.

Certainly these words implice rather a blame and reprehension of folly, than of exile. For they be not those who have learned and doe know how to apply themselves unto things present, and to use their estate such as it is, but such as continually depend upon the expectance of future fortunes, and cover evermore that which is absent and wanting, who are tossed to and fro with hopes in a little punt or bote floating upon the water; yea although they were never in their life time without the wals of the citie wherein they were borne: moreover whereas we read in the same Euripides,

IOCASTA.

Thy fathers friends and allies have not thy Beene kind and helpfull to thee, as they may?

POLYNICES.

Looke to thy selfe, from troubles Gods bee blest,
Friends helpe is naught, if one be in distress.

IOCASTA.

Thy noble blood, from whence thou art descended:

Aa 2

Hath

Hath is not thee aduon'd and much amended?

POLYNICES.

I hold it ill to be in want and need,

For parentage and birth doth not men feed.

These speeches of Polynices are not onely untrue, but also bewray his unthankfulnesse, when he seemeth thus to blame his want of honor and due regard for his nobility, and to complaine that hee was destitute of friends by occasion of his exile, considering that in respect of his noble birth, banished though he were, yet so highly honoured he was that he was thought woorthie to be matched in marriage with a kings daughter, and as for friends, allies, and confederates, hee was able to gather a puissant armie of them, by whose aide and power he returned into his owne country by force of armes, as himselfe testifieth a little after in these words:

*Many a lord and captaine brave here stands
With me in field, both from Mycenæ bright,
And cities more of Greece, whose helping hands (Though loth) I must needs use in claime of right.*

Much like also be the speeches of his mother lamenting in this wise;

*No nuptiall torch at all I lighted have
To thee, as doth a wedding feast beseme,
No marriage song was sung, nor thee to lave
Was water brought from faire Ilmenus streame.*

whom it had become and behooved rather to rejoice and be glad in heart, when she heard that her sonne was so highly aduanced and married into so roiall an house; but in taking griefe and sorrow her selfe that there was no wedding torch lighted, & that the river Ilmenus afforded no water to bathe in at his wedding; as if new married bridegroomes could not be furnished either with fire or water in the city Argos; she attributeth unto exile, the inconveniences which more truly proceed from vanitie and tollie.

But some man will say unto me; That to be banished is a note of ignominie and reproch: true it is indeed, but among fooles onely, who thinke likewise that it is a shame to be poore, to be bald, to be small of stature, yea and to be a stranger forsooth, a tenant, in-mate or alien inhabitant: For certes such as will not suffer themselves to be caried away with these vaine persuasions, nor do subscribe thereto, esteeme & have in admiration good and honest persons, never respecting whether they be poore, strangers, and banished or no: Do we not see that all the world doth honor and reverence the temple of Theseus as well as Parthenon and Eleusinium, temples dedicated to Minerva, Ceres, and Proserpina? and yet was Theseus banished from Athen; even that Theseus by whose meanes the same citie was first peopled, and is at this day inhabited; and that citie lost he which he held not from another, but founded first himselfe. As for Eleusis what beautie at all would remaine in it if we dishonor Eumolpus and be ashamed of him who remooving out of Thracia, instituted at first among the Greeks the religion of sacred mysteries, which continueth in force and is observed at this day: what shall we say of Codrus who became king of Athen? whose sonne I pray you was he? was not Melanthius his father a banished man from Megara. Can you chuse but commend the answer of Antisthenes to one who said unto him; Thy mother is a Phrygian: So was (quoth he) the mother of the gods: why answer you not likewise when you are reproched with your banishment? even so was the father of that victorious conqueror Hercules: the grand-fire likewise of Bacchus, who being sent out for to seeke lady Europa, never returned backe into his native countrie:

*For being a Phanician borne,
At Thebes he after did arrive,
Far from his native soile before,
And there begot a sonne belive,
Who Bacchus did engender he,
That mooves to furie women, hight
Mad Bacchus, runneth to and fro,
In service, such is his delight.*

As for that which the Poet Aeschylus would seeme covertly by these darke words to insinuate, or rather to shew a farre off, when he saith thus:

And chaste Apollo sacred though be were,

TO

Yet banished a time, heaven did forbear.

I am content to passe over in silence, and will forbear to utter according as Herodotus saith: and whereas Empedocles in the very beginning of his philosophie maketh this praeface:

*An ancient law there stands in force,
Decreed by gods above,
Grounded upon necessity,
and never to remoue:
That after men hath steint a his hands
in bloodshed horrible,
And in remorse of sinne is vexed with horror terrible.
The long live'd angels which attend in heaven, shall chase him quite,
For many thousand yeeres from view
of every blessed wight:
By vertue of this law, am I from gods, exiled now,
And wander heere and there through time
the world I know not how.*

This he meaneth not of himselfe alone, but of all us after him, whom he declareth and sheweth by these words to be meere strangers, passengers, forreiners, and banished persons in this world. For it is not bloud (quoth he) o men, nor vitall spirit contemperate together, that hath given unto us the substance of our soule and beginning of our life; but hereof is the bodie only composed and framed, which is earthly and mortall; but the generation of the soule which cometh another way, and descendeth hither into these parts beneath, he doth mitigate and seeme to disguise by the most gentle and milde name that hee could devise, calling it a kinde of pilgrimage from the naturall place; but to use the right tearme indeed, and to speake according to the very truth, she doth vague and wander as banished, chased and driven by the divine lawes, and statutes to and fro, untill such time as it sedeth to a bodie, as an oyster or shell fish to one rocke or other in an island beaten and dashed upon with many windes and waves of the sea round about (as Plato saith) for that it doth not remember nor call to mind from what height of honor, & from how blessed an estate it is translated, not changing as a man would say Sardinia for Athen, nor Corinth for Lemnos or Scyros, but her resistance in the very heaven and about the moone, with the abode upon earth, and with a terrestriall life; whereas it thinketh it strange and as much discontented heere for that it hath made exchange of one place for another not farre distant; much like unto a poore plant that by remooving doth degenerate and begin to wither away: and yet we see, that for certaine plants some soile is more commodious and sortable than another, wherein they will like, thrive, and prosper better: whereas contrariwise there is no place that taketh from a man his felicitie, no more than it doth his vertue, fortitude or wisdom: for Anaxagoras during the time that he was in prison wrote his Quadrature of the circle: and Socrates even when he drunke poison, discouraged as a philosopher, exhorting his friends and familiars to the studie of philosophie, and was by them reputed happie; but contrariwise Phaeton and Icarus who (as the poets do report) would needs mount up into heaven, through their owne folly and inconsiderate rashnes, fell into most greivous and wofull calamities.

THAT WE OUGHT NOT TO TAKE UP MONEY UPON VSVRIE.

The Summarie.

HHe covetous desire of earthly goods, is a passion incurable; but especially after that it hath gotten the masterie of the soule, in such sort, as the advertisement which are made in regard of covetous men, be not proposed for any thing els but for the profit and benefit of those persons who are to keepe themselves from the nets and snares of these enemies of humane societie. Now among all those who have need of good counsels in this behalfe, we must ranger them that take up money upon interest, who serving as a pray and bootie to these greedy and hungry buyers, ought so much the rather to looke unto their owne preservation, if they would not be cruelly devoured. And as this infortunie hath bene in the world ever since the entrie of sinne, that alwaies some or other, yea, and great numbers have endeavoured to make their commoditie and gaine by the losse and dammage of their neighbours; so we may see here, that in Plutarchs time things were grown to a wonderfull confusion, the which is nothing diminished since; but contrariwise it seemeth that in these our daies it is come to the very height. And for to apply some remedie hereto, our author leaveth usurers altogether as persons gracelesse, reprobate and incapable of all remonstrance, addresse himselfe unto borrowers, to the end that he might discover and lay open unto them the snares and nets into which they plunge themselves; and thus he doth without specifying or particularising over meere of usurie, because there is no meane or measure limited nor any end of this furious desire of gathering and heaping up things corruptible. Considering then that covetous folke have neither nerve nor veine that reacheth or tendeth to the pittie of their neighbours, meet it is and good reason that borrowers should have some mercie and compassion of themselves, to weigh and ponder well the grave discourses of this author, and to apply the same unto the right use. He saith therefore, that the principall meane to keepe and save themselves from the teeth of usurie, is to make the best of their owne, and shift with those things that they have about them, before they approach unto the denne of this hungry and greedy beast, and that men ought to make an hand & quick dispatch of that which is not very necessary, before they come thither; where he saith that those who had never lay to gage and pawnne their goods, and remaine under the burden of usurie than to sell up all and discharge themselves at once. After this, he presenteth the true remedie of this mischief, namely, to spare and spend in measure; and to cause us to be more warie and better advised, he propoeth the lively image of this horrible monster, whom we call an Usurer, describing him in his colour, with all his practices and passions. Which done, he vieweth the source of borrowing money upon interest, and the way to stop the same; he directeth his pen particularly first unto the poore, giving them a goodly lesson, and then unto the richer sort, teaching the one as well as the other, how they are to demean and carie themselves, that they be not exposed in the clutches of usurers. And for a conclusion, he exhorteth them to behold the example of certaine Philosophers by name, who chose rather to abandon & forsake all their goods, than to misdeale themselves in the possession & holding thereof.

THAT WE OUGHT NOT TO take up money upon usurie.

Plate in his books of Lawes, permitteth not one neighbour to make bolde with anothers waite, before he have digged and funke a pitte deepe in his owne ground, that he is come to a veine of clay or potters earth; untill (I say) he have founded thorowly, and found that the plot of ground is not apt to ingender water, or yeeld a spring; [for the said potters clay being by nature fattie, solide and strong, retaineth that moisture which it hath once received, and will not let it soke or passe thorow:] but allowed they are, and ought to furnish themselves with water from others, when they have no meanes to find any of their own; forasmuch as the law interdicteth to provide for mens necessitie, and not to favour their idleness; even so there ought to be an ordinance and act as touching money; That it might not be lawfull for those to borrow upon usurie, nor to goe into other mens purses (as it were) to draw water at their welles or pits, before they have cast about all meanes at home, searched every way, and gathered (as it were) from every gutter and spring, trying and assaying how to draw and come by that which may serve their owne turnes, and supplie their present necessities. But now it falleth out contrariwise, that manie there be, who to furnish their foolish and riotous expences, or els to accomplish their superfluous and chargeable delights, never serve their owne turnes, nor make use of those things which they have, but are readie to seeke unto others, even to their great cost, though they stand in no need at all: for an undoubted & certaine proofe hereof, marke how usurers do not ordinarily put forth their money unto those who are in necessity & distresse, but to such as be desirous to purchase and get that which is superfluous, and whereof they stand not in need; inasmuch as that which is credited out and delivered unto him that borroweth, is a good proofe and sufficient testimonie, that he hath somewhat to take to of his owne; whereas indeed he ought (since he hath wherewith) to looke unto it, that he take not upon interest, and contrariwise, not to be credited not to be in the usurers booke, is an argument that such an one is needie.

Why doest thou repaire and make court (as it were) obsequiously to a banker or merchant? goe thy waies and borrow of thine owne banke, make a friend of thine owne stocke; flaggons thou halt and pots, chargers, balons and dishes all of silver plate; imploy the same about thy necessities, for to supply thy wants, and when thou hast disurnished thy table and cup-board, the gentle towne Amis or els the idle Tenedos, will make up all again with faire vessel of earth and pottery, which is much more neat & pure than those of silver; for these cary not the strong sinell nor unpleasant sent of usury, which like rust or canker, every day more & more, fullieth, fretteth & eateth into thy costly magnificence; these will not put thee in minde daily of the calend and new moones, which being in it selfe the most sacred & holy day of the moneth, is by meanes of the usurers, become odious and accursed. For as touching those, who choose rather to lay their goods to gage, & to pawn them for to borrow money thereupon & pay for use, than to sel them right out, I am verily perswaded that god Jupiter himselfe furnished Ctesim, that is, Possessor, can not save them from beggery. Abalthe they are to receive the price and value of their goods to the woorth; but they be not ashamed to pay interest for the lone of money. And yet that wife and politike Pericles caused the costly robe and attire of the statue of Minerva weighing forty talents in fine gold, to be made in such sort, that he might take it off and put it on as he would at his pleasure; To the ende (quoth he) that when we stand in need of money for maintenance of warre, we may serve our turnes therewith for the time, and afterwards put in the place againe another of no lesse weight and woorth; even so welikewise in our accusations and affaires, like as in the besieging of a citie, ought never to admit the garrison of an usurer or enemy, nor to endure to see before our eyes our owne goods delivered out for to continue in perpetuall servitude, but rather to cut-off from our labour all that is neither profitable nor necessarie; likewise from our beds, from our couches, and our ordinare expences in diet whatsoever is heedlesse, thereby to maintaine and keepe our selves free, in hope and with full intent to supply and make amends againe for it, if fortune afterwards smile upon us. Certes, the Romane dames in times past were willing to part with their jewels and ornaments of gold, yea and give them away as an offering offering of first fruits to Apollo Pythius, whereof was made a golden cup, and the same sent to the citie of Delphi. And the Matrons of Carthage shone the haire of their heads, to make thereof twisted cords for to winde up and bend their engines and instruments of artillerie in the defence of their country, when the citie was besieged. But we, as if we were ashamed of our owne sufficiency, and to stand upon our owne bottomes, seeke to enthrall our selves by gages and obligations; whereas it behooved us much more by restraining our selves and reducing all to such things onely as be profitable and good for us, of those needlesse, unprofitable and superfluous vessels which we have, after they be either melted, broken in pieces, or sold, to build a privileged chappell of libertie, for our selves, our wives and children. For the goddess Diana in Ephesus, yielded sanctuarie, franchise and savegard unto all debtors against their creditours, who fled for succour into her temple. But the sanctuarie indeed of parsimonie, frugalitie and moderate expense, into which no usurers can make entrie, for to hale and pull out of it any debtor prisoner, standeth alwaies open for those that are wise, and affordeth unto them a large space, of joyous and honorable repose. For like as that Prophetesse which gave oracles in the temple of Pythius Apollo, about the time of the Medians warre, made answer unto the Athenian Embassadors: That God gave unto them for their safetie a wall of wood; whereupon they leaving their lands and possessions, abandoning their citie, and forsaking their houses and all the goods therein, had recourse unto their ships for to save their libertie; even so, God giveth unto us wooden tables, earthen vessels, and garments of course cloth, if we would live in freedome:

*Set not thy minde upon steeds of great price,
And chariots brave in silver harness digbt,
With claspes, with bookes, and studs by fine device
T'wrought, in race to shew a godly sight,*

for how swift soever they be, these usurers will soone overtake them and run beyond. But rather get upon the next asse thou meetest with, or the first pack-horse that cometh in thy way, to flee from the usurer, a cruell enemy and meere tyrant, who demandeth not at thy hands fire and water, as sometimes did that barbarous King of Media; but that which woortheth thy libertie, woundeth thine honor and credit by proscriptions, writs, and open proclamations. If thou pay him not to his content, he is ready to trouble thee; if thou have wherewith to satisfie him, he will not receive thy payment, unless he list; if thou prize and sell thy goods, he will have them under their worth; art thou not disposed to make a sale of them? hee will force thee to it; dost thou sue him for his extreame dealing, he will seeme to offer parley of agreement; if thou sweare unto him that thou wilt make payment, he will impose upon thee hard conditions, and have thee at command; if thou goe to his house for to speake and confesse with him, hee will locke the gates against thee; and if thou stay at home and keepe house, thou shalt have him rapping at thy doore; he will not away but take up his lodging there with thee. For in what stead served the law of Solon in Athens, wherein it was ordained, that among the Athenians, mens bodies should not be obliged for any civill debt? considering that they be in bondage and slavery to all banquers and usurers, who force men to keepe in their heads; and that which more is, not to them alone (for that were not such a great matter) but even to their verie slaves, being proud, insolent, barbarous and outrageous, such as Plato describeth the devils and fiery executioners in hel to be, who torment the soules of wicked and godlesse persons. For surely these cursed usurers make thy hall and judiciall place of justice, no better than a very hell and place of torment to their poore debtors, where after the manner of greedie geirs and hungrie griffons, they flay, mangle and eate them to the verie bones,

*And of their beaks and talons keene,
The markes within their flesh be seene.*

And some of them they stand continually over, not suffering them to touch and taste their owne proper goods; when they have done their vintage and gathered in their corne & other fruits of the earth, making them fast & pine away like unto Tantalus. And like as king Darius sent against the citie of Athens his lieutenants generall Darius and Artaphernes, with chaines, cordes and halters in their hands, therewith to binde the prisoners which they should take; semblable these usurers bring into Greece with them their boxes and caskets full of schedules, bills, hand-writings, and contracts obligatorie, which be as good as so many irons and fetters to hang up on their poore debtors; and thus they go up and downe leaping from citie to citie, where they sow not as they passe along good and profitable seede, as Triptolemus did in old time; but plant their rootes of debts, which bring forth infinite troubles and intolerable usuries, whereof there is

is no end, which eating as they goe and spreading their spaunes round about, in the end cause whole cities to stoupe and stinke, yea and be ready to suffocate and strangle them. It is reported of hares that at one time they suckle young leverets and be ready to kinnule others that be in their bellies, and withall to conceive a fresh; but the debts of these barbarous, wicked and cruell usurers, do bring forth before they conceive. For in putting out their money, they redemand it presently; in laying it downe, they take it up, they deliver that againe for interest, which they received and tooke in consideration of lone and use. It is said of the Messenians citie,

*Gate after gate a man shall here find,
And yet one gate ther's alwaies behind.*

10 But it may better be said of usurers:

*Usurie here, upon usurie doth grow,
And end thereof you never shall know.*

and here withall in some sort they laugh at natural philosophers, who holde this Axiome, That of nothing can be engendered nothing; for with them usurie is bred of that which neither is, nor ever was; of that I say which never had subsistence nor being. Howbeit these men thinke it a shame & reproch to be a publicane, and take to farme for a rent the publicke revenewes, notwithstanding the lawes do permit and allow that calling, whereas themselves against all the lawes of the world, exact a rent and custome for that which they put forth to usurie; or rather to speake a truth in lending their money they defraude their debtors as bankrupts do their creditors. For the poore debtor who receiveth lesse than he hath set downe in his obligation, is most falsely coulened, deceived, and cut short of that which he ought to have. And verily the Persians reputing lying to be a sinne, but in a second degree: for in the first place they reckon to owe money and be indebted; in as much, as leasing followeth commonly those that be in debt. But yet usurers ly more than they, neither are there any that practise more falsehood and deceit in their day debt bookes wherein they write, that to such a one they have delivered so much, whereas indeed it is faire lesse; and so the motive of their lying is faire avarice, & neither indigence nor poverty, but even a miserable covetousnes and desire ever to have more and more; the end whereof turneth neither to pleasure nor profit unto themselves, but to the losse and ruine of those whom they wrong and wrong: for neither till they those grounds which they take away from their debtors; nor dwell in the houses out of which they turne them; nor eate their meat upon those tables which they have from them; ne yet clad themselves with their apparell, of which they spoile them; but first, one is destroyed, than a second followeth after, and is assured as a prey by the other. And this is much like to a wilde fire, which still consumeth, and yet encreaseth alwaies by the utter decay and destruction of all that falleth into it, and devoureth one thing after another. And the usurer which maintaineth this fire, blowing and kindling it with the ruine of so many people, gaineth thereby no more fruit than this, that after a certaine time, he taketh his booke of accounts in hand, and there readeth what a number of debtors he hath bought out of house and home, how many he had dispossessed of their land and living, from whence he hath come and whither he hath gone in turning, winding, and heaping up his silver. Now I would not that you should thus thinke of me, that I speake at this upon any deadly war and enmitie that I have sworne against usurers,

*For God be praised they neither horses mine
Have driven away, nor oxen, ne yet kine.*

But onely to shew unto them who are so ready to take up money upon usurie, what a villanous, shamefull, and base thing there is in it, and how this proceedeth from nothing else but extreame folly and timiditie of heart. If thou have wherewith to weld the world, never come into the usurers booke, considering thou hast no need to borrow. Hast thou not wherewith, yet take not money up and pay not interest, because thou shalt have no means to make payment. But let us consider the one and the other apart by it selfe. Old Cato said unto a certaine aged man, who behaved himselfe verie badly: My friend (quoth he) considering that old age of it selfe hath so manie evils; how cometh it to passe, that you adde thereto moreover the reproch and shame of leawdnesse and misdemeanor? even so may we say, seeing that povertie of it selfe hath so many and so great miseries, do not you over and above go and heape thereupon the troubles and anguishes that come of borrowing and being in debt; neither take thou from penurie that onely good thing, wherein it excelleth riches, to wit, the want of carking and pensive cares; for otherwise thou shalt be subject unto the mockerie implied by this common proverbe:

*A goat alone when beare unmet it may,
An ox upon my shoulder you do lay.*

Semblably, you being not able to sustaine povertie alone, do surcharge your selfe with an usurer, a burden hardly supportable even for a rich and wealthie man. How then would you have me to live? haply some man will say: And doest thou indeed aske this question, having hands and feet of thine owne? having the gift of speech, voice, and being a man, unto whom it is given both to love and also to be loved; as well to doe a pleasure, as to receive a courtesie with thanksgiving. Thou maist teach Grammar, bring up yong children, be a potter or doore-keeper; thou maist be a sailer or mariner, thou maist row in a barge or galley: for none of all these trades is more reprochfull, odious, or troublefome, than to heare one say unto thee: Pay me mine owne, or discharge the debt that thou owest me. Rutilius that rich Romane comming upon a time at Rome to Musonius the Philosopher, said unto him thus in his care: Musonius, Jupiter (surnamed Saviour, whom you and such other Philosophers as you are, make profession to imitate and follow, taketh up no money at interest: but Musonius smiling againe, returned him this present answer: No more doth he put fourth any money for use.

Now this Rutilius who was an usurer, reproched the other for taking money at interest, which was a foolish arrogant humour of a Stoicke: for what need hadst thou Rutilius, to meddle with Jupiter Saviour, and alledge his name, considering that a man may report the selfe same by those very things which are familiar and apparent? The swallowes are not in the usurers booke, the pismiers pay not for use of money, and yet to them hath not nature given either hands or reason, or any art and myserie; whereas the hath indued man with such abundance of understanding, and aptnesse to learne and practise, that he can skill not onely to nourish himselfe, but also to keepe horses, hounds, partridges, hares and jaies: why doest thou then disable and condemne thy selfe, as if thou wert lesse docible and sensible than a jay, more mute than a partridge, more idle than a dogge, in that thou canst make no meanes to have good of a man, neither by double diligence, by making court, by observance and service, nor by mainteining his quarrell and entering into combat in his defence? feelt thou not how the earth doth bring forth many things, and how the sea affordeth as many for the use of man? And verily as Crates saith:

*I saw my selfe how Mycilius wood did card,
And how with him his wife the rols did spin:
Thus during warre when times were extreame hard,
Both jointly wrought, to keepe them from famine.*

King Antigonus when he had not of a long time scene Cleantes the Philosopher, meeting him one day in Athens, spake unto him, and said: How now Cleantes, doest thou grinde at the mill, and turne the querne-stone still? Yea sir (quoth Cleantes againe) I grinde yea, and I doe it for to earne my living; howbeit, for all that, I give not over my profession of Philosophie. O the admirable courage and high spirit of this man, who comming from the mill, with that verie hand which turned about the stone, ground the meale and kneaded the dough, wrote of the nature of the gods, of the moone, of the starres and the sunne! But we do thinke all these to be base and servile works; and yet verily, because we would be free (God wot) we care not to thrust our selves into debt, we pay for the use of money, we flatter vile and base persons, we give them presents, we invite and feast them, we yeeld (as it were) tribute under-hand unto them; and thus we do not in regard of povertie, (for no man useth to put forth his money into a poore mans hand) but even upon a superfluity and riotous expence of our owne: for if we could content our selves with those things that are necessarie for the life of man, there would not be an usurer in the world, no more than there are Centaures and monstrous Gorgones. But excesse it is and deintinesse, which hath ingendered usurers; like as the same hath bred gold-smithes, silver-smithes, confectioners, perfumers, and diers of gallant colours. We come not in debt to bakers and vintners for our bread and wine; but wee owe rather for the price and purchase of faire houses and lands, for a great number and retinue of slaves, of fine mules, of trimme halles and dining chambers, of rich tables and the costly furniture belonging thereto, besides other foolish and excessive expences, which we often-times are at, when we exhibit plaies and solemne pastimes into whole cities for to gratifie and do pleasure unto the people; and that upon a faire ambition and desire of popular favour; and many times wee receive no other fruit of all our cost and labour, but ingratitude. Now he that is once enwrapped in debt, remaineth a debtour still all the daies of his life; and he fareth like to an horse, who after he hath once received the bit into his mouth,

mouth, changeth his rider oftsoones, and is neuer unriden, but one or other is alwaies on his backe. No way and meanes there is to avoid from thence, and to recover those faire pastures and pleasant meadows, out of which those indebted persons are turned; but they wander astray to and fro, like to those cursed fiends and maligne spirits, whom Empedocles writeth to have bene driven by the gods out of heaven:

*For such the heavenly power first chas'd downe to the sea beneath;
The sea againe, up to the earth did cast them by and by;
Then after wards, the earth them did unto the beames bequeath
Of restlesse sunne, and they at last sent them to starrie sky.*

Thus fall they into the hands of usurers or bankers, one after another; now of a Corinthian, then of a Patrian, and after of an Athenian; so long, untill when all of them have had a fling at him, he become in the end, wasted, eaten out, & consumed with usurie upon usurie, for like as he that is stepped into a quavewire, must either at first get forth of it, or els continue still there, and not remove at all out of one place; for he that striveth, turneth and windeth every way, not only doth wet and drench his bodie, but mireth it all over, and beraith himselfe more than he was at first, with filthy dirt; even so they that do nothing but change one banke for another, making a transcript of their name out of one usurers booke into anothers, loading their shoulders oftsoones with new and fresh usuries, become alwaies overcharged more and more; and they resemble for all the world, those persons who are diseased with the cholerick passion or flux, who will nor admit of any perfect cure to purge it at once, but continually taking away a certaine portion of the humor, make roome for more & more still, to gather and ingender in the place; for even so these are not willing to be ridde and cleansed at once, but with dolour, griefe and anguish pay usurie every season and quarter of the yeere; and no sooner have they discharged one, but another distilleth and runneth downe after it, which gathereth to an head; and so by that meanes they are grieved with the heart-ache and paine of the head; whereas it behooved that they should make quickle dispatch, and give order to be cleere and free once for all; for now I direct my speech unto those of the better sort, who have wherewith above their fellows, and yet be nicer than they should be; and those commonly come in with such like words and excuses, as these: How then; would you have mee unfurnished of slaves and servants? to live without five; without an house and abiding place? which is all one as if hee that were in a dropie and swollen as bigge as a tunne, should say unto a physician; What will you doe? would you have me to be lean, lank, spare bodied and empiric; and why not? or what shouldst not thou be contented to be, so thou maiest recover thy health and be whole againe? and even so may it be said unto thee? Better it were for to be without slaves than to be a slave thy selfe; and to remaine without heritage and possessions, that thou maiest not be possessed by another. Hearken a little to the talke that was betweene two geires or vultures as the tale goes; when one of them disgorged so strongly, that he said withall; I thinke verily that I shall cast up my very bowels: the other being by, answered in this wise: What harme wil come of thy vomiting so long as thou shalt not cast up thine owne entrails, but those onely of some dead prey which we tare and devoured together but the other day; semblably every one that is indebted selleth not his own land, nor his owne house; but indeed the usurers house & land of whom he hath taken money for interest, considering that by the law the debtor hath made him lord of him and all. Yea marie will he say anon; but my father hath left me this peece of land for mine inheritance: I wot well and beleeeve it; so hath thy father left unto thee freedome, good name and reputation, whereof thou oughtest to make much more account than of land and living. He that begat thee made thy hand and thy foot; and yet if it chance that one of them be mortified, he will give a good fee or a reward to a chirurgian for to cut it off. Ladie Calypso clad Ulysses with a vesture and robe senting sweet like baulme, yeelding an odor of a body immortal and which she presented unto him as a gift and memoriall of the love that she bare unto him; and this he so did weare for her sake; but after that he suffered a shipwracke and was readie to sink, being hardly able to flote above water, by reason that the said robe was all drenched and so heave that it held him downe, he did it off and threw it away; and then girding his naked brest underneath with a certaine broad fillet or swadling band, he saved himselfe by swimming, and recovered the bank: now when he was past this danger, and seemed to be landed, he seemed to want neither raiment nor nutriment: and what say you to this? may not this be counted a verie tempest, when as the usurer after a certaine time shall cometo assaile the poore debtors and say unto them: Paie,

Which

Which word once said, sheweth the clouds above,
He gathereth thicke, and sea with waves doth moove:
For why, the winds anon at once from east,
From south from west do blow and give no rest.

And what be these windes and waves? even usuries upon usuries, puffing, blowing and rolling one after another; and he that is overwhelmed therewith & kept under with their heavy weight, is not able to swim forth and escape, but in the end is driven downe and sinketh to the verie bottome, where he is drowned and perished together with his friends, who entred into bonds, and became sureties and pledges for him.

Crates the philosopher of Thebes therefore did very well, who being in daunger and debto to no man, onely wearied with the cares and troubles of house-keeping, and the pensive thoughts how to hold his owne, left all, and gave over his estate and patrimonie which amounted to the value of eight talents; tooke himselfe to his bagge and wallet, to his simple robe and cloke of course cloth, and fled into the sanctuarie and liberties of Philosophie and povertie. As for anaxagoras he forooke his faire lands and plectuous pastures: but what need I to alledge these examples? considering that Philoxenus the musician being sent with other to people & possesse a new colonie in Sicilie, and having befallen to his lot a goodly houle and living to it, enjoying (I say) for his part a good portion wherewith he might have lived in fulnesse and plentie; when he sawe once that delights, pleasures, and idleness without any exercise at all of good letters reigned in those parts; Par die (quoth he) these goods heere shall never spoile and undo me, but I will rather (I trow) make a hand and havocke of them; leaving therefore unto others his portion that fell unto him by lot, he tooke sea againe & sailed away to Athens. Contrariwise those that be in debt are evermore sued in the law, become tributaries & very slaves, bearing and enduring all indignities, like unto those vassals that digge in silver mines, nourishing and maintaining as Phinens did the ravenous winged harpies: for surely these usurers alwaies flie upon them, and be ready to snatch and carie away their very foode and sustenance; neither have they patience to stay and attend times and seasons; for they buie up their debtors corne before it be ripe for the harvest; they make their markets of oile before the olives fall from the tree, and likewise of wine: For I will have it at this price (quoth the usurer) & withal the debtor giveth him presently a bill of his hand for such a bargain; meane while the grapes hang still upon the vine, waiting for the moneth of September, when the star Arcturus riseth and sheweth the time of vintage.

THAT A PHILOSOPHER OUGHT TO CONVERSE ESPECIALLY WITH PRINCES AND GREAT RVLERS, AND WITH THEM TO DISCOVERE.

The Summarie.

IF there be any in the world who have need of good companie, they are Princes and great Lords; for that their affaires being of such consequence as everie man knoweth, the feeblenes of bodie and insufficiency of spirit, not able to furnish them thoroughly; great reason they have to see by the eyes, and to worke with the hands of others. Now in this case, three sorts of men there be who fault verie much: In the first place, Princes and Rulers themselves, who in stead of drawing and training neere unto their persons such as can aide and assist them, give assever unto flatterers and other like pestilent members, who are ready to corrupt and ruinate their estates: Secondly, those (whose number at all times hath bene verie small)

whom we call Philosophers (that is to say) men of authority, wise, sage, learned friends to vertue, lovers of the good of Princes and their subjects; who being of great power and able to doe much, yet notwithstanding recule and draw backe, or being advanced to high place, have not alwaies that respect and consideration, nor such courage as appertaineth; suffering themselves otherwhiles to be carried away to the entertainment and maintenance of the greater shapinton, and mingling a little too much of worldly wisdom with the apprehension of their true duty, whereof their conscience being lightened inundry sorts advertiseth them sufficiently. The last (and as those as pernicious & execrable as the thought of man is not able to devise and comprehend) be the enemies of vertue (to wit) ignorant teachers, and profane schoolmasters & professors; mockers; scorners; jesters; flatterers; in sum, all the ministers of vanities and filthie pleasures, who do insinuate and intrude themselves, by most leavard and wicked means into the service of Princes; and in recompence of the honor and rich gifts which they receive at their hands, doe deceive and undo their simple lords and masters, according as an infinite number of examples in Histories doe verifie and give evidence unto us. Plutarch therefore in consideration of these inconveniences, is desirous in this treatise to encourage those who wish that all things were well and in good order; and exhorteth them to approach neere unto Princes. But forasmuch as ignorance and leavdness causeth men to become shamelesse, whereas wisdom and honestie maketh us modest and considerate in all our actions; he sheweth in the first place, that it is no point of ambition for a wise and learned man to joine himselfe unto Grand Legnaries & to sort with them; but that it is their duty so to do considering that such receive honor, pleasure, and profit by him. And this he prooveth by reason, 30 similitudes, examples, singular and notable. Afterwards he condemneth those who enter into Princes courts, onely because they would be great and powerfull, shewing that wise men indeed do aime cleare at another marke. And for the last point of all, he treateth of the contentment which they receive, who by their service to one alone, helpe by that meane an infinite number of others, who remaine bound and obliged unto them for so great a benefite.

THAT A PHILOSOPHER OUGHT to converse especially with Princes and great Rulers, and with them to discourse.

TO embrace a common love, to finde out, accept, intertaine and maintaine that amitie which may be profitable and commodious to many in particular, and yet to more in generall, is the part of honest men, politike, wise and affectionate to the publike good; and not as some thinke, of those that be ambitious and vaine-glorious. But contrariwise, he is to be reputed vaine-glorious, or rather timorous and wanting courage, who doth shunne and is afraid to heare himselfe called, a follower, waiter and servitor to those that are in highest place. For what faith one of these personages who having need to be cured, is desirous to learne and to bee acquainted with some Philosopher? O that I were Simon the Souter, or Dionysius the Pedante, in stead of Pericles or Cato, that a Philosopher might discourse and dispute with me, that he might sit by my side, as Socrates did sometime by those. And verily Ariston of Chios being reprooved and blamed by the Sophisters in his time, for that he used to devise and discourse with all those that were disposed to heare him: I could with (quoth he) in my heart, that the verie beasts themselves were able to give care and understand those discourses that do excite and moove unto vertue. Doe we then avoide the meanes and occasions to converse and conferte familiarly with great personages and mightie men, as if 50 they were wilde and savage persons? The doctrine of Philosophy is not like unto an imager who casteth dumbe and deafe idole statues, without any sense, onely for to stand upon a bafe as Pindarus was wont to say, but is willing to make whatsoever it toucheth, active, operative and lively; it imprinteth therein affections and motions, judgements also inciting and leading to things unprofitable; intentions desirous of all honestie, haughtie courage also and magnanimie, joined with meeknesse, resolution and assurance; by meanes of which good parts, men of State & policie, are more readie and forward to converse and devise with persons of great puissance and authoritie, and not without good causes; for an honest and gentle physician will take alwaies alwaies more pleasure to heale an eie that seeth for many, and which doth guard and looke to many; and even so a Philosopher will be more affectionate to take care for that soule and spirit, which he seeth to be vigilant for many, and which ought to be wise, prudent, and just for many: for such an one if he were skilfull and cunning in the heart, of finding, gathering, and conducting of waters (as we read in Histories that Hercules and many other in old time were) would not take delight to goe into some desert corner, farre remote from the frequencie of men, and to dig or sinke pits there, nere to the Ravens rocke (as the Poet saith) and to open that Swine-heards marish Arcadia, but would studie rather to discover the lively sources and overrunning springs of a river, to serve some great citie or campe, or to water the orchards, gardens, and groves of kings. According as we heare that Homer called Atinos, Jupiters Oaristes, which is as much to say 10 (as Plato himselfe doth interpret the word) his Familiar & Disciple; for he never meant that the disciples of the gods were private persons, home-keepers, and such as meddle in nothing but house matters, keeping in and living idly without any action; but Princes and Kings who being wise, just, debonaire and magnanimous, as many as be under their government and command, shall live in blisse and happiness.

An herbe there is called Eryngium or Sea-holly, which hath this propertie, that no sooner one goat taketh it in his mouth, but she herselfe first, and afterwards all the rest of the flocke, will stand still, untill such time as the goat-headed come and take away out of the flocke which he will, in like maner, the fluxions which proceed from persons of great power and authoritie, have the same swiftnesse and celeritie, which doth dilate and spread it selfe in one moment, and in manner of fire seith upon whatsoever is nere thereto on every side. And verily the speech and remonstrance of a Philosopher, if it be addressed and directed unto a private man, and that loveth to live in repose, and who doth limit and circumscribe himselfe, as within a center and circumference geometrical, with the necessities of his owne bodie, the same speech is not distributed and divided unto others, but after it hath in that one man alone, composed and wrought a great tranquillitie and calme of all perturbations, itfadeth, vanisheth away, and so doth end incontinently; but on the contrarie side, if the said remonstrance meet with a man of State and government, a magistrate, a politician, and one that dealeth in great affaires, and by the effectuall vertue thereof, replenish him with goodnesse and honestie, by the means of that one person, the benefit will be imparted unto many. In this wise Anaxagoras kept companie with Pericles; 30 Plato conversed with Dion, and Pythagoras did associate himselfe to the princes and lords of Italie; and as for Cato, he departed alone from the campe, and failed to Athenodorus; Scipio likewise laid for Panatus, and fought after him, at what time as the Senate sent him forth with commission, for to goe in visitation (as it were) and survey, to see what right and wrong, what justice and injustice reigned in the world, according as Posidonius maketh report. What then ought Panatus for to say? If you were either Castor or Pollux, or some other private person, desirous to flie and avoid the frequencie of great cities, and retire your selfe into some corner of a schoole apart, there at your leisure and full repose to folde and unfold, to resolve and compound the tylogismes of Philosophers, I would willingly accept your offer, and be desirous to converse and stay with you; but seeing you are the sonne of Paulus Aemilius, who had bene twice Con- 40 sul, and the nephew of Scipio Africanus, who defeated Annibal the captaine of the Carthaginians, I will not reason and dispute with you. Moreover, to say that speech is two folde; the one interior or inward, the gift of Mercurie surnamed Hegemon, that is, Guide; the other pronounced and uttered forth, which is instrumentall, and a very interpreter to give notice of our conceptions, is a meere vaine and stale position, and may wel be comprised under this old proverbe: Thus much I knew before Theognis was borne. But let not this distinction trouble or impeach us in that which wee are about to say; for aswell of that which is contained within the secret minde, as of the other which is pronounced and uttered, the end is all one; to wit, Love or amitie of this, in respect of a mans owne selfe, and of that, in regard of others: for that speech which by the precepts of Philosophie, bendeth unto vertue, and there doth end, maketh a man in tune 50 and accordant with himselfe, never repining and complaining of ought, full of peace, full of love and contentment:

In all his limmes is no sedition,

No strife, no warre, no strange dissention,

no passion rebellious and disobedient to reason, no combat of will or appetite against will and appetite, no repugnancie and contrariety of reason against reason; there is no impleasent bitterness or turbulent disorder mixed with joies and pleasures, as it falleth out in the confines of desire,

desire, repentance and sorrow; but all things there be uniforme, delightfome and amiable, which causeth each one to content himselfe, and joy as in abundance of all goods. As for the other kind of speech that is pronounced, Pindarus saith: That the Mule thereof was never in old time covetous, greedie of gaine or meere mercenarie; neither beleve I that it is so at this day; but rather, through the ignorance and negligence of men who be carelesse of their owne good and honour, Mercurie, who before was free and common, is now become an occupier and merchant, willing to doe nothing without a fee and reward. For it is not likely or probable, that Vechant, willing to doe nothing without a fee and reward. For it is not likely or probable, that Vechant in times past was so deadly offended and angry with the daughters of Prospolus, because they devised first to sow hatred and enmity among yong folke, and that Urania, Clio and Calliope take 10 pleasure in them who debate the dignitie of speech and literature, by taking silver; but in mine opinion, the workes and gifts of the Muses ought to be more amiable than those of Venus: for fame and honour, which some propose for the end of their speech and learning, hath bene held deare and highly beloved, for that it is the very beginning and seminarie of friendship; and that which more is, the common sort of people measure honour by good-will and benevolence, esteeming that we ought to praise those onely whom we affect and love: but certainly these men fare like unto Ixion, who in love following after the goddesse Juno, fell upon a cloud; for even to they, in stead of amitie embrace a vaine image of popularitie, deceitfull, pompous, wandering and uncertaine: howbeit, a man of good conceit and judgement, if he manage State affaires, or intermeddle in government of the common-weale, will seeke for honour and reputation so far 20 forth onely, as to mainteine his authoritie and credit in all his actions, for the better management of publike affaires: for it is no pleasure, neither is it easie, to doe them good who are not willing to profit and receive good; and the disposition of the will proceedeth from beliefe and confidence. Like as the light doth more good unto them that see, than to those who are seene; even so is honour more profitable unto them who perceive and feele the same, than to such as are neglected and contemned. But hee who dealeth not in affaires of State, who liveth to himselfe, and setteth downe his felicitie in such a life, apart from others, in rest and repose, salueth a fare off vaine-glorie and popularitie, which others joy in, who be conversant in the view and sight of people, and in frequent assemblies and theaters, much like unto Hippolytus, who li- 30 ving chaste, saluted the goddesse Venus a great way off, but as for the other glory which proceeding chaste, saluted the goddesse Venus a great way off, but as for the other glory which proceeding from men of worth and honour, he neither refuseth nor disdaineth it. Now when as the question is of amitie, we are not to seeke for it and to contract friendship onely with such as be wealthy, have the glorie, credit and authoritie of great lords, no more than we ought to avoid these qualities, if the same be joined with a gentle nature, which is offaire and honest conditions. The Philosopher seeketh not after beautifull and well-favoured yong men, but such as be docible, tractable, well disposed, and desirous of knowledge; but if withall they be endued with beautifull visage, with a good grace, and are in the flower of youth, this ought not to fright him from thence, neither must the lovely casts of their countenance and amiable aspects drive him from comming nere unto those, nor chafe him away if he see them worthy paines taking and 40 to be regarded. Thus when power, riches, and princely authoritie shall be found in men of good nature, who be moderate and civill; the philosopher will not forbear to love and cherish such, neither be afraid to be called a courtier or follower of great personages:

They that strive most dame Venus to eschue,

Do fault as much, as they who her pursue.

Even so it is with the amitie of princes and great potentates: and therefore the contemplative philosopher who will not deale at all in affaires of weale-publike, must not avoid and shun such; but the civill philosopher who is busied in managing of the common weale, ought to seeke for them and finde them out, not forcing them after a troublesome maner to heare him, nor charging their eares with reports and discourses that be unseasonable and sophistical; but framing himselfe willingly to joy in their companie; to discourse, to passe the time with them when they 50 are willing and so disposed:

Twelve journeyes long are Berecynthian plains

And those I sowe yeerely with sundry graines.

He that said this, if he had loved men as well as he affected husbandry and tillage, would more willingly have plowed and sowed that ground which is able to maintaine and feed so many men, then that little clove or pindle of Antisthenes, which hardly was sufficient to find himselfe alone. Certes Epicurus who placed the soveraigne good and felicitie of man in most sound rest and deepe repose, as in a sure harbour or haven, defended and covered from all winde and surging 60 waves waves of the world; faith: That to doe good unto another, is not onely more honest and honorable, than to receive a benefite at anothers hand, but also more pleasant and delectable; for there is nothing that begetteth so much joy as doth beneficence, which the Greekes terme by the name of χάρις, that is to say, Grace. Well advised he was therefore and of wise judgement who imposed these names upon the three Graces, Aglaia, Euphrosyne, and Thalia; for without all question, the joy and contentment is faire greater and more pure in him who doeth a good turne and deserveth a thanke, than in the partie who receiveth the same: and therefore it is that many times men doe blush for shame when a good turne is done unto them, whereas alwaies they reioice when they confer a benefite or favour upon another. Now do they a benefite unto a whole multitude and nation, who are the meanes to make those good, whom the people and multitude can not misse but have need of: whereas contrariwise, they that corrupt and spoile princes, kings, and great rulers (as doe these flatterers, false sycophants and slanderous promoters) are abominable unto all, are chased out and punished by all; like unto those that cast deadly poison, not into one cup of wine, but into a fountaine or spring that runneth for to serve in publike, and whereof they see all persons use to drinke. Like as therefore (according to Eupoli) it is said onely by way of mockerie concerning those flatterers and comical parasites who haunted the table of rich Callias, that there was neither fire, brasse, nor Steele, that could keepe them out, but they would come to sup with him: but as for the minions and favorites of tyrant Apollodorus, Phalaris, or Dionysius, after the decease of their lords and masters, the people fell upon them, did beat them with cudgels, torture upon the rack, burne at a stake, & range them with the accursed and damned crew; for that they before named did wrong to one alone, but these did injurie unto many by the meanes of corrupting one who was their ruler; even so those philosophers that converse and keepe companie with private persons, do cause them to be well contented, pleasant, gracious and harmelesse to their owne selves and no more; but whosoever reformeth some evil conditions in a great ruler or soveraigne magistrate, framing and directing his will and intention to that which he ought; this man I say after a sort is a philosopher to the publike State, in that he doth correct the mould and amend the pattern to which all the subjects be composited, and according to it governed. The cities and states which be well ruled, decree and yeeld honour and reverence to their priests; for that they doe pray unto the gods for good things, not in regard of themselves, nor of their kinsfolke and friends alone, but universally in the behalfe of all the citizens; and yet these priests doe not make the gods good, nor the givers of good things, but being such alreadie of themselves, to them they powre their praiers & make invocations. But philosophers who live and converse with princes and great lords, cause them to be more just and righteous, more moderate and better affected to well doing; by meanes whereof it is like that they receive more joie and contentment. And if I should speake my conceit, it seemeth unto me that the harpe-maker wrought and made his harpe more cherefully and with greater pleasure, when he knew that the master & owner of the said harpe should build the wals about the citie Thebes, as Amphion did, or to laie and appease the great civil sedition of the Lacedæmonians, by singing to the faide harpe and by sweet exhortations, as sometimes Thales did; sensibly the carpenter or ship-wright who maketh the helme to a ship or gally, will joy more when he shall know that the said helme shall serve to guide & rule the admirals ship, within which Themistocles shall fight against the Persians in the defence of the libertie and freedom of Greece: or that of Pompeius, with which in a navall battell at sea he defeated and vanquished the armie of the pirats. What suppose you then will a philosopher thinke of his owne speech and doctrine, when he shall come to discourse with himselfe; that he who shall receive the same being a man of authoritie, a prince or great lord, shall thereby doe good unto the common-weale, in ministring right and justice indifferently to everie man; shall punish the wicked, and advance those that bee good and vertuous. I am verily perswaded (for my part) that a good and gentle ship-wright, will more willingly make an helme, when hee shall know that it must serve to rule the great shippe Argo, renowned throughout the world: likewise a carpenter or wheele-wright, will not with so good a will lay his hand to make a plough or a chariot, as he would to frame those tables or boords, in which he wist that Solon was to engrave his lawes. And (I assure you) the discourses and reasons delivered by Philosophers, if once they be well and surely imprinted in the hearts of great personages, who have in their hands the government of States, if they once get sure footing and take good root in them, they become as forceible and effectual as positive lawes. Hereupon it was that Plato failed into Sicilie, in hope that the grave sentences and principles of his Philosophy, would be as good as lawes, and worke hole some and profitable effects in the affaires of Dionysius. But hee found that Dionysius was like writing tables all rased, and full of blurs and blots, and that he could not leave off the tincture and deepe die of tyrannie, being so surely set on, and having by continuance of time entred and pearced deepe, so that it could not be washed out; whereas it behooved that those who are to make their profit by good advtisements and sage lessons, should still be in motion and so continue.

AS TOVCHING A PRINCE OR RULER UNLEARNED.

The Summarie.

AS in the former discourse he solicited Sages and Philosophers to joine themselves in acquaintance with Princes; so in this he desireth one point, whereof hee dwelt not assure himselfe to compasse the same, by reason of some difficulties therein observed. For requiring in Princes thus much that they should be wel instructed, for to be capable of good counsell; he sheweth withall that it is a verie hard thing to bring them thereto, and to range them in this order for certaine materiall and pertinent reasons which he setteth downe. Neverthelesse he passeth on still and proceedeth farther: proving that the law and lively reason ought to command Kings and Princes; and for to cause them to condescend thereto, he declareth unto them; has the thing which they wish for and desire so ardentely to procure; namely, to maintaine themselves in happie estate, and to make their name immortall, lieth in vertue: then he pointeth out with his finger, foure impeachments and hinderances that divert and turne away Princes from so just and necessarie a consideration. Which done, for to enrich this speech and treatise of his, and the better yet to draw great personages to give eare unto reason, he letteth them see and understand the difference betwene a good Prince and a tyrant: also how dangerous a wicked Prince is, concluding by the benefite which cometh by equitie, and the hurt by injustices; that right and justice ought to serve as a counterpoise against the greedines and puissance of Princes.

AS TOVCHING A PRINCE or Ruler. unlearned.

THE inhabitants of the citie Cyrene, requested Plato on a time to leave unto them by writing certaine good lawes; and withall to set them downe an order in the government of their State, which he refused to do, saying: That it was a verie hard matter to give lawes unto the Cyrenians being so rich and wealthie as they were: for there is nothing so proude and insolent, so rough and intractable, so savage and hard to be tamed, as a man perswaded well of his fortunate estate. This is the cause that it is no easie enterprise to give counsell unto princes and rulers, and to advise them as touching their government. For they be afraid to receive and admit reason as a master to command them; for feare it should take away and abridge them of that, which they esteeme to be the onely good of their grandance and puissance, in case they were subjected once to their duty. Which is the cause also that they cannot skill to heare the discourses of Theopompus King of

Sparta, who was the first that brought into that citie the Ephori, and mingled their authoritie with the government of the Kings. For when his wife reproched him for leaving unto his children the royall power & dignitie, lesse than he received it of his predecessors: Nay many (quoth he) but rather farre greater, in that it shall be more firme and assured: for in remitting and letting downe a little that which in absolute royaltie was over stiffe, strait and rigorous, he avoided by that verie meanes all envie and perill. And verily Theopompus deriving unto others from his owne authoritie, as from a great river, a little rill or riveret; looke how much he gave unto the Ephors, so much he cut off from himselfe: but the reason and remonstrance of Philosophie, being lodged (as it were) with the Prince himselfe, for to assist him and preserve his person, taking from his puissance, as in a full plight and plethoricke constitution of the bodie, that which is excessive and overmuch, leaveth that behind which is sound and healthfull. But the most part of Kings, Princes, and Sovereigne rulers, who are not wise and of good understanding, resemble unskilfull cutters in stone and imagers, who are of opinion that the enormous and huge statues, called Colosses, which they cut, will seeme more vast and mightie, if they frame them straddling with their legs, with their armes spread abroad and stretched forth, as also with their mouthes gaping wide open; for even so, these princes and rulers by their big commanding voice, their grim and sterne visage, fierce lookes and regard of their eie, their odious behaviour, and living apart without society of any other person, weene and suppose to counterfeite a kinde of gravitie, greatnes and majestie that is required in a mightie potentate; but they differ nothing from the foresaid Colosses, which without do represent the forme of some god or demigod; but all within are stuffed full of earth, stone, rubbish and lead: this onely is the difference that the weight and heaviness of those monstrous statues, counterpoiseth and keepeth them standing in some sort upright, stedfast, and not inclining one way or other; but ignorant and unlearned princes, rulers, and generall capitaines, by reason of their ignorance which is within them, oftentimes do wag and totter to and fro, yea and be overturned and laid along; for coming to build their puissance and licentious power aloft upon a base that is not laid directlie to the plumbe, they reele and tumble downe withall. But like as a rule or squire, being of it selfe even, streight and levell, not turning or twining any way, doeth direct and set streight all other things, and make them like it selfe, by being laied thereto; even so ought a prince, when he hath first established in himselfe, his principallity and power, that is to say, composed his owne life and maners, to accommodate and frame his subjects accordingly, and to make them semblable: for neither lieth it in him who is ready to stumble and fall himselfe, to susteine and keepe up another; nor he who is ignorant and knoweth nothing, is fit to be a teacher, no more than he who is disorderly, meet to redresse and reforme, or who is irregular, able to range and set in order, or who knoweth not how to obey, like for to command. But the most part of men are herein deceived and thinke not aright, who suppose that the first and principall good in commanding and ruling, is not to be ruled and commanded. And thus the king of the Persians imagined all his subjects to be his slaves, unlesse it were his wife alone, of whom especially above all other, he should have the masteire and lordship.

Who is it then, that shall command a king or prince? even the law, which is the ladie and queue of all, as well mortall men, as immortal gods, according as Pindarus saith: I meane not the written law in books or upon tables of wood, but the lively reason imprinted in his owne heart, remaining alwaies with him, his continuall resident-keeper, and never leaving his soule abandoned and forlorne without conduct and government. And verily the Persian king had evermore about him one of his chamberlaines ordeined for this office; namely, to say unto him every morning as he entred into his chamber: Arise my lord, and have regard to those affaires for which Meloromades (that is to say, The great God) would have you to provide. But if a prince be wise and well instructed, he hath alwaies within him this monitor and remembrancer, to re-found the same into his cares, and put him in minde of his dutie. Polemon was wont to say: That love was a ministerie of the gods in young persons, such as they had care of, and were minded so to preserve: but more truly a man might say: That princes be the ministers of the gods, to provide for the affaires and safetie of men; to the end that of those good things which God hath bestowed upon them, they should distribute some, and preserve others;

But see'st thou this flurie firmament,

So high above and infinitely vast,

In bosome moist of water element,

The earth beneath how it incloseth fast?

for

for this is it, that by influence sendeth downe the principles of those seeds which be fit and convenient, which afterwards the earth produceth and yeeldeth forth, whereof some grow by showers of raine, others by winds; some also gather warmth and heat by the starres & the moone, but it is the sunne who ruleth and governeth all, he inspirith and infuseth into them from himselfe, the gracious instinct of love. Now, all the goods and gifts (so many and so great) which the gods endow men withall, there is no meanes to enjoy & use aright, without law, without justice, without a prince or ruler: Justice is the end of law; law is the worke of a prince; and the prince is the image of God governour of all things: and this prince or sovereigne majestie hath no need either of Phidias, or of Polyclitus and Myron, to cur, cast or forme him; but himselfe it is, who doeth frame his owne person to the pattenre and similitude of God, and by meanes of vertue, worketh and setteth up the most pleasant, excellent and divine statue that may be seene: and like as God hath placed in heaven (as a most beautifull image of himselfe and his divinitie) the sunne and the moone; even such a representation and light is in a citie and realme. A prince or magistrate, so long as he hath in his heart imprinted the feare of God and the observation of justice; that is to say, all while he hath divine reason, which is understanding; not a scepter in his hand, nor a thunder-bolt and lightning, or a three-forked mace, as some foolish princes cause themselves to be portraied and painted, making their follie odious, in affecting that which they never can attaine unto: for God indeed hateth and punisheth those who will seeme to imitate thunder, lightning, sun-beames and such like; but contrariwise, those that be zealous followers of his vertue, and who endeavour to conforme themselves to his bounty, goodnesse and clemencie, he loveth and advanceth, to them he willingly doth impart his owne equity, loyalty, justice, verity and clemency. These qualities are such, as there is nothing in the world more divine and heavenly, nor fire nor light, nor the course of the sunne, neither the risings or apparitions, nor the settings and occultations of the starres, no nor eternitie it selfe and immortality: for God is not counted happy and blessed in regard of long life, but for that he is the prince of all vertue: and as this is divinity indeed, so it is true beauty to be ruled thereby. Anaxarchus for to give comfort and consolation unto Alexander, who was cast downe and in despaire, for the bloody murder which he had committed upon the person of Cytus, said unto him: That the goddes Dice and Themis (that is to say) Justice and Equity, far as assistants to * Jupiter, to shew (quoth he) that whatsoever is done by a prince, is to be thought just and righteous; but hee offended herein grossly, and faulted much, to the hurt of Alexander, in that he went about to remedy the sorow and grieve which this prince conceived in remorse of conscience and repentance for his heinous sinne, by giving him heart and assurance to commit the like againe. And if it be meet and lawfull in this case, to project our conjectures; Jupiter hath not equity and justice for his assaults, but himselfe is justice and equity; he (I say) is the most ancient and perfectest law that is: thus speake, write and teach all ancient authours; That even Jupiter himselfe can not well command and rule without justice, which is the virgine (as Hesiodus saith) not touched & defiled, but pure and immaculate, lodged alwaies with shamefastnesse, modestie, pudicitie and utilitie. Hereupon it is, that men ordinarily give this addition unto kings and princes, calling them

Much like as dogs that be of gentle kinde,

Who watchfully about the fold attend,

In case they once by subtil hearing finde

A savage beast approach, and in his den

feare not for themselves, but in regard of the cattell which they keepe. In like manner, Epaminondas, when the Thebans fell dissolutely to drinke and make good cheere at a certaine festivall time, himselfe went all alone to survey the armour and wals of the citie, saying: That he would fast and watch, that all the rest might quaffe the while and sleepe with more securitie. Cato likewise at Utica proclaimed by sound of trumpet, to send away by sea all those who escaped alive upon the overthrow which there hapned; and when he had embarked them all, and made his prayers unto the gods to vouchsafe them abon voiage, he returned into his owne lodging and killed himselfe; shewing by this example what a prince or commander ought to feare, and what

he

he should contemne and despise. Contrariwise, Clearchus the tyrant of Pontus, shutting himselfe within a chest, slept there as a serpent within her hole: and Aristodemus the tyrant of Argos went up into a hanging chamber aloft which had a trap dore, whereupon he caused a little bed or pallet to be fet, and there he slept and lay with his concubine and harlot which hee kept, and when he was gotten up thither, the mother of the said concubine came ordinarily to take downe the ladder, and brought it thither againe every morning. How thinke you, did this tyrant tremble for feare, when he was in a frequent theater in the palace, in the counsell house and therefore as they augment their puissance, so doe they encrease their owne feare; for the more persons that they commaund and rule over, the greater number they stand in dread of: for it is neither probable nor seemely as some philosophers affirme: That God is invisibly subsistent and mixed within the first and principall matter, which suffreth all things, receiveth a thousand constraints and adventures, yea and is subiect to innumerable changes and alterations: but hee sitteth in regard of us above, and there is resiant continually in a nature alwaies one, and ever in the same estate, seated upon holy foundations (as Plato saith) where he insuleth his power, and goeth through all, working and finishing that which is right according to nature: and like as the sunne in heaven, the most goodly and beautifull image of him, is to be seene by the reflexion of a mirror, by those who otherwise can not endure to behold himselfe as he is; even so God ordeineth in cities and societies of men, another image of his, and that is the light of justice and reason accompanying the same; which wise and blessed men describe and depaint out of sentences philosophicall, conforming and framing themselves to that which is the fairest and most beautifull thing in the world; and nothing is there that doth imprint in the soules and spirits of men such a disposition, as reason drawne and learned out of philosophie, to the end that the same should not befall unto us which king Alexander the great did; who having seene in Corinth, Diogenes how generous he was, esteemed highly and admired the haughtie courage & magnanimitie of the man, in somuch as he brake forth into these words; Were I not Alexander surely I would be Diogenes: which was al one in maner as if he should have said; That he was troubled & encombred with his wealth, riches, glory and puissance, as impeachments and hinderances of vertue, and bare an envious and jealous eie to the homely courte cloke of the philosopher, to his bagge and wallet, as if by them alone Diogenes was invincible and impregnable, and not (as himselfe) by the means of armes, hamish, horses, speares, and pikes: for surely he might with governing himselfe by true philosophicall reason have bene of the disposition and affection of Diogenes, and yet continue neverthelesse in the state and fortune of Alexander; and so much the rather be Diogenes because he was Alexander; as having need against great fortunes, (like a tempest raised with boisterous winds, and full of surging waves) of a stronger cable and anchor, of a greater helme also, and a better pilot: for in meane persons who are of low estate, and whose puissance is small, such as private men be, follie is harmeflesse; and foolish though such be, yet they doe no great hurt, because their might is not answerable thereto; like as it falleth out in foolish and vaine dreames: there is a certaine griefe (I wot not what) which troubleth and disordereth the mind, being not able to compasse & bring about the execution of her desires & lusts: but where might & malice are met together their power addeth folly unto passions & affections; & most true is that speech of Dionys the tyrant, who was wont to say; That the greatest pleasure & contentment which he enioyed by his tyranny was this, that whatsoever he would was quickly done, & presently executed; according to that verse in Homer:

*No sooner out of mouth the word was gone,
But presently withall the thing was done.*

A dangerous matter it is for a man to will and desire that which he ought not, being not able to performe that which hee willett and desireth: whereas malicious mischief making a swift course through the race of puissance and might, driveth and thrusteth forward every violent passion to the extremitie, making choler and anger to turne to murder, love to prove adultery, and avarice to growe into confiscation of goods; for no sooner is the word spoken, but the partie once in suspicion is undone for ever, and presently upon the least surmise and imputation ensueth death. But as the naturall philosophers do hold, that the lightning is shot out of the cloud after the clap of thunder (like as blood issueth after the wound is given and incision made) and yet the said lightning is seene before, for that the eare receiveth the sound

found or cracke by degrees, whereas the eie meeteth at once with the flash; even so in these great rulers and commanders, punishments oftentimes go before accusations, and sentences of condemnation before evident proofes:

*For wrath in such may not long time endure,
No more than flouke of anchor can assure
A ship in storme, which taketh slender hold
On land by shore, whereof none may be bold.*

unlesse the weight of reason doe repress and keepe downe licentious power, whiles a Prince or great Lord doth after the manner of the sunne, who at what time as he is most high mounted in the septentrionall or northern parts, seemeth least to move, and by his slow motion maketh his race the more stedfast and assured. For impossible it is that vices in great persons should remaine covert and hidden; but like as those who are subiect to the falling sicknesse, so soone as ever they be surprisid with outward cold, or turne round never so little, presently fall into a dimnes of sight, grow to be dizzie in the head and ready to stagger, which passions do bewray and detect their maladie; even so ignorant persons and such as want instruction and good bringing up, no sooner are lifted up by fortunes favour to wealth and riches, to dignities, promotions, and places of high authoritie, but presently thee sheweth them their owne fall and ruine; or rather to make the thing more plaine and familiar; like as a man can hardly know whether vessels be sound or faultie, so long as they be emptie, but in case you powre into them any liquor, it appeareth whether they leake and runne or no; even so, the soules of men that be purrified and corrupt, can not containe and hold firme their might and authoritie, but run out by means of their lusts and desires, their cholerick fits, their vanities and absurd demeanors. But what neede we draw forth the discourse hereof more at large; considering that great men and noble personages are exposed to calumniation and reproches for the least delinquencie and fault that they commit. Cimon was blamed for his good wine, Scipio for his sleepe, and because hee loved his bed well; and Lucullus grew into an ill name in regard of his bountifull table and liberal fare that he kept.

The Summarie.

Though this Treatise be so defective both in the beginning and the end, that to this present wee know not how to gesse and conjecture, which way to redresse and supply the same; yet the very title and fragments remaining thereof, sufficiently discover the intention of the Author. And like as by the ruines of some ancient royal palace, there is in some sort represented to our thought and conceit the beauty thereof whiles it stood entire and upright; even so, this remnant which is left unto us, sheweth sufficiently what wee have lost. But albeit the malice and injurie of the time hath deprived us of so great a benefit, and of many others semblably; yet notwithstanding, that which remaineth may profit us, maimed and imperfect as it is, and suffice to range and contrive us in our dutie. In the beginning, our Author discouerseth of the miserie of a covetous person, and one that followeth the court. Then he addeth according to his principall designe and purpose: That vice is the absolute work-mistresse of wretchednesse and infelicity, having need of no other ministers or instruments to cause a man to be miserable; whereupon he doth collect and gather; that there is no danger nor calamitie, but we ought to chooseth rather than to be sinfull and vicious. Afterward as he answereth those objections which are made to the contrary, and concludeth, that adversitie can not prejudice or hurt us any thing so long as it is not accompanied with vice.

THAT

He abideth much who hath his bodie sold for a dowrie (as Euripides faith) to wit, small avails he hath thereby, and those verie uncertaine. But unto him who passeth not through much ashes, but a royall fire (as one would say) wherewith he is scorched and burnt round about, who continually draweth his winde thicke and short, and is full of feare and sweat by trudging over sea for gaine, the giveth in the end a certaine Tantalian riches (that is to say) such as he is not able to enjoy by reason of the continuall occupations wherewith he is encombred. For verie wisely did that Sicyonian who bred and kept a race of horses, when he gave unto Agamemnon the king of the Achæans as a present, a notable swift mare for a courser, because he might be dispensed with, for going in warfare to Troy:

*That unto Troy that stately towne,
he might not with him go
To serve in armes; but stay at home,
and rest there far from woes
Where he might live in solace much,
enjoying all his owne,
For Jupiter in measure great,
had wealth on him bestowed.*

to the end, that he staying behinde at home, might roule and welter at ease in a depth of riches, and give himselfe much time and leisure for assured repose void of all paine and trouble. Howbeit our courtiers at this day, who would be esteemed men of action and great affaires, never expect untill they be called, but of themselves intrude and thrust their heads into princes courts and stately palaces, where they must watch, waite and give attendance in all dutifull service, with much paine and travell, to gaine thereby at last, a great horse, a faire chaine, or some such blessed favour.

and the husband is carried here and there wandring in the world, drawn on with certaine hopes which oftentimes in the end deceive him and worke his shame. But if peradventure he obtaine some thing that his heart desired, after a certaine time that he hath bene turned round about with the wheele of fortune, so long untill his head be dizzie, and mounted on high in the aire, he wisheth and seeketh nothing more than evasion and meanes to escape, deeming and calling those happy, who leade a private life, without exposing themselves to such perils: and they againe repute him blessed and fortunate, seeing him so highly advanced above themselves. Thus in one word you see, how vice doeth dispose men unto all sorts of infelicities, being of it selfe a perfect artisan of infortunity, and needs none instruments and ministers besides. As for other tyrants, who study nothing more, than to make those most wretched and miserable whom they pinch, doe mainteine executioners and tormentours, devise red-hot searing yrons to burne, and invent racks and other instruments for to put the reasonlesse soule to extreame torture; but vice without any such preparation of engines, so soone as it seizeth upon the soule, presently overturneth and bringeth it to ruine and destruction, filleth a man with dolour and griefe, with lamentations, sorowes and repentance. For a certaine proove hereof, you shall see many endure to have their flesh mangled and cut, without saying one word; abide to be whipped and scourged patiently; who being put to the racke and other tortures by their cruell masters or tyrants, will not give one steeke or crye, so long as the soule represseth the voice by reason, as with the hand keepeth it downe, and containeth it from breaking out: whereas contrariwise, a man shall hardly or never command either anger to stay and be quiet, or dolour to be silent, no nor persuade him that is surprized with sudden feare to rest still, or one who is stung with remorse and repentance

repentance to forbear crying out, to hold his hands from tearing his haire & flouting his thighs; of such force and violence is vice & sinne, above either the heat of fire or the edge of the sword. Moreover, cities & states, when they publish their purpose to put forth to making any ships or huge statues called Colossi, give care willingly to the workmen disputing one against the other, as touching the workmanship, heare their reasons, & see their models & platforms which they bring, and afterwards make choise of him to goe in hand with that piece of worke, who with lesse cost and charges will do the deed as well or rather better, and more speedily. Now put the case that we publish by proclamation to make a man infortunate, or cause a life to be wretched and miserable, and that there present unto us for to enterprize this, fortune on the one side and vice on the other; the one (to wit, fortune) is full of her tooles and instruments of all sorts, and provided of furniture costly and chargeable, for to make a life unhappie and miserable; as for example, brigandise and robberies, bloody warres, inhumane cruelty of tyrants, and tempests at sea; the draweth after her flashes of lightning out of the aire, the mixeth and dresteth a poisoned cup of deadly hemlocke, she bringeth sharpe edged swords to do the businesse, she stirreth flanders and raiseth false surmises and calumniationes, she kindleth burning agues and hote fevers, she commeth with fetters, manacles and other yrons jingling; finally, she buildeth cages and prisons for this purpose; and yet the most part of all this geere proceedeth rather from vice than fortune: but suppose that all came from fortune; and that vice standing by all naked, and having need of no other thing in the world without it selfe to assaile a man, should demand of fortune, how she could make a man infortunate and heartlesse in these tearmes? What fortune? doest thou menace povertie? Metrocles will be ready to laugh thee to scorn, who in Winter time used to sleepe among sheepe, and in Summer season tooke his repose in cloisters and church porches; and so challenged for his felicity the king of Perisa, who was wont to Winter in Babylon and passe the Summer in Media: threatenest thou servitude and bondage? bringest thou chaines and yrons, or the wofull condition to be sold in open market as a slave? Diogenes will despise thee for all that, who being exposed and offered to sale by the rovers and thieves that tooke him, cried and proclaimed himselfe aloud: Who will buy a master who? doest thou temper or brew a cup of poison? why didst not thou before offer such a cup to Socrates for to drinke? but hee full meekely with all mildnesse and patience, without trembling for feare and changing either countenance or colour for the matter, drunke it off roundly; and after he was dead, those that survived, judged him happy, as one who in the other world made account to live an heavenly and blessed life: presentest thou fire to burne withall? loe, how Decius a Roman captain hath prevented thee; who when there was a fire made in the mids betwene two armies for to consume him, voluntarily and with a formall praiser offered himselfe as an holocaust or burnt offering unto Saturne, according to his vow made for the safetie of the Roman empire. The honest and chaste dames of the Indians, such as entirely love their husbands, strive and be ready to fight one with another about the funeral fire; and as for her who obtaineth the victorie, and is burned therein together with the dead corps of her husband, all the rest doe deeme right happy, and testifie so much in their hymnes and songs. As for the Sages and wise Philosophers of those parts, there is not one of them all reputed a holy man or blessed, if he do not whiles he is alive, in perfect health and sound sense and understanding, separate his owne soule from the body by the meanes of fire, and after he hath cleafed and consumed all that was mortall, depart out of the flesh all cleane & pure: but (forsooth) from abundance of wealth and riches, from an house sumptuously built and furnished, from a costly and daintie table full of fine & delicate viands, thou wilt bring me to a poore thred-bare cloake, to a bag and wallet, and to begging of my daily bread from doore to doore; well, even these things were the cause of Diogenes felicity; these woun unto Crates freedom and glory: but thou wilt crucifie mee or cause mee to be hanged upon a gibbet, or sticke my body thorow with a sharpe stake? and what cared Theodorus whether his corps rotted above ground or under the earth? these were the happy sepulchures of Tartarians and of the Hircanians, to be eaten and devoured of dogs; as for the Bactrians, by the lawes of the country those were thought to have had the most blessed end, whom the fowles of the aire did eat after they were dead; Who then are they whom these and such accidents do make unhappy? even such as are false-hearted, base-minded, senselesse and void of understanding, untaught, and not exercised in affaires of the world, and in one word, such as retaine still the opinions which were imprinted in them from their infancie. Thus you see how fortune alone is not a sufficient worke-mistresse of unhappinesse and infelicity, in case she have not sinne and vice to aide and helpe her: for like as a thred is able to divide and saw (as it were) throw a bone which hath lien soaking long before in ashes and vinegar; and as wotke men can bend, bow and bring into what fashion they will, yvorie, after it hath bene infused and mollified in ale or beere, and otherwise not; even so fortune comming upon that which is al ready of it selfe crazie and corrupt, or hath bene fustained by vice, is of power to pierce, wound and hollow the fame.

Moreover, like as the poison Pharicum, otherwise called Napethus or Aconitum, being hurtful to no other person, nor doing harme to those who handle and beare it about them; but if it touch never so little one that is wounded, presently killeth him by meanes of the fore or wound which receiveth the influxion and venom thereof; even so he whose soule is like to be destroyed and overthrowen by fortune, ought to have within himselfe and in his owne flesh some ulcer, to some impostume or maladie for to make those accidents which befall outwardly, wretched, pitifull, and lamentable. What? is vice then of that nature that it had neede of fortunes helping hand to worke wretchednesse & infelicitie? from what coast I pray you doth not fortune raile tempests upon the sea, and trouble the water with surging billowes? environeth not she and beseteth the foot of desert mountaines, with the ambushes and forelayings of thieves and robbers? powreth not she downe with great violence, stormes of haile stones out of the clouds upon the fertile coigne fields? was it not vice and malice that stirred up Melitus, Anytus, and Clixenus to be sycophants and false accusers? is it not she that bereaveth folke of their goods, enpeacheth and disableth men for being commanders and leaders of armies, and all to make them unhappie? nay she it is that maketh them rich and plentifull; she heapeth upon them heritages and possessions; she accompanieth them at sea; she is alwaies close unto them and neer at hand; she causeth them to consume and pine with lusts and desires; she enflameth and setteth them on fire with choler and anger; she troubleth their minds with vaine superstitions, and draweth them away after the lusts of their eies.

HOW A MAN MAY PRAISE HIMSELFE WITHOUT IN- CURRING ENVIE AND BLAME.

The Summarie.

In possible it is during the time that we sojorne in this life, that our spirit which knoweth not how to be still and at rest, it could not stirre and move the tongue to speake of the actions either of other men or of our owne; whereby we cannot choise but incurre marvellous dangers of flatterie, slander or els of selfe-praise; in so much as not without good cause that man hath bene called perfect, who knoweth well to moderate this little member, which is at it were the bit and bridle of the whole bodie of man, and the verie helme and sterne of that ship or vessell in which we row and hull to and fro in the sea of this world. Requisite it is therefore, that morall philosophie should speake, to the end that it may teach us for to speake. We have seene before in many discourses the dutie of everie one towards his neighbours, as well in words as in deeds; but in this treatise Plutarch sheweth the carriage of a man towards himselfe, and above all in that way which is most slipperie, to wit, in the question of our owne praises: then after hee hath laide this for a ground and foundation; that it is an unseemly thing for a man to make himselfe seeme great by vaine bubble, and alledged the reasons wherefore, he setteth downe one generall exception; to wit, that a vertuous man may praise himselfe in certaine cases and occurrences, the which (after hee hath taxed the ambition of those who set up a note of their owne praises to be channiced aloud by others) he particularizeth upon these points; to wit, if he be driven to answer unto some false slanderer; if a man be in any distresse and adversitie, or if he be blamed for the best deeds that he hath done. After this, he enterleth certaine advertisements or corrections; to wit, that a man ought to mingle his owne praises with those of other men; that he ascribe not the whole honor of a worthy deed to his own selfe; that he utter only those things which be chiefe and principall, and stand upon that which is most commendable; and that he give a certaine luster thereto, by the soile of confessing his owne imperfections: which done, he proceedeth to declare what kinde of men they ought to bee who are allowed to praise themselves; to what this praise ought to be referred and have respect; and wherefore they should enter into it; moreover, at what time, and for what occasion he ought to make head unto a third, who would do sufficiently; and for a final conclusion, he proposeth an excellent meanes to avoid the troubles and inconveniences that might arise from importunate praise, willing that the partie who speaketh of his owne good parts should sue all ambition, not please himselfe in rehearsing and recitall of his owne exploits, take heed how in selfe-praising hee feigne praises, and never beleasse in blaming his neighbour to be content for to be praised of another; without putting himselfe betweene and speaking in his owne behalfe. In summe, since there is nothing so odious as to see and heare a man speake exceeding much of himselfe, he concludeth that in no wise a man ought so to do; unlesse there accrue thereby great profit and commoditie to the hearers.

HOW A MAN MAY PRAISE HIMSELFE WITHOUT INCURRING EN- VIE AND BLAME.

TO speake much of ones selfe in praise, either what he is in person, or of what valour and power among others; there is no man (friend Herculanus) but by word of mouth will professe it is most odious, and unbecoming a person well borne and of good bringing up; but in very deed few there be who can take heed and beware of falling into the inconvenience and enormitie thereof, no not even those who otherwise do blame and condemne the same: as for Euripides when he saith,

If words were costly men among,
for to be bought and sold,
No man to praise and magnifie
himselfe would be so bold:
But now (since that each one may rake
out of the aire so large,
As much as will his minde suffice,
without his cost and charge)

Well pleased are all men of themselves to speake what comes in thought;
As well without as what is true;
for speech is hem costeth nought.

doth use a most odious and importune vainerie; especially in this, that he would seeme to interlaie amongst the passionate accidents and affaires of Tragicall matters, the speech of a mans selfe which is not befitting nor pertinent unto the subject argument; semblably Pindarus, having said in one place,

To brag and vaunt unreasonably,
Sound's much of rash and vain folly,

so ceaseth not never the lesse, to magnifie his owne sufficiencie in the gift of poetrie, as being (in truth) worthy of nigh great praise; as no man can denie. But those who are crowned with garlands in those sacred plaies and games, are declared victours and conquerours by the voice of others, who thereby ease them of that odious displeasure that selfe-praise carrieth with it. And in very deed our heart riseth against that vaine glory of Timotheus, in that he wrote himselfe (as touching the victorie which he achieved against Phrynia) Oh happy man thou Timotheus; at what time as the herald proclaimed with a loud voice these words: Timotheus the Milesian hath conquered Ianocampus that ionne of Carbo: for surely this carrieth with it no grace at all; but is a meere absurditie and against all good fashion, for a man to be the trumpeter of his owne victorie: for true it is according to Xenophon; That the most pleasant voice that a man can heare, is his owne praife delivered by another, but the most odious thing unto others, is a man commending himselfe: for first and formost, we esteeme them to be impudent who praise themselves, considering that they ought rather to blush and be ashamed even when others fall to praise them in their presence: secondly, we repute them unjust herein, for that they give and attribute that to themselves which they should receive at the hands of others: thirdly, either if we keepe silence when we heare one to praise himselfe, it seemeth we are discontented or do beare envie unto him, or if we feare that, compelled we are our selves to confirme and approve those praises, and to give testimonie thereof against our owne minde; a thing more befitting vile and base flatterie, than true honour, namely, if we can abide to praise any in presence. Howbeit, although this be most true, and that the case standeth so, such occurrences may so fall out, that an honourable person who manageth the politike affaires of a common-wealth, may hazzard and venture boldly to speake of himselfe and in his owne behalfe for his advantage, not in regard of any glory, grace or pleasure to gaine thereby, but for that the occasion or action that is presented, requireth that he should speake and give testimonie of himselfe, as he would and might doe of any other matter of truth, especially when the deeds by him achieved or the parts that be in him be good and honest, then he is not to forbear or spare to speake hardly, that he hath done so or els much like: for surely such a praise as this, bringeth forth good fruit, and out of it as from a fruitfull graine or seed, there proceed many other praises, & those farre greater. And certes, a civill and politike man doeth not desire and love honour as a salarie, solace or recompense for his vertuous actions; but for that to have the credit and reputation among others of a trustie and faithfull person, in whom men may repose their trust and confidence, doth afford him good meanes and occasions to performe many other greater and more goodlier actions: for a pleasant and easie matter it is, to benefit them who love thee and put their trust in thee; whereas on the contrary side, exceeding hard it is, or rather impossible, to make use of vertue, and to employ it to the good of those who have thee in suspition, or be ready to raise false calumnies against thee, and so to force them who do avoid the meanes of receiving any good and pleasure at thy hands.

Moreover, it would be considered, what other occasions there may be, for which a man of honour and honestie may praise himselfe; to the end that by taking good heed and avoiding of that which in selfe-praife is so vaine and odious, we faile not to serve our turnes with the profit and commodity that may come thereby. Now of all others, most foolish is their praife who commend themselves to this end, that they would be praised of others; and such praise as this we hold most contemptible, for that it seemeth to proceed from ambition and an unreasonable appetite of vaine-glory onely: for like as those who have no other food to feed upon, be constrained to eat the flesh of their owne bodies against nature, which is the very extremity and end of famine; even so those that hunger after honour and praife, if they can not meet with others to praise them, fall to praise themselves; wherein their behaviour is unseemly and shameful, for that upon a love of vaine-glory they are desirous to make a supply and sufficiency from their owne selves; but yet when as they go not simply to worke nor seeke to be praised by themselves, but upon a certaine emulation and jealousie of other mens praises, they come to compare and oppose their owne deeds for to dim and darken the actions of others; then over and besides their vanity, they adde thereto envie and malice; for according to the common proverbe: He is curious and ridiculous, who setteth his foot in another mans daunce; but upon envie and jealousie to thrust a mans selfe betwene the praises of others, and to interrupt the same with his owne selfe-praife, is a thing that wee ought to beware of; and not onely so, but also to take heed that wee suffer not others at such a time to praise us, but gently to yeeld honour unto those who are worthy to be praised and honoured; and if peradventure, they be unworthy and deserve not the same, yet ought not wee to deprive them of the praises which are given unto them, by interposing our owne, but rather stand up against them; convince them openly, and prove by evident and pregnant reasons that there is no cause why they should be reputed so great, and be so highly honoured. As touching this point therefore, plaine and evident it is, that we ought not so to doe; howbeit, a man may praise himselfe without blame: first and formost, if he do it by way of his owne defence in answering to a slander raised, or an imputation charged upon him; like as Pericles did in Thucydides, where he uttereth these words: And yet you my masters of Athenes are angry with me, who may vaunt of my selfe to be such an one as need need not to give place unto any whatsoever, either in foresight and knowledge of that which is behovefull to the common-wealth, or in eloquence and delivery thereof, or in love to the State, or in sincere integrity, free from all corruption, bribery and avarice, against which I stand invincible: for in speaking thus magnificently of himselfe in such a case, he did not onely avoid the blame and reproch of vanity, of arrogancy and presumptuous ambition, but also that which more is, he shewed withall his wisdom and greatnesse, yea, and the magnanimity of vertue, which was so farre from being humbled and dejected, that it rather conquered and held under hand, envie; in so much as others hearing such men speake in this wise, proceed not any farther nor be willing to judge and censure them, but are caried away and ravished with a certaine joy, yea and inspired (as it were) from heaven to heare such brave vanteries; namely, if the persons be constant and the reports which they make true, according as the effects which follow do testifie. The Thebanes verily (at what time as their capitaines were accused, for that when the terme of their government and magistracie, called Basotarchia, was expired, they returned not incontinently home, but made an invasion and entred in armes into Laconia, and dealt in the administration of affaires about the cite of Messene) hardly and with much ado obtained and quit Pelopidas, when he humbled himselfe and became a suppliant unto them for pardon: but contrariwise, when Epaminondas came and recounted in magnificent words those brave exploits which he had achieved in that voyage and at the same time, protesting in the ende that he was prest and readie to take his death, so that they would confesse and acknowledge, that murther 20 their minds and against their wills he had pilld and spoiled Laconia, repopled Messene, and reduced into a league and amitie with them all the cities of Arcadia, they had not the heart so much as to give their voices and suffrages in any sentence of condemnation against him, but departed out of the assembly, admiring the haughtie courage of the man, and rejoicing with mirth and laughter to heare him plead his cause with resolution. And therefore the speech of Sthenelus in Homer is not simply and altogether to be reprooved, when he saith:

Pronounce I dare and it avow,

we better warriors be

In these daies than our fathers were
by many a degree.

30 If we call to minde and remember the precedent words a little before:

Thou some of noble Tydeus

a wise and hardy knight,

How is it that thy heart doth pant,

for fewe when thou shouldst fight?

Why dost thou cast thine eie about,

and looke on everie side?

How thou mayst out of battell scape,

and dar'st not field abide.

for it was not Sthenelus himselfe unto whom this sharpe and bitter speech was addressed, but he 40 replied thus in the behalfe of his friend whom he had thus reproched, and therefore so just a cause and so fit an occasion gave him libertie to speake thus bravely and boldly of himselfe. As for the citizens of Rome, they were offended & displeased much with Cicero praising himselfe so much as he did, and namely relating so often the woorthie deeds by him done against Catiline; but contrariwise, when Scipio said before them all in a publike assembly: That it was not meet and seemely for them to sit as judges upon Scipio, considering that by his meanes they were grown to that grandance as to judge all the world; they put chaplets of flowers upon their heads, and in this wise adorned, mounted up together with him into the temple of the Capitoll, for to sacrifice and render thanks unto Jupiter: and good reason both of the one and the other; for Cicero rehearsed his owne praife-worthy deeds for many times without any need enforcing him there- 50 to, onely to glorifie himselfe; but the present perill wherein the other stood, freed him from all hatred and envie, notwithstanding he spake in his owne praife. Moreover, this vanterie and glorious boasting of a mans selfe, is not befitting those onely who are accused or in trouble and danger of the law, but to as many also as be in adversitie rather than in prosperitie; for that it seemeth that these reach and catch (as it were) at glorie and take pleasure and joy therein, onely to graue and content therein their owne ambitious humor; whereas the other by reason of the qualitie of the time, being farre from all suspition of vaine glorie and ambition, doe plucke up and erect themselves upright against fortune, sustaining and upholding what they can the gene- 60 riofitie of their minds, avoiding as much as lieth in them that base conceit, to be thought for to beg commiseration and crave pittie, as if they would be moaned for their misadventures, and thereby bewray their abject hearts. For like as we take them for fooles and vaine-glorious fellows, who as they walke ordinarily, lift up themselves, and beare their heads and neckes aloft; but contrariwise, we praise and commend those who erect their bodies, and do all they can to put forth themselves, either in fight at sharpe, or in buffeting with fists; even so, a man who being overthrowen by adverse fortune, raiseth himselfe up againe upon his feet, and addresseth his whole might to make head,

*Like as the champion doth arise,
Upon his hands to winne a prise.*

and in stead of shewing himselfe humble, suppliant and pittifull, by glorious words maketh a shew of braverie and haughtie courage, seemeth not thereby proude and presumptuous, but contrariwise, great, magnanimous and invincible. Thus in one place the poet Homer depainteth Patroclus modest and nothing at all subject to envie, when he had done any exploit fortunately and with valour; but at his death when he was ready to yeeld the ghost, he described him to speake bravely in this wise:

*If twentie such with all their might,
Had met with me in open fight, &c.*

And Phocion who otherwise was alwaies meeke and modest, after that he saw himselfe condemned, gave all the world to understand his magnanimitie, as in many other things, so especially in this point, that he said unto one of those that were to suffer death with him, who made a pitious moane and great lamentation: How now man, what is that thou saiest? doth it not thee good at the heart to thinke that thou shalt die with Phocion? And verily, no lesse, but rather much more it is permitted to a man of State, who is injuriously dealt withall for to speake somewhat frankly of himselfe, namely unto those who seeme to be oblivious and unthankfull. Thus Achilles at other times rendred the glorie of fortunate successe in his affaires to the heavenly power of God, and spake modestly in this manner:

*That Jupiter would give us power and strength,
Troy citie strongly wall'd to winne at length.*

But otherwise when indignities were offered unto him, and he unjustly wronged and abused, he sang another note, and displaid his tongue at large in anger, breaking out into these haughtie and brave words:

*With ships of mine well man'd with souldiours brave,
By force of armes twelve citiees wonne I have.*

Allo:

*For why? approach they dare not neere to me,
The brightnes of my morion for to see.*

For libertie of franke speech, being a part of justification and defence in law, is allowed to use great words for plea. And verily Themistocles according to this rule, who all the while that he performed the exploits of noble service in his owne countrey, never did or said ought that favoured of odious pride; yet when he once saw that the Athenians were full of him, and that they made account of him no more, forbore not to say unto them thus: What meane you my masters of Athens thus to disdain & be wearie of those at whose hands you receive so oftentimes benefites? In time of storme and tempest you flie to them for refuge, and shroud your selves in their protection as under the harbor and covert of a spreading tree; no sooner is the storme overblowne and the weather faire againe, but you are ready to give a twitch at them, and every one to pull and breake a branch thereof as you passe by. Thus you see how these men perceiving themselves otherwise injured, in their discontentment sticke not to rehearse their service and good deeds past and cast them in their teeth who are forgetfull thereof. But he that is blamed and suffreth a reproch for things well done, is altogether for to be excused and blameable, in case he set in hand to praise his owne deeds, forasmuch as he seemeth not reproch and upbraid any, but to answer onely in his own defence, & to justifie himselfe. Certes, this it was that gave unto Demoisthenes an honest and laudable libertie to speake for his owne behoofe; and he avoyded thereby all tedious satietie of his owne praises, which he used throughout that whole oration, entituled Of the crowne, wherein he gloried and vaunted of that which was imputed unto him as reprochable, to wit, the embassages in which he went, and the decrees which he had enacted as touching the warre. Moreover, not farre from these points above re-heard,

heard, the reverting of an objection by way of Antithesis may be placed, and caried with it a good grace; to wit, when the defendant doth proove and shew that the contrary to that where-with he is charged and accused, is wicked and dishonest: After which maner the orator Lycurgus, at Athens in his plea and answer to those who laid to his charge that he had given a piece of money to a sycophant for to stop his mouth & appease him: VVhat kinde of citizen (quoth he) do you take me for to be? who all this long time that I have dealt in the government and managing of State affaires among you, am challenged before you rather to have given than taken fil-ging of State affaires among you, am challenged before you rather to have given than taken fil-ver unjustly. Likewile Cicero, when Metellus laid unto him that he had undone and brought to confusion more men by his testimonie, than saved by his patronage and eloquence; And what 10 man is there (quoth he) who will not say by this, that there is more fidelitie in me, than force of utterance. Allo these places in Demoisthenes; And who would not justly have condemned me to die, if I had but once gone about in bare word to contaminate the honors & glorious titles that this citie hath? againe, And what (thinke ye) would these wicked persons have said, if whiles I discouerted particularly of these points, the citiees had fallen away and revolted: In sum, that whole oration throughout concerning the Crowne, most finely and wittily intersteth his owne praises among those oppositions & solutions which he alledged. Over and besides, it is woorth the noting and learning, as a most profitable point, how cunningly in the said oration, and how artificially he intermeddled with the speeches that he gave out of himselfe, the commendations also of the hearers, and thereby freed himselfe from the taint of envie, hatred, and selfe-love; namely in avowing how good and gracious the Athenians were to those of Thebes, how woorthily they demeaned themselves toward the Thebanes; what good turnes they had done to the Bryzantines, as also how beneficiall they had bene to the inhabitants of Chersonesus, lying withall, that himselfe was but their minister. For I assure you by this meane the hearer himselfe being secretly woon and gained ere he is aware by his owne praises, enterteineth more willingly and with greater pleasure the speech of the orator; well contented he is and pleased to heare the good deeds related by another which he hath done; and upon this joy of his there influeth incontinently an admiration and love of those, by whose meane hee hath achieved those acts. Heereupon Epaminondus one day in open place, when Meneclides, one of his envious and malicious adversaries mocked him for that he magnified and thought better of 30 himselfe than ever did king Agamemnon; Grand mercy, you my masters of Thebes (quoth he) with whom alone I overthrew in one day and subverted the whole dominion of the Lacedaemonians. Now forasmuch as the most part of men ordinarily milike in their hearts, and are mightily offended with one that praiseth himselfe, but fare not so against him that commendeth another; nay many times they are well pleased therewith, and ready to confirme such praises by their owne testimonies: some are wont to have this devise, namely, in taking their time and opportunity, to commend those who love, chuse, and do the selfe same things, and briefly who are of the like conditions, and given to the same humor with themselves, do winde and insinuate into the grace and favour of the hearer, and by such an occasion draw his heart unto them; for straightwaies he doth acknowledge in the speaker although he speaketh of another, the resemblance and similitude of the like vertue which deserveth the same praises: for like as he who reprocheth another man for those vices whereof himselfe is guiltie, doth hurt his owne person more than the party whom he seemeth to touch; even so good and honest men in yielding honor to those persons who are good, doe as much as make mention of themselves to such as are privie to their vertues, and know them well enough; inasmuch as presently they are ready to follow and second them with these and such like acclamations; And are not you also the same in every respect? After this sort Alexander in honouring Hercules; and Androocpus likewise in honouring Alexander, procured to themselves each one due honour from the semblable. Contrariwise Dionysius by mocking Gelon, and saying by allusion to his name; that he was Gelos indeed (that is to say) the Laughter and mockerie of Sicilie, perceived not how before hee 50 was aware, by the envie that he drew upon him himselfe, he overthrew the greatnes and dignitie of his owne puillance and signorie. A man of State therefore and a politician, ought to learne, observe and practise these rules even in other cases also. And as for those who otherwhiles are enforced to praise themselves, they shall cause this selfe-praise of theirs to be more tolerable and lesse subject to envie and hard conceit, in case they take not all to themselves, and attribute the whole to their owne worthinesse; but as if glorie were some heaive and weightie burthen, discharge one part thereof upon fortune, and another upon God; and therefore wisely said Achilles in Homer:

*Since that th' almightie Gods have given me grace,
Mine enemy to overthrow in place.*

Well likewise did Timoleon at Saracoe, who upon his valiant and noble exploits dedicated an altar to Bon-adventure, and likewise consecrated an house to his good Angell. But best of all and most wisely did that Pythen the Aenean, who being arrived at Athens after he had murdered King Cotys, when the oratours strived avie one with another, who should extoll and set forth his praises most unto the people, and perceiving some to carrie an envious eye unto him, and be highly displeased with him; as he passed by, brake forth into these words: It was some God (quoth he) 6 yee Athenians that did this deed, as for my selfe, I did but lend my helping hand. Semblably, Sylla exempted his owne acts from envie, in giving alwaies the praise to his good fortune; in so much as in the end, he surmamed himselfe Empephorus, that is, lovely, fortunate, or Venus darling. For all men in manner would seeme to be vanquished rather by fortune, than conquered by vertue; for that they thinke the one to be a good, not pertinent to the conqueror, and the other a proper defect and imperfection of their owne, and which proceedeth from themselves: which is the reason by report, that the lawes of Zalemus wonderfully pleased the Locrians, for that he put into their heads and bare them in hand, that the goddesse Minerva appeared and came many times unto him; that she endited and taught him those lawes which he penned and gave unto them; finally, that there was nor one of them proceeding from his head, counsell and invention. Peradventure therefore necessarie it is to devise these and such like remedies, and lenitive medicines to meet with those persons, who are by nature fierce and envious; but to such as as be of the better sort, and of a modest and temperate disposition, it would not be impertinent and absurd to use certaine corrections of praises in this case: as for example; If one haply in our prefence fall to praise us for being eloquent, learned, rich, or in great reputation, to pray him not to give such reports of us, but rather for to commend us if we be good and bountifull, hurtful to none, and profitable to many; for in so doing, we seem not to confer praises upon our selves, but to transfer them; not to take pleasure in them that praise us, but rather to be grieved and displeased, that we are not praised for such things as we ought, nor as we should; as also to hide the worse qualities under the better, not so much willing and desirous to be praised, as to teach how it is meet to praise: for this manner of speech (neither with stone nor bricke have I fortified and walled this citie, but if you will needs know how I have 30 sensed it, you shall finde that I have furnished it with armor, horses, confederates and allies) seemeth to come neere and tend unto such a rule: yea and the saying of Pericles toucheth it neerer, for when the hower of his death now approached, and that he was to goe out of this world, his kinsfolke and familiar friends, weeping, wailing, and grieving thereat (as good reason was) called to minde and rehearsed the armies that hee had conducted, the expeditions which hee had made, his puissance that he had borne, as also how many victories he had achieved, what Trophies he had erected, what townes & cities he had conquered, and laid to the seignorie of the Athenians; all which he now should leave behind him: but he lifting up himselfe a little, reprieved and blamed them greatly, for relating and alledging those praises, which were common to manie, and whereof some were more due to fortune than to vertue; whiles they omitted and let 40 passe the greatest and most beautilfull commendation of all others, and that which truly and indeed properly belonged unto him: namely, that for his sake, there was never any Athenian that put on blacke or wore a mourning gowne: this example of his, giveth both unto an oratour if he be praised for his singular eloquence, meanes and occasion to transerre the praise unto his life and maners; and also to a warrior & generall capitaine, who is had in admiration for his martiall prowesse, experience, or fortunate successe in wars, to stand rather upon his clemencie and justice and thereof freely to discourse. And contrariwise againe, when a man hath excessive praises heaped upon him (as the manner commonly of many is, by way of flatterie to give those commendations which moove envie) meet it is to use such a speech as this:

*With gods in heaven above I have no share,
To them therefore why dost thou me compare?*

But if thou knowest me aright, and takest me truly for such an one as I am, praise these good parts in me; that I am uncorrupt and not overtaken with gifts and bribery; that I am sober and temperate; that I am sensible, reasonable, full of equitie and humanitie. For the nature of envie, is willingly to yeeld unto him that refuseth the greater praises those that be lesse and more modest; neither depriveth she of true commendation those who will not admit and receive false and vaine praises: and therefore men thinke not much to honor those Kings and Princes who who are unwilling to be stiled gods or the children of gods, but rather to be intituled either Philadelphus, that is, Kinde to brothers and sisters; or Philometores, that is, Loving to their mothers; or Evergetes, that is, Benefactors; or else Theophilus, that is, Deerely beloved of the gods; which are goodly and beautilfull denominations, meet for men and good princes: like as againe, those who hardly will endure them, that either in writing or speaking, attribute unto them the name of Sophi, that is, Sages or wise men, can well abide to heare those who name them Philosophi, that is, Lovers of wisdom; or such as say of them, that they profit in the study of wisdom, or give them such like attribute as is modest and not subject to envie; whereas these ambitious Rhetoricians and vaine-glorious Sophisters, who in their orations (to shew their learning) expect these and such like acclamations from their auditors: O divine and angel-like speech! O heavenly and magnificently spoken; lose withall this commendation, as to be said for to have delivered their minde modestly, courteously, and as becometh civil men. Certes, like as they who be loth and take heed to offend and hurt them that be beleevied or otherwise given to the paine and inflammation of them, do mingle among the gallant and lively colours, some dusky shadows; even so, some there be, who in rehearsing their owne praises not altogether resplendent & cleere without any mixture at all, but intermeddled with some imperfections, defects and light faults among, by that meanes discharge themselves of the heave load of envie and hatred. Thus Epicurus in Homer, giving out glorious words of his wrestling and buffet-fight, vaunting bravely of his valour,

20 *As if he would his teene and anger wreake
Upon him, and with fists his bones all breake.*

said withall:

Is't not enough that herein I do want?

For other skill in combat I do want.

But haply this man is woorthy to be mocked and laughed at, who for to excuse his arrogant braverie of a wrestler and champion, bewraied and confessed that otherwise he was but a fearful coward; whereas contrariwise that man is of judgement, civil also and gracious besides, who alledgeth against himselfe some oblivion or ignorance, some ambitious spirit, or els a desire to heare and learne the Sciences and other knowledge, like as Ulysses when he said:

30 *But lo my minde desirous was
To hearken and give care,
I will dmy mates me to unlose,
That I might go more neare.*

And againe in another place;

*Although much better it had beene,
Yet would I not beleve:
But see his person, and then trie
If gifts he would me give.*

To be short, all sorts of faults, so they be not altogether dishonest and over-bafe, if they be set 40 unto praises, rid them of all envie and hatred; and many other there be, who interposing a confession of poverie, want of experience, yea, and (beleeve me) their base parentage, among their praises, cause them thereby to be lesse odious and envied. Thus Agathocles, as he sat drinking unto young men out of golde and silver plate right curiously wrought, commanded other vessels of stone, earthen and potters worke to be set upon the table, saying unto them: Lo (quoth he) what it is to perleve in travell, to take paines, and adventure valiantly: for wee in times past made those pots, (pointing to the earthen vessell) but see, now we make these, (shewing the plate of golde and silver: and verily it seemed that Agathocles (by reason of his base birth and poverie) was brought up in some potters forge, who afterward became the absolute monarch (almost) of all Sicilie. Thus it appeareth what remedies may be applied outwardly, to avoide 50 envie, if a man be forced to speake of himselfe: other meanes there are besides, inherent (after a sort) even in them who be in this wise praised; and such Cato made use of, when he said, that he was envied, because he neglected his owne affairs, and sat up watching whole nights for the good and safetie of his country. Like to which is this speech:

*What wisdom thinke you was in me,
Who cleane exempt from care,
From charge and travell, like some one,
Who in the armie were.*

A plaine and common souldiour might enjoy within the host My fortune with the wise of them all that meddle most?

as also this other:

*I doubt and feare, that of my labours past,
The thanks is gone, and caried with a blast;
And yet those paines that now presented be
As flesh, reject unmeth I will from me.*

For men ordinarily beare envie unto those who seeme to acquire glory gratia, without any cost, to and to come by vertue easily, like as if they purchased house or land for a little or nothing; whereas seldome or never they envie such as have bought the same very deare, with many travells and great dangers. And forasmuch as we ought in praising of our selves to effect not only this; that we offend not the hearers thereby nor procure their envie, but endeavour also to profit them and doe them good, as if we seemed not to aime at our selfe-praise, but to shoo at some other thing: in so doing consider first and formost when a man is in a vein of praising himselfe, whether he may do it by way of exhortation, to kindle a zeale, and exercise a kinde of emulation and strive for glory in the hearers; after the example of Nestor, who in recounting his owne prowesse and valiant service, encouraged Patroclus and the other nine gallants and brave knights, to enter combat and single fight with Hector: for an exhortation which hath word and deed to meet together, carrying with it example, with a familiar zeale and imitation, is wonderfull quicke and lively, it pricketh, provoketh and stirreth exceedingly, and together with a resolute courage and ardent affection, it carie with it the hope of compassing things very accessible and in no wise impossible: and therefore of the three renowned daunces and quires in Lut-demon, one which consisted of olde men, chaunted thus:

*The one was, when we gallants were,
Toughfull and hardie, void of feare.*

another, of children, sung in this wise:

*And we one day shall be both tall and strong,
And farre surpass, if that we live so long.*

the third, namely of yong men, had this dittie:

*But we are come to proesse, and now at best,
Trie who that will, to fight we are now prest.*

wherein the law-giver, who instituted these daunces, did wisely and politickely, to propose unto yong men such familiar examples and at hand, even by those things that were done and executed. Yet nevertheless, it were not amisse, otherwhiles to vaunt and to speake highly and magnifically of ones selfe, for to daunt, beat downe, repress, and keepe (as it were) under hand, a bragging and audacious fellow, like as Nestor himselfe did againe in another place:

*Conversed have I in my daies,
With men of better deed
Than you in wis, and yet disclaime they never would my reed.*

Sensibly said Aristotle unto king Alexander: That lawfull it was and becomming not onely for those to have an haughtie minde, who had many subjects under them at their commands; but such also as held true opinions as touching the gods. And verily these points are commendous for us otherwhiles, even in regard of our enemies, foes, and evill willers, according to that verse in Homer:

*Children they are of wretched fires,
and boyne to misadventure, Whose lucke it is my force of armes
in battell to encounter.*

Agesilaus also, having speech upon a time as touching the King of Persia, who usually was called the Great Monarch: And wherein (quoth he) is that king greater than my selfe, if he be not more iust and righteous. Epaminondas likewise replied upon the Lacedæmonians, who had framed a long accusation against the Thebans: Well it is (quoth he) and a good turne that we yet have made you give over your accustomed short speech. Thus much of those rules which concerne either our private and particular evill willers, or our publike enemies.

As for our friends and fellow-citizens, we may likewise by using fitly in time and place, and as the case requirerth haughty language, not onely take downe and cause those to vaile bonet who are over-proude and audacious; but also on the other side raise up and encourage such, as be dismayed, astonied and beyond measure timorous. For Cyrus also in the mids of battell and dangers of warre was wont to speake bravely, but else where not. And Antigonus the younger or second of that name, who otherwise was in words sober, modest, and nothing proude; yet in a battell at sea which he fought neere the isle Cos; when one of his friends about him said a little before the medley began: See you not sir how many more ships our enemies have than wee? Why (quoth he) for how many ships doest thou reckon me? And it should seeme that Homer was of the same minde and meant so much, when he feigneth that Ulysses seeing his people affrighted with the hideous noise and fearfull tempest that issued out of the gulfes Charybdis, called to their remembrance his subtil engine and singular valour, in saying thus unto them:

*My friends and mates, this accident is not so dangerous,
As when that monstrous Cyclops he,
a giant furious,
Us turn'd and coust with mightie force
about his hollow eare, Tet thence we chas'd him by my wis advice, and provesse brave.*

For this manner of praising proceedeth not from a glozing vaine-glorious orator, nor a vaning Sophister, nor from one that seeketh applaus, and clapping of hands; but becommeth a personage who pawneth unto his friends, as a gage of assurance and confidence his owne vertue and sufficiency. For a matter this is of great importance & consequence tending to safety in dangerous times, to wit, the opinion, reputation and affiance, that we may have of a man in authoritie, and the experienced prowesse of a capitaine. Now albeit I have sufficiently shewed before, that it is neither convenient nor seemely for a man of State and honour to oppose himselfe against the glorie and praise of another; yet nevertheless when the case so standeth, that a false and perverse commendation doth bring hurt and damage, and by example inferreth a dangerous imitation of evill things, together with a wicked purpose and leawd intention in matters of great moment, it were not amisse to repulse the same backe, or rather to divert and turne away the hearer unto better things, and open unto him the difference: for in mine advice a man may well take content and delight, to see that men abstaine willingly from vice, when they perceive it to be blamed and reprooved; but in lieu of condemning it, if they heare it commended, and if over and besides the pleasure and profit that commonly it seemeth to bring with it, it be held also in honor and reputation, there is not a nature so happie and blessed, nor so strong and stout withall, but free is able to conquer it: and therefore a man of policie and government ought to make warre and fight, not so much against the praises of persons, as of things, in case they be corrupt and naught: for these they be that spill and marre our manners, by reason that with such praises there entereth commonly a will to imitate and follow such dishonest and foule actions, as if they were good and seemely: but then most of all are they detected what they be, and do appeere in their colours, when they are compared in opposition with true praises indeed. Thus it is reported, that Theodorus the Tragædian actor, said upon a time unto Satyrus a Comical player: That it was no great marvell to make the spectators to laugh, but rather a matter of wonder to cause them for to weepe and crie: but (I suppose) a sage and wise philosopher may well say thus unto the same Theodorus: Nay (good sir) it is not so great a matter to see men weeping and wailing, but rather to still and stay their sorrow and lamentation, were an admirable thing: for if a man praise himselfe in this sort, he profiteth the hearer and changeth his judgement. Thus did Zeno speake of the great number of Theophrastus his scholars, who resorted unto his schoole: His quire (quoth he) is greater than mine, but yet mine accordeth better and maketh the sweeter harmonie. Phocion likewise, when as Leophanes still flourished and bare a great name, being demanded by the Rhetoricians who used to make solemne orations, what good himselfe had ever done to the weale-publike, answered them in this manner: None other (quoth he) but this, that all the whiles I was Lord General, and had the conduct of an army, none of all you made ever any funerall oration, but interred all your citizens who departed this life in the sepulchers and monuments of your ancestors. As for Crates when he read these verses containing the Epitaph of Sardanapalus:

What

*What hath gone downe my throat I have,
my wanton sport remains,
Which Ladie Venus did vouchsafe, or else I count but vaine.*

wrote thus againe verie wittily and in a pleasant conceit:

*What during life I studied haue
and learned, is my gaine,
The skill which muses then me gaue,
and nought else I reaine.*

for such manner of praise as this, is excellent, honest, and profitable, teaching men to love, esteeme and admire such things as be commodious and expedient, and not those that are vaine and superfluous; and therefore this advertisement ought to be ranged with the rest before specified as touching the subject argument now in question.

It remaineth now by order and course according as the present theame in hand requireth, and our discourse admonisheth us, to declare how every man may avoid this importunate and unseasonable selfe-praise: for surely to speake of a mans selfe, having selfe-love as a commodious fort from whence it issueth, seemeth many times to lay wait and give the assault even unto them who are of all others most modest and farthest from vain-glorie. And like as one precept of health there is, to flie and shunne altogether unholisome tracts and contagious, or at leastwise to take heed of them most carefully if a man be in them; even so there be certaine dangerous times and slipperie places which one shall slide and fall into upon the least occasion in the world, by rashly speaking of himselfe. For first and foremost those who are by nature ambitious, when they heare another man praised, commonly (as it hath bene said before) advance forward to talke of themselves, and then anon this humour of selfe-praise being once provoked and tickled (as it were) with an itch, a certaine desire and furious appetite of glorie which hardly can be held in, taketh hold of them, especially if the partie who is praised before them be but equall or inferior to them in merit: for like as they who are hungrie have the greater appetite, and are provoked more to eate when they see others fall to their meate before them; even so the praise of another inflameth the jealousy of those who be given to the greedy desire of honor & glorie. Secondly, the recital and discourse of those things which have bene happily executed, and to a mans minde, drive many men into a brave vaunting, for the joy that they conceive in relating the fame: for after they be once fallen into a narration of their victories achieved in warre, or the enterprises which they have fortunately managed in their soveraigne government of State, or their actions and affaires performed under other chiefe rulers and commanders, or of the speeches which they have made to great purpose and good successe and commendation, they cannot containe and hold themselves: to which kind of vaunting & speaking of ones selfe, we see those are most subiect who are warriors and serve especially at sea; likewise this happeneth usually unto such who are come from the courts of mighty princes, or from those places where there hath bene exploited some great service: for in making mention of princes and grand Seigneours, they can not chuse but interlace ordinarily among, some speeches which those potentates have delivered to their commendation; and therein they do not thinke that they praise themselves, but recite onely the commendable testimonies that others have given out of them: and verily such as these, be of opinion that the hearers perceive them not, when they recount the embracements, greetings, salutations, and favours which kings, emperours, and such great potentates have bestowed upon them; as if forsooth they rehearsed not their owne selfe-praises, but the courtesies and demonstrations of the bountie and humanitie of others; whereof every one of us ought most fully and warily to looke unto our selves when we praise any one, that the said praises be pure and sincere, void of suspicion, that we do not respect & aime at an oblique selfe-love, & speech of our owne selves, for feare lest we make the commendation of Petrarchus, as it is in Homer, a covert, colour and pretence of our owne praise, and by commending others cunningly, praise our owne selves. Moreover, all the sort of blames and reprehensions of others, are otherwhiles very dangerous, causing those to goe out of the way and stumble, who are never so little sicke of vain-glorie; into which maladie old folke many times incur, and namely when they breake out into the reprofe of their youngsters, finding fault with their lewd manners and fashions, for then in blaming others, they fall to magnifying themselves, as if in times past they had done wonders, in comparison of those things which now they condemne: and verily such as they be we ought to give place unto, in case they be not onely for age, but also in regard of their vertue and reputation venerable: for this maner of rebuke is not unprofitable, but breedeth in those who are chastised by them, a great desire and emulation withall to attaine unto the like place of honour and dignitie. But as for our selves we ought to take heed and beware how we trip or tread awry in this case; for the maner of blaming our neighbours, being as it is otherwise very odious and almost intolerable, and which hath need of great caution and warinesse; he that medleth his proper praise with the blame of another, and leeketh glorie by his infamy, cannot chuse but be exceeding hatefull and unsupportable, as if he hunted after renoume and honour by the reprochfull and dishonorable parts of his neighbours. Furthermore, as they who naturally are enclined and disposed to laughter, are to avoid and decline the ticklings and soft handling in those parts of the body that are most smooth, sleeke and tender, which soone yeelding and relenting to those light touches, stirre up and provoke immediately that passion of laughing; even so this caveat and advertisement would be given unto such as passionately be given to this desire of glory, that they abstaine from praising themselves, at what time as they be collauded by other: for a man that heareth himselfe praised, ought indeed to blush for shame, and not with a bold and shamelesse face to hearken thereto, nay he should doe well to reprove those that report some great matter of him, rather then to finde fault for saying too little, and not praising him sufficiently; a thing it is that many men doe, who are ready of themselves to prompt and suggest, yea and to inferre other magnanimous facts and prowesses, so far forth that they marre all, atwell the praise that they give themselves, as the laudable testimoniall of others. And I assure you many there be who flattering themselves, tickle and puffe up their owne conceits with nothing els but winde; others againe upon a malicious intent, laying some petie praise as it were a bait for them to bite at, draw them on thereby to fall into their owne commendation: some also you shall have who to that purpose will keepe a questioning with them, & propose certaine demands for the nonce to traine them within their toile, and all to have the more matter that they might soone after laugh at. Thus in Menander the glorious foldier made good sport, being demanded of one DEMAND. Good sir how came you by this wound and scar?

SOLDIER. By dint of iavelin lanced from a far.

DEMAND. But how? for gods sake how? let us all know:

30 SOLDIER. *As I a wall did scale I caught this blow,
But well I see whiles that I do my best
This to relate, these make of me a jest.*

And therefore in all these cases, a man ought to bee as warie as possible hee can, that he neither himselfe breake out in his owne praises, nor yet bewray his weaknesse and folly by such interrogatoies; and that hee may in the best and most absolute manner take heed thereto, and save himselfe from such inconveniences, the readiest way is to observe others neerely that love to bee praisers of themselves; namely to call to minde and represent unto their owne remembrance how displeasing and odious a thing it is to all the world, and that there is or can be no other speech so unfavory, tedious and irksome to heare: for suppose that we are not able to say that we suffer any other harme at their hands who praise themselves, yet we do all that we can to avoid such speech; we make shift to be delivered from it, and hasten all that we may to breath our selves, as if it were an heavy burden which of it selfe and the owne nature overchargeth us, in so much as it is troublesome and intolerable even to flatterers, parasites, and needy snell-fasts in that necessitie and indigence of theirs, to heare a rich man, a prince, a governor, or a king to praise himselfe: nay they give out that they pay the greatest portion of the shot, when they must have patience to give care to such vanities; like unto that jest in Menander, who breaketh out into these words,

He killeth me when at his boord I sit

And with his cheere I fatter am no whit,

50 But rather pine away, you may be sure,

When such bald jests to heare I must endure.

And yet as wise and warlike as they seeme,

A bragging foole and lewd for I know deeme.

For considering that we are wont to say thus, not onely against foldiers and glorious upstarts newly enriched, whose maner is to make much of their painted sheaths, powring out brave and proud discourses; but also against sophisters, rhetoricians, and philosophers, yea and great captains, puffed up with arrogancy and presumption, and speaking bigge words of themselves: If we would call to remembrance that a mans owne proper praises be accompanied alwaies with the dispraises of others, and that the end commonly of such vaine-glory is shame and infamie; also, that tediousnesse unto the hearers, is (as Demosthenes saith) the reward, and not any opinion to be reputed such as they say, we would be more sparing and forbear to speake so much of our selves, unless some greater profit and advantage might afterwards grow either to us or to the hearers in place.

WHAT PASSIONS AND MALADIES BE WORSE, THOSE OF THE SOULE, OR THOSE OF THE BODIE?

The Summarie.

His present question upon which Plutarch hath framed this declamation, wherof there remaineth extant in our hands but one little parcell, hath bene of long time discussed and debated among men; the greater is our damage and detriment, that we have heere no better direction, nor a more ample resolution of it by so excellent a philosopher as he was: but seeing that this losse can not be recovered, let us seeke for the clearing of all this matter in other authors; but principally in those, who search deeply to the verie bottom, for to discover the source of all the maladies of the soule, instead of such writers who have treated of morall philosophie, according to the doctrine and light of nature, onely accompanied with precepts out of her schoole, and have not touched the point but superficially, as being ignorant what is originall and hereditarie corruption; what is sinne; how it entred first into the world; what are the greatest impressions, assaults, effects, and what is the end and reward thereof. But to come unto this fragment, our author after he had shewed that man of all living creatures is most miserable, declareth wherein these humane miseries ought to be considered; and prooveth withall, that the diseases of the soule are more dangerous than those of the body, for that they be more in number, and the same exceeding different, harder to be known and incurable, as evidently it is to be seen in effect; that those who are afflicted with such maladies, have their judgement depraved and overturned, refusing remedie with the losse of rest and repose, and a singular pleasure which they take to discover their unquietness, anxietie and miserie.

WHAT PASSIONS AND MALADIES BE WORSE, THOSE OF THE SOULE OR THOSE OF THE BODIE?

Omer having viewed and considered very well the sundry sorts of living creatures mortall, compared also one kind with another, as well in the continuance as the conversation and maner of their life, so concluded in the end with this exclamation,

*Lo how of creatures, all on earth which walke and draw their mind,
More miserable none there are nor wretched than mankind.*

attributing unto man this unhappie soveraigntie, that he hath the superiority in all miseries whatsoever: but we setting this downe

for

for a supposition granted already, that man canie the victorie, and surpasseth all others for his infortunitie, and is already declared and pronounced the most unhappie wretch of all living creatures, will set in hand to compare him with his owne selfe, in a certaine conference of his proper calamities that follow him; and that by dividing him, not in vaine and unfruitfully, but very pertinently and to good purpose, into the soule and the bodie, to the end that wee may learne and know thereby whether we live more miserable in regard of our soules, or our selves, that is to say, our bodies: for a disease in our bodie is engendred by nature; but vice and sinne in the soule is first an action, but afterwards becommeth a passion thereof: so that it is no small consolation, but maketh much for the contentment of our minde, to know that the worke is curable, and the lighter is that which can not be avoided.

The fox in Aesope pleading upon a time against the leopard, as touching the varietie of colours in their skins, after that the leopard had shewed her bodie, which to the eie and in outward apparence was well marked & belet with faire spots, whereas the foxes skin was tawny, soule and ill-favoured to see to: But you (quoth he) sir Judge, if you looke within, shall finde me more spotted and divers coloured than that leopard there; meaning the craft and subtiltie which he had, to turne and change himselfe in divers sorts, as need required; after the same maner let us say within our selves: O man, thy body breedeth and bringeth forth many maladies and passions naturally of it selfe, many also it receiveth and enterreineth coming from without, but if thou wilt anatomize and open thy selfe, thou shalt finde within, a save, an ambrie, nay a storehouse and treasure (as Democritus saith) of many evils and maladies, and those of divers and sundry sorts, not entering and running in from abroad, but having their originall sources springing out of the ground, and home-bred, the which, vice abundant, rich and plenteous in passions putteth forth. Now, whereas the diseases that possesse the body and the flesh, are discovered and knownen by their inflammations and red colour, by pulses also or beating of the arteries, and namely, when the visage is more red or pale than customably it is, or when some extraordinary heat or lassitude, without apparent cause, bewraith them: contrariwise, the infirmities and maladies of the soule are hidden many times unto those that have them, who never thinke that they be sicke and ill at ease; and in this regard worse they be, for that they deprive the patients of the sense and feeling of their sicknesse: for the discourse of reason, whiles it is sound and whole, feelleth the maladies of the bodie; but as for the diseases of the soule, whiles reason herselfe is sicke, she hath no judgement at all of that which she suffereth, for the selfe same that should judge is diseased; and we are to deeme and esteeme, that the principall and greatest malady of the soule is follie, by reason whereof vice, being remediless and incurable in many, is cohabitant in them, liveth and dieth with them: for the first degree and very beginning of a cure, is the knowledge of a disease, which leadeth and directeth the patient to seeke for helpe; but he who will not beleeve that he is amisse or sicke, not knowing what he hath need of, although a present remedie were offered unto him, will refuse and reject the same. And verily, among those diseases which afflict the bodie, those are counted worst which take a man with a privation of sense; as lethargies, intolerable head-ach, or phrenesies, epilepsies or falling-evils, apoplexies and fevers-ardent; for these burning agues many times augment their heat so much, that they bring a man to the losse of his right wits, and so trouble the senses, as it were in a musickall instrument, that

Which touched should not be, but lie apart.*

which is the reason that practitioners in physicke desire and wish in the first place, that a man were not sicke at all, but if hee be sicke, that hee be not ignorant and senselesse altogether of his disease; a thing that ordinarily befalleth to all those who be sicke in minde: for neither witlesse fooles, nor dissolute and loose persons, ne yet those who be unjust and deale wrongfully, thinke that they do amisse and sinne; nay, some of them are persuaded that they do right well. Never so was there man yet, who esteemed an ague to be health, nor the phthisicke or consumption to be a good plight and habit of the bodie, nor that the gout in the feet was good food to a man's hip, ne yet that to be ruddy and pale or yellow, was all one; yet you shall have many who are diseased in minde, to call hastines and choler, valiance; wanton love, amitie; envie, emulation; and cowardise, warie prudence. Moreover, they that be bodily sicke, send for the physicians (because they know whereof they stand in need) for to heale their diseases; whereas the other avoid and shun the sage philosophers; for they thinke verily that they do well when they fault most. upon this reason we holde, that the ophthalmie, that is to say, the inflammation of bloud-shotten eies, is a

lesse

lesse maladie than Mania, that is to say, rage and furious madnesse; and that the gout in the feet is nothing so bad as the phrensie, which is an inflammation or impostume bred in the braines; for the one of these patients finding himself diseased, crieth out for paine, & calleth for the physician, and no sooner is he come, but he sheweth him his diseased eie for to dresse and anoint, he holdeth forth his veine for to be opened, & yeeldeth unto him his head for to be cured; whereas you shall heare ladie Agave in the Tragædies, so farre transported out of all sense and understanding (by reason of her raging fit) that shee knew not those persons which were most deare and entire unto her; for thus the laith:

*This little one here newly kil'd,
And cut in pieces in the field,
From hills we bring to dwelling place,
How happy, ô, hath become our chace!*

As for him who is sicke in bodie, presently he yeeldeth thereto, he laies him downe upon his pallet, or taketh his naked bed, he catcheth himselfe all that he can, and is content and quiet all the while that the physician hath him in cure; but if peradventure he tumble and tosse in his bedde, fling and cast off his clothes, by reason that his bodie is tormented with some grievous hot fit, no looner stirreth he never so little, but one or other that standeth or sitteth by to tend him, is ready to say gently unto him:

Poore soule, be quiet, feare none ill, Deare heart, in bed see thou lie still.

he staith and keepeth him downe, that he shall not start and leape out of his bed: but contrariwise, those that be surpris'd with the passions of the soule, at such a time be most busie, then they be least in repose and quiet; for their violent motions be the causes moving their actions, and their passions are the vehement fits of such motions: this is the cause that they will not let the soule to be at rest, but even then when as a man hath most need of patience, silence and quiet retreat, they draw him most of all abroad into the open aire; then are discovered soonest his cholericke passions, his opinionative and contentious humors, his wanton love and his grievous sorrowes, enforcing him to commit many enormities against the lawes, and to speake many words unseasonably, and not befitting the time.

Like as therefore much more perillous is the tempest at sea, which impeacheth and putteth backe a ship, that it can not come into the harbour to ride at anchor, than that which will not suffer it to get out of the haven and make faile in open sea; even so those tempestuous passions of the soule are more dangerous which will not permit to be at rest, nor to settle his discourse of reason once troubled, but overturneth it upside downe, as being disurnished of pilots and cables, not well ballasted in the storme, wandering to and fro without a guide and steersmen, carried mager into rash and dangerous courses, so long, untill in the end it falleth into some shipwracke, and where it overthroweth the whole life, in such sort that in regard of these reasons and others semblable, I conclude, that woofe it is to be soule-sicke than diseased in bodie; for the bodies being sicke, suffer onely, but the soules if they be sicke, both suffer and doe also amisse. To prove this, what neede we further to particularize and alledge for examples many other passions, considering that the occasion of this present time is sufficient to admonish us thereof, and to refresh our memorie? See you not this great multitude and preasse of people thrusting and thronging here about the Tribunall and common place of the citie; they are not all assembled hither to sacrifice unto the Tutelar gods, Protectors of their native countrey, nor to participate in common the same religion and sacred ceremonies of divine services; they are not all met heere together for to offer an oblation unto Jupiter Astræus, out of the first fruits of Lydia, and to celebrate and solemnize in the honor of Bacchus, during these holy nights, his festivall revils with daunces, masks, and mummeries accustomed: but like as by yearly access and anniversary revolutions, the forcible vigor of the pestilence returneth for to irritate and provoke all Asia; so they resort hither to entertaine their suits and processes in law to follow their pleas; and a world here is of affaires, like to many brookes and riverets which run all at once into one channell and maine streame; so they are met in the same place, which is pestered and filled with an infinite multitude of people, to hurt themselves and others. From what fevers or colde, ague-fits, proceed these effects? from what tensions or remissions, augmentations or diminutions? from what distemperature of heat, or overspreading of cold humours comes all this? If you aske of everie severall cause here in suite, as if they were men and able to answer you from whence it arose, how it grew, and whereupon it came and first began? you shall shall finde that one matter was engendred, by some wilfull and proud anger; another proceeded from a troublesome and litigious spirit; and a third was caused by some unjust desire and unlawful lust.

THE PRECEPTS OF WEDLOCKE.

The Summarie.

WE have heere a mixture, and medley of rules for married folke, who in the persons of Pollianus and Eurydice, are taught their mutuall duty: upon which argument needlesse is it to discourse at large, considering that the whole matter is set out particularly, and tendeth to this point: That both at the beginning, in the sequell also and continuation of marriage, man and wife ought to assist, support, and love one another with a single heart and affection, farre removed from disdainfull pride, violence, vanitie, and sinfulness; the which is specificd and comprised in 45. articles; howbeit in such sort, that there be some of those precepts, which favour of the corruption of those times, bewraying the insufficiency of humane wisdom, unlesse it be lightened with Gods truth. We see also in this Treatise more particular advices and admonitions appropriate to both parties, touching their devoir as well at home as abroad; and all enriched with notable similitudes and excellent examples. In summe, if these precepts following be well weighed and practised, they are able to make mans life much more easie and commodious than it is. But Plutarch sheweth sufficiently by the thirtieth rule, how hard a matter it is to retaine each one in their severall duties; and that in manner all doe regard and looke upon things with another eie, than they ought. How ever it be, those persons whom vertue hath linked and joined together in matrimonie, may finde here whereby to profit; and so much the more for that they have one lesson, which naturall equitie and conscience putteth in minde of everie day, if they will enter never so little into themselves, which being joined with the commandments of the heavenly wisdom, it can not be but husband and wife shall live in contentment and blessed estate.

THE PRECEPTS OF WEDLOCKE.

PLUTARCH to POLLIANUS and EURYDICE, sendeth greeting.

AFTER the accustomed ceremoniall linke of marriage in this countrey, which the Priestresse of Ceres hath put upon you, in coupling you both together in one bed-chamber, I suppose that this discourse of mine, comming as it doth to favorize and second this bond and conjunction of yours, in furnishing you with good lessons and wife nuptiall advertisements, will not be unprofitable, but found, verie fitting and conformable to the customarie wedding song observed in these parts. The musicians among other tunes that they had with the haue-boies, used one kind of note which they called Hippotharos, which is as much to say as Leape-mare; having this opinion that it stirred and provoked stallions to cover mares. But of many beautifull and good discourses which philosophic affordeth unto us, one there is which deserveceth no lesse to be esteemed than any other, by which these seeming to enchant and charme those who are come together to live all the daies of their life in mutuall societie, maketh them to be more bosome, kinde, tractable, and pliable one to the other. Therefore I have made a certaine collection of such rules and precepts which your selves have heard already oftentimes, being both of you trained up and nourished in the studie of philosophie; and reduced them all in few words to certaine principall heads and articles, to the end that they might be more easily remembered: the which I send as a common present to you both, beseeching withall, the Muses that they would vouchsafe in your behalfe, and for your owne sake to assist and accompanie the goddesse Venus; forasmuch as their office is to make a good consonance and accord in marriage and house-keeping, by the meanes of reason and harmonie philosophicall, no lesse than to set in tune a lute or harpe, or any muscalle instrument.

1 And to begin withall: This is the reason that our auncients ordeined, that the image of Venus should be placed jointly with that of Mercurie, as giving us thereby to understand, that the delight and pleasure of marriage, had need especially to be maintained with good language and wife speeches: they used to set also with these two images, the Graces, and Goddesse of Eloquence Ladie Pithe, that is, Perswasion, intending thereby that those folke whom the bond of matrimonic had linked together, might obtaine what they desired one at the others hand gently and by faire meanes, not by debate, chiding and brawles.

2 Solon gave order and commanded that the new-wedded bride should eate of a quince before that she came in bed with her bridegrome; signifying covertly in mine opinion by this darkest ceremony, that first and above all, the grace proceeding from the mouth, to wit, the breath and the voice, ought to be sweete, pleasant, and agreeable in everie respect.

3 In the countrey of Beotia, the custome was upon the wedding day when the nuptiall vaile was put over the bride, for to set also upon her head a chaplet made of wilde preckie Spirack branches, for that this plant out of a most sharpe and pricking thorne, putteth forth a most pleasant and delectable fruit; even so, the wedded wife in case her husband do not reject and flie her companie, for the first difficulties and troublesome inconveniences incident to marriage, shall bring unto him afterwards a sweete and amiable societie; but they that can not endure at first the jarres and quarrels of their young wives, whom they married virgins, may for all the world be resembled to those who give away ripe grapes from themselves to others, because they so be fowre before they are ripe; semblably, many new wedded-wives, who take a disdaine to their husbands by reason of some debates and encounters at the first, doe much like unto those who having abidden the sting of the Bee, cast away the honie-combe out of their hands. It behooveth therefore new-married folke, to take heed especially in the beginning, that they avoid all occasions of dissention and offence giving; considering this with themselves, and seeing daily that the pieces of wooden vessels which are newly joined and glued together, at the first are soone disjoined, and go asunder againe upon the least occasion in the world, but after that in continuance of time the joint is strongly settled and soundly confirmed, a man shall hardly part and separate one piece from another with fire or yron edged tooles.

4 And like as fire kindleth soone & catcheth a flame if it meet with light stubble, chaffe, or the haire of an hare, but it quickly goeth out againe, if there be not put thereto some matter or fewell anon, which may both hold in and also maintaine and feede the flame; even so, we are to thinke that the love of young-wedded persons, which is enflamed and set on fire by youth, and the beawtie of the bodie onely, is not firme and durable, unlesse it be surely founded upon the conformitie of good and honest maners, and take hold of wisedome, whereby it may engender a lively affection and reciprocally disposition one toward the other.

5 Fishes are soone caught and taken up by baits made of empoysoned paste, or such like medicines, but their meat is naught and dangerous to be eaten; semblably, those women who compound certaine love drinckes, or devise other charmes and sorceries for to give their husbands, and thinke by such allurements of pleasure to have the hand and command over them, it is all to nothing, that afterwards in their life together they shall find them to be blockish, foolish, & senseless companions. Those men whom Cree the famous sorceresse enchanted with hir witchcraft, did her no pleasure, neither served they her in any stead, being transformed (as they were) into swine and asses; whereas the loved and affected entirely and exceedingly Ulysses, an ingenious man and who conversed wisely with her; but such wives as had rather bee mistresses and over-rule their doltish husbands, than obey them that be wife & men of understanding, may very properly be compared unto them, who chooseth rather to leade and conduct the blind, than to be guided

guided by those that see, and to follow them that have knowledge. These women will never believe that Pasiphaë being a Kings wife loved a bull, notwithstanding they see some wives that can not endure their husbands, if they be any thing austere, grave, sober, and honest, but they abandon and give themselves over more willingly to accompanie with such as be composed altogether of luxurious loosenesse, of filthy lust and voluptuousnesse, like as if they were dogs or goats.

6 Some men there be so tender, feeble, and effeminate, that being not able to mount up their horse-backes as they stand, teach them to stoupe and rest upon their knees, that they may get upon them; and even so, you shall finde divers husbands, who having espoused rich wives and defended of noble houses, never studie to make them better, but keepe downe their wives and hold them under, being perswaded that they shall rule them the better when they are thus humbled and brought low; whereas indeed they should as well maintaine the dignitie of their wives, as regard and keepe the just stature and height of their horses, as well in the one as the other, make use of the bridle.

7 We see that the moone, the farther that she is from the sunne, the brighter she shineth and is more cleere, and when she approacheth neere unto his raies and beames, the lesst her light and is darkened; but a chaffe, honest and wife woman must do cleane contrarie; for she ought to be most seene with her husband, and if he be away, to keepe close and hold her selfe within house.

8 It was not well said of Herodotus: That a woman casteth off her pudicitie, when she putteth off her smocke or inner garment; for cleane contrarie it is in a chaste and sober matron, for in stead thereof she putteth on shamefastnes and honestie; and the greatest signe of all other that married folke do love reciprocally is this, when they have most reverence and shamefast regard one to the other.

9 Like as if one take two sounds that accord together, the base is alwaies more heard, and the song is ascribed to it; even so, in an house well ordered and governed, all goes well which is done by the consent of both parties; but evident it is and apparent, that the conduct, counsell and direction of the husband, is that which effecteth it.

10 The sunne upon a time (as the fable goeth) had the victorie over the northern winde; so for when the said winde blew forcibly upon a man, and with the violence of his blasts, did what it could to drive his cloake or upper garment from off his shoulders, the man strived so much the more to hold it on and keepe it close about him; but when the sun came to be hot after the said wind was laid, and set the man in exceeding heat by his beames, he was glad to throw off his said cloake; yea and feeling himselfe to burne with heat, put off his coat, shirt and all; and even semblably do the most part of women, for when they perceive that their husbands by their authority, and perforce will take from them their superfluous delights and vaine pleasures, they strive againe and make resistance, and are offended and discontented therewith; but when as contrariwise they come unto them with gentle remonstrances and milde perswasions, then of themselves they will be content peaceably to lay them aside, and endure all with patience.

11 Cato deprived a senatour of Rome of his honorable place, for that in the presence of his owne daughter, he kissed his wife. I cannot simply commend this act of his, for it favoured per-adventure too much of severitie and rigor: but if it be (as no doubt it is) an unseemly sight for man and wife to kisse, clip, embrace, and use dalliance together in the presence of others; how can it chuse but be more shamefull and unseemly to chide, brawle, and taunt one another before strangers? and when a man hath plaied, sported, and used love-delights in secret with his wife, afterwards in open place to checke, rebuke, nip and gird at her with spitefull speeches in the face of the world?

12 Like as a mirrour or looking glasse garnished with golde and precious stones, serveth to no purpose, if it doe not represent to the life the face of him or her that looketh into it; no more is a woman worth ought (be she otherwise never so rich) unlesse she conforme and frame her selfe, her life, her maners and conditions futable in all respects to her husband. A false mirrour it is, and good for nothing, that sheweth a sad and heave countenance to him who is merrie and jocund, and contrariwise, which resembleth a glad and smiling visage to one who is melancholike, angrie and discontent; even so, a bad woman is she, and a very untoward piece, who when her husband is desirous to solace himselfe and be merrie in disporting with her, frowneth and looketh doggedly under the brows, and on the other side, when she seeth him amused in serious matters, and in a deepe study about his affaires, is set on a merrie pin, and given to mirth

and laughter; for as the one is a signe of a fowre plumme and an unpleasant yoke-fellow, so the other bewraith a woman that setteth light by the affections of her husband; whereas indeed besitteth it were, that as (by the saying of Geometricians) the lines and superficies move not at all of themselves, but according to the motions of the bodies; even so a wife should have no proper passion or peculiar affection of her owne, but be a partaker of the sports, serious affaires, sad countenance, deepe thoughts, and smiling looks of her husband.

13 They that take no pleasure, nor can not away that their wives doe eat and drinke freelee with them at the table in their sight, doe as much as teach them how to cram themselves and fill their gorge apart when they be alone; even so they that will not vouchsafe to live merrily and be pleafant with their wives, nor can abide to disport and laugh privately with them, teach them the ready way to seeke their pleasures and delights by themselves.

14 The kings of Persia at their ordinarie meales have their queenes or espoused wives to sit by them at the boord, but when they list to be merrie indeed and carrouse lustily untill they be drunke, they send them away to their chambers, and call for their concubines, singing wenches, and muscicall trulles in their place; * I can commend them yet for so doing, in that they would not have their owne lawfull wives to be partakers of their drunkenness and licentious loosenesse. If therefore it chance that some private person abandoned to his owne pleasures, untaught, and given to leawd conditions, chance to do a fault in abusing himselfe either with his paramour or his wives chamber-maid, his wife must not be angrie for the matter and frowne at him for it, but rather thus to thinke with her selfe, and make this construction, that her husband being loth and afraid to offend her with his drunkenness, unbridled lust and intemperance, turned another way for that purpose.

* Plutarch herein smelleth of the corruption in his time: for a Christian dame & honest matron will not abide to put up such an injurie, nor wink at her husbands follies in that case.

15 Kings if they love musick, cause many good musicians to be in their kingdom; if they set their minds upon their booke, they make many learned clerks; if they be given to feats of activitie and exercise of the body, many of their subjects (by that example) will prove champions and tall men of their hands; even so a husband that loveth to trim and pamper his bodie, causeth his wife (by that meanes) to study nothing els but the tricking and pruning of her selfe; he that followeth his pleasures and wanton delights, maketh her also to be lascivious and to play the harlot; but who that embraceth honestie, and ensueth vertue and good things, by his example shall have an honest, vertuous and wise wife of her.

16 A young woman of Sparta being asked the question by one, whether she had medled or lien yet with her husband: Not I (quoth she) but he hath with me. And in very truth, in this maner (by mine advice) it would become an honest matron and huswife to behave herselfe toward her husband, that she neither reject and disdain dalliance and love-sports with him, if he begin with her, nor yet herselfe offer such temptations first unto him; for as this is a trick of a wanton and unflame-faced strumpet, so the other bewraith a proud woman, and one who is nothing lovely nor amiable.

17 A woman ought to have no peculiar friends by herselfe, but to use her husbands friends and take them as her owne. Considering then, that the gods challenge the first and principall place in friendship, * the wife is to acknowledge and worship the same gods (and none els but those) whom her husband honoureth, serveth, and reputeth gods; moreover, she ought to shut and locke the gate against all curious and new inventions of religions, and not to enterteine any strange and forren superstitions; for I assure you, to none of the gods can those divine services and sacrifices be acceptable, which a woman will seeme to celebrate by stealth, and without the knowledge and privitie of her husband.

* Herein also Plutarch sheweth of what religion he is.

18 Plato writeth, that the citie is blessed and happie, wherein a man shall never heare these words: This is mine, and, This is not mine: for that the inhabitants thereof have all things there (especially, if they be of any worth and importance) as neere as possibly they can, common among them: but these words ought rather to be banished out of the state of matrimonic, unless it be (as the Physicians holde) that the blowes or woundes which are given on the left side of the body, are felt on the right; even so a wife ought to have a fellow-feeling (by way of sympathie and compassion) of her husbands calamities, and the husband of his wives, much more; to the end, that like as those knots are much more fast and strong, when the ends of the cords are knit and interlaced one within another, even so the bond of marriage is more firme and sure, when both parties (the one as well as the other) bring with them a mutuall affection and reciprocall benevolence, whereby the fellowship and communion betweene them is maintained jointly by them both; for nature herselfe hath made a mixture of us, of two bodies, to the end that by taking part of one and part of another, and mixing all together, she might make that which commeth thereof, common to both, in such sort, as neither of the twaine can discern and distinguish what is proper to the one or peculiar to the other. This communion of goods especially, ought principally to be among those who are linked in wedlocke, for that they should put in common, and have all their favorie incorporate into one substance, in such way, as they repute not this part proper to one, and that part peculiar to another, but the whole proper to themselves, and nothing to another: and like as in one cuppe where there is more water than wine, yet we say nevertheless that the whole is wine; even so the goods and the house ought to beare the name of the husband, although peradventure the wife brought with her the bigger portion.

19 Helene was covetous, and Paris lascivious; contrariwise, Ulysses was reputed wise, and Penelope chaste; and therefore the mariage of these last named, was blessed, happie and beloved; but the conjunction of those two before, infortunate, bringing upon the Greeks and Barbarians both, a whole Iliad, that is to say, an infinite masse of miseries and calamities.

20 A gentleman of Rome, who espoused an honest, rich, faire and young ladie, put her away, and was divorced from her; whereupon being reprooved and sharply rebuked by all his friends, he put forth his foot unto them and shewed them his shoe: What finde you (quoth he) in this shoe of mine amisse? new it is and faire to see to; howbeit, there is not one of you all knoweth where it wringeth me, but I wot well where the fault is, and feelee the inconvenience thereof. A wife therefore is not to stand so much upon her goods and the dowie shee brings, nor in the nobilitie of her race and parentage, ne yet in her beaultie, as in those points which touch her husband most, and come neere to his heart; namely, her conversation and fellowship, her maners, her carriage & demeanor, in all respects so disposed, that they be all not harsh, nor troublesome from day to day unto her husband, but pleafant, lovely, obsequious, and agreeable to his humor: for like as Physicians feare those feavers which are engendered of secret and hidden causes within the bodie, gathering in long continuance of time by little and little, more than such as proceed from evident and apparent causes without; even so there fall out otherwhyles petite jarres, daily and continuall quarrels betweene man and wife, which they see and know full little that be abroad; and these they be which breed separation, and cause them to part sooner than any thing els, these marre the pleasure of their cohabitation more than any other cause whatsoever.

21 King Philip was enamoured upon a certaine Thessalian woman, who was supposed and charged, by her forceries and charmes to have enchanted him to love her; whereupon queene Olympias his wife wrought so, that she got the woman into her hands; now when she had well viewed her person, and considered her beautifull visage, her amiable favour, her comely grace, and how her speech shewed well that she was a woman of some noble house, and had good bringing up: Out upon these slanderous firmises (quoth she) and false imputations; for I see well that the charmes and forceries which thou usest, are in thy selfe. In like maner we must thinke, that an espoused and legitimate wife is as one would say, a fort inexpugnable, namely, such an one, as (in her selfe reposing and placing all these things, to wit, her dowie, nobilitie, charmes and love-drinks, yea, and the very tissue or girdle of Venus, by her study and endeavour, by her gentle behavior, her good grace and vertue) is able to win the affectionate love of her husband for ever.

22 Another time, the same queene Olympias hearing that a certaine young gentleman of the Court had married a ladie, who though she were faire and well-favoured, yet had not altogether the best name: This man (quoth shee) hath no wit at all in his head, for otherwise hee would never have married according to the counsell and appetite of his eyes only. And in truth we ought not to goe about for to contract marriage by the eie or the fingers, as some doe who count with their fingers how much money, or what goods a wife bringeth with her, never caring and making computation of her demeanor and conditions, whether she be so well qualified, as that they may have a good life with her.

23 Socrates was wont to counsell young men who used to see their faces and looke upon themselves in mirrors, if they were foule or ill-favoured, to correct that deformitie by vertue; if they were faire, not to soile and staine their beaultie with vice; semblably, it were very well that the mistresse of an house having in her hand a looking glasse, should say thus unto her selfe if she be foule and deformed: What a one should I be if I were nought or leawd withall? if faire and well-favoured: How highly shall I be esteemed, if I be honest and wife besides? for if an hard

hard-favoured woman be loved for her faire and gentle conditions, she hath more honor thereby, than if she wan love by beautie onely.

24 The tyrant of Sicily (Dionysius) sent upon a time unto the daughters of Lysander certaine rich robes, costly wreathes and precious jewels as presents; but Lysander would not receive these gifts, saying: These presents would bring more shame than honour to my daughters. And the Poet Sophocles, before Lysander's time, wrote to the like effect in these verses:

*This will (wretch) to thee none honour bring,
But may be thought a foule and shamefull thing;
It doth bewray a fop and foole in kinde,
And one who beares amost lascivious minde.*

for (according as the Philosopher Crates said) That is an ornament which doth adorne; and that adorneth a wife, which maketh her more comely and decent: this are not jewels of golde able to do, nor emerauds and other precious stones, nor purple and scarlet robes, but that only which causeth her to be reputed grave, sober, lowly and modest.

25 Those that sacrificed to Juno (surnamed Gemetia, that is, Nuptiall) offered not the gall with the rest of the beast that was killed, but plucked it out of the body, cast it aside, and laid it by, about the altar; by which ceremonie, he whoesoever he was that first instituted it, would give us to understand; that in matrimonie there ought to be no gall, that is to say, no bitter choler and anger at all; hee meant not thereby that a woman should not be grave, for a wife and matron that is mistress of an house, must carie an austere countenance in some sort, but this austerity or tartnesse ought to be like that verdure which is in wine, that is to say, holtsome and pleasant, not bitter or eager in any wife, as is Aloe Succotrine, nor resembling any such purgative drugs.

26 Plato perceiving Xenocrates the Philosopher (a man otherwise vertuous and well disposed) to be given a little to over-much severitie, admonished him to sacrifice unto the Graces; even so I suppose, that a vertuous dame hath need also of the Graces helpe, as much as of any thing els, when she converseth with her husband, to the end that she may live in joy with him (as Metastorides saith) and not move him to anger and displeasure, for all she be an honest and chaste matron, and so repent another day of her pudicitie: for neither must a frugall hufwife and saving dame neglect to be cleane and neat, nor she that loveth her husband entirely, cease to offer kindeesse unto him, and deale with him after an amiable and loving sort; for surely the sower conversation of a woman maketh all her honesty to be but odious, like as flattery also causeth all her frugalitie and thrift to be hatefull and displeasing; in so much as she who is afraid to looke pleasantly, and smile upon her husband, or to shew some such like love-tricks, because forsooth she would not be thought bold and wanton, is much like unto her, who because she would not seeme to have her head besmeared with precious perfumes, forbearth also to be anointed with oile, and for that folke should not thinke that shee painteth her face, will not so much as wash the same. Poets wee see and orators, as many of them as would avoide a bafe, illiberal, and ill affected kinde of stile, without good grace which breedeth tediousnes in the reader and hearer, studie and endeavour with all the wit they have to entertaine and moove both the one and the other by their fine invention, good dispose, and naturall representation of the manners of each person; and even so, an honest dame and hufwife shall do well, to avoide and reject all superfluitie, all curiositie, and in one word whatsoever favoureth of a whoore, or such an one as loveth to shew her selfe abroad in pompous manner, and rather employ all her wit, her art and industrie in the pleasant and amiable carriage of her selfe, in her affabilitie and lovely conversation with her husband, daily and howely acquainting and accustoming him to honestie and decencie with pleasure and delight. Howbeit, if it fall out so, that some one woman be so austere of nature, that by no means which the husband useth, he can make her pleasant and sociable, in this case he must be content and beare his owne crosse; and like as Phocion answered to Antipater, who required him to do a dishonest act and little befitting his estate: Sir (quoth he) you can not have me to be your friend and a flatterer to; even so must he say to himselfe of such a wife, who is sower and unpleasant, but yet honest: It is not meet that I should looke to converse with her as a true espoused wife and a light harlot also.

27 The Egyptian wives by the ancient custome of their countrey, weare no shooes at all upon their feete, to the end that this fashion of going might put them in mind to keepe home; but far otherwise it is with our dames for the most part, from whom if you take their gilded pantofles, their carkanets, their bracelets, their fine garters, their purple garments and pearles, they will never go once out of their houses.

28 Tham

28 Tham, as she one day dressed her selfe and put on her raiment, chanced to shew her arme a good way bare, and when one that stood by perceived it, and said withall: Oh there is a faire elbow: True (quoth she) but it is not for every man; and even so, not the arme onely of a chaste and honest dame ought not to be common, but also not so much as her verie speech; for she is as well in manner to take heed and beware how she open her mouth and speake much, as to discover and lay her bodie naked before strangers, for that her manners, actions, and conditions which she hath, she openeth unto others when she speaketh.

29 Phidias, when he made the image of Venus for the Eleians, devised that she should tread with her feete upon a tortoise shell, signifying thereby that a woman ought to keepe home and not goe forth of doores, but stay within house with silence; for surely a wife is to speake either unto her husband onely, or else by the meanes of her husband; neither must she thinke much and be offended, if like the minstrell that foundeth the hautboies, she utter a lower and bigger voice than her owne, by the tongue of another.

30 Great men and rich, princes also and kings, in honouring Philosophers, do grace both them and their owne selves; but Philosophers in making court and doing service unto those rich and mighty personages, adde thereby no reputation unto them, but make themselves more honored and better accepted; semblably it fareth with wives, for when they be subject to their husbands, they winne praise and commendation, but when they will needs bee masters, they get greater shame by it, and do more undecently, than those whom they have the maistrie of. For by good right, the husband ought to rule over the wife; not as the lord over his slave, or that which he possesseth; but after the same manner as the foule governeth the bodie, by a certaine mutuall love and reciprocall affection, wherewith he is linked unto her: for as the foule may well have a care of the bodie, without subjecting it selfe to the pleasures and disordinate lusts thereof; even so, may an husband have the sovereignty over his wife, and withall exercise the same neverthelesse in all kindnes, and be ready to gratifie and please her.

31 Philosophers doe hold opinion that of bodies some consist of parts disjoined and distinct, and separate one from another, as a fleet of ships or an armie of men; others of pieces joined together and touching close one another, as an house or a ship; and some againe be composed of parts united and incorporate into one nature living and growing together, as the bodies of living creatures. Much like to these compositions is wedlocke: for the conjunction of those in matrimonie, who love entirely one another, and for pure love be linked in marriage, resembleth a bodie, the parts whereof are naturally united together: that copulation of those who marrie for rich dowries, wealth, or procreation of children, may be compared to that bodie which standeth of pieces, that touch onely and meet together in a joint: but such a marriage as respecteth nothing but carnall companie in bed together, is like unto those bodies, the parts whereof stand asunder, and neither be united in one, nor touch one the other. But like as the naturall Philosophers affirme, that liquid bodies or humours be those which are apt to be mingled wholly one with another in every part; even so, it becometh that of those who are joined together in matrimony the bodies, goods, friends, & familiars, be totally intermingled together: which is the reason that the law-giver in setting downe the Roman lawes, forbade expressly such as were entred into the bond of wedlocke, to give and receive any gifts interchangeably, or to make mutuall donation; not intending thereby that they should participate in nothing, but that they should repute all things in common betwene them.

32 A custome their was in Leptis, a citie situate in Libya, that the new-wedded bride the morrow after her marriage, should send unto the bridegroomes mother, for to borrow a brasie pot or kettle to hang over the fire; but his mother-in-law must denie it and say, shee hath none for her; to the end that this young wife being at the first acquainted with the fashions of her mother-in-law, favouring somewhat of a crooked stepdame, might not thinke it strange or be much grieved if it chance afterward that she deale more hardly with her. A wife knowing thus much, ought betimes to meet with all occasions of such ordinarie offences which proceed from nothing els, but a jealousy that the stepmother hath over her, for the love that she beareth unto her sonne: The only remedie of which passion is this, that the new-wedded wife endeavor so to win the affection of her husband, that she doe not withall diminish nor withdraw that affection of his which a sonne ought to beare unto his naturall mother.

33 It seemeth that mothers ordinarily love their sonnes better than the daughters, as at whose hands they hope for more succour another day; and fathers contrariwise affect their daughters more, as who have more need of their helping hand; and peradventure may be let her chaffitie, honestie, and pure love to her husband appeare most, that it may be well seene that she keepeth herselfe for him alone.

42 Plato exhorted elder folke to behave themselves more modestly before yong persons, than any other, that so they might learne also to reverence their elders and be respectuous of them; for where olde people be shamelesse, it is not possible to imprint any shame or grace in the yonger. Now ought an husband evermore to cary in remembrance this precept: To have none in the world in better respect and more reverence, than his owne wife, forasmuch as the bed-chamber is unto her a schoole-house either of chastity and pudicity, or els of loosenesse and incontinence; for the husband that followeth those pleasures himselfe which he debarreth his wife of, doth as much as bid his wife to fight with those enemies unto whom he hath already to yeelded himselfe prisoner.

43 Moreover, as touching the love and desire to go trim, and to decke and adorne the body, I would with you (o Eurydice) to endeavor for to call to your remembrance those rules which you have read in the treatise that Timoxenus wrote unto Arifilla concerning that argument. And as for you (o Pollianus) never thinke that your wife will abstaine from such curiosity, and lay away those delights and superfluities, so long as she perceiveth that you despise not, nor reject the like vanity in other things, but that you take pleasure both to see and have your cuppes and goblets gilt, your cabinets curiously and costely painted, your mules and horses set out with rich caparisons, sumptuous trappings, and costely furniture: for an hard matter it is to chafe away and banish such delicate superfluities out of the nursery and womens chamber, so long as they see the same to reigne in the mens parlour and where they have to do.

44 Furthermore, you Pollianus being now of ripe yeres to studie those sciences which are grounded upon reason, and proceed by undoubted demonstration, adorne from hence forward your manners by frequenting the company of such persons, and conversing with them, who may serve you in good stead and farther you that way: and as for your wife, see you doe the part of a studious and industrious Bee, in gathering for her and to her hand from all parts good things which you thinke may benefit & profit her, likewise bring the same home with you, impart them unto her, devise and commune with her about them apart, and by that means make familiar and pleasant unto her the best bookes and the best discourses that you can meet with all:

*For why? to her you are in stead,
of fire and brother kind;
A mother deere from henceforth now to her she must you find.*

like as in Homer, Andromache laid of her husband Hektor. And verily in mine opinion it were no lesse honorable for a man to hear his wife say thus unto him: My husband, you are my teacher, my regent, my master, and instructor in Philosophie, and in the knowledge of the most divine and excellent literature; for these sciences and liberal arts do above all other things divert and withdraw the minds of women from other unwoorthie and unseemely exercises. A matron or dame who hath studied Geometrie, will be ashamed to make profession of dauncing the measures; and she that is already enchanted and charmed (as it were) with the singular discourses of Plato and Xenophon, will never like of the charmes and enchantments of witches and forcerers; and if any enchantresse should come unto her, and make promise to draw downe the moone from heaven, she would mocke those women and laugh at their grosse ignorance, who suffer themselves to be perfwaded for to beleve the same, as having learned somewhat in Astrologie, and heard that Aganice the daughter of Hegetor, a great Lord in Theſſia, knowing the reason of the eclipses of the moone when she is at the full, and observing the verie time when the bodie of the moone will meet right with the shadow of the earth, abused other women of that countrey, and made them beleve that it was herselfe who fetched downe the moon out of the skie.

45 It was never heard yet that a woman by course of nature should conceive, and bring forth a childe of her selfe alone without the companie of man: marie some there be who have bene known to gather in their wombe a rude masse or lump, without the true forme of a reasonable creature, resembling rather a piece of flesh engendred and growing to a consistance by means of some corruption, which some call a Mole. Great heed therefore would be taken that the like befall not to the soule and mind of women; for if they receive not from others the feeds of good matters and instructions, that is to say, if their husbands helpe them not to conceive good doctrine and sound knowledge, they will of themselves fall a breeding and be delivered of many many strange conceits, absurd opinions, and extravagant passions. But mine advice unto you Eurydice, is to be studious alwaies in the notable sayings and sentences morall of sage, wise, and approved men: have alwaies in your mouth the good words, which heretofore when you were a yong maiden you heard and learned of us; to the end that you may be a joy to your husband, and be praised and commended by other women, when they shall see you so honorably adorned and beautified without any cost bestowed upon brooches, tablets and jewels: for you can not possibly come by the precious pearles of this or that rich and wealthie woman, nor have the silken gownes and velvet robes of such a Ladie of a strange countrey, for to array or trim your selfe withall, but you must buy them at an exceeding high and deere price: but the ornaments and attire of Theano, of Cleobuline, of Gorgo the wife of king Leonidas, of Tmoctea, the sister of Theagenes, of Clodia the ancient Romane Ladie, of dame Cornelia, the sister of Scipio, and of other Ladies and gentlewomen so much renowned and bruited heretofore for their rare virtues, you may have gratis, freely and without a penie cost; wherewith if you decke and adorne your selfe, you shall live both happily, and also with honor and glorie. For if Sappho for her sufficiency in Poetrie, and the skill that she had in verifying, stucke not to write thus to a certaine rich and wealthie dame in her time:

*All dead thou shalt one day entombed be,
There shall remaine of thee no memorie,
For that no part of roses came to thee
That flower upon the mountaine Pierie.*

Why shouldst not thou thinke better of thy selfe, and take more joy and contentment in thine heart, considering thou hast thy part not onely of the roses and flowers, but also of the fruits which the Muses bring forth and yeeld to those who love good letters, and highly esteeme of Philosophie?

THE BANQUET OF THE SEVEN SAGES.

The Summarie.

40 WHether it were that the persons named in this discourse following were at a banquet in deed, and there discoursed of such matters as are here by Plutarch handled; or that himselfe had collected and gathered the Apophthegmes and histories of his time; or how soever it was; we may see by this present Treatise what was the custome of Sages and wise men in ancient time at their feasts, namely, to invite one another courteously, to solace themselves and make merrie hartily, without many ceremonies and complements to shew sincere amitie, and without excessive cost and expence to keepe good cheere after a plaine, open, and simple manner. The principall part of which meetings and frequentings of the table, being employed in devising sadly, and with settled minde both during their repast, and a prettie while after, of matters honest, pleasant, and tending to good instruction and edification; as this booke and the Symposiakes or Table-discourses, wherof we shall see more hereafter do plainly shew. This manner and custome serveth to be opposed partly against the solitarie life, and beggerly niggardise of base misers, covetous penni-fathers, and such like enemies of humane societie, and in part against the excessive pompe, unmeasurable sumptuousness, dissolute riots and foolish vanitie and gourmandise of those that love nothing but their panceh, and know no other god to worship but their bellie; as also against the fond laughsters, bragging vanities, impudent facings, scurrile mockeries, and dogged backbitings, that senselesse jots and peevish persons are given unto; and finally against the enormities, violences, and outrages, of such as are wholly abandoned and given over to sinne and wickednes. Moreover, so come more particularly to this booke following, Plutarch bringeth in one named Diocles, who recounteth unto Nicarachus

all that was said and done at Corinth in a certaine banquet, at which were these persons, namely, Perianther the sovereign lord of that citie, and the host who had all the guests, to wit, Solon, Bias, Thales, Cleobulus, Pittacus and Chilon, named in those daies, The seven sages or wise men of Greece, Item, Anacharsis, Aelophe, Niloxenus, Cleodemus and certaine others. But before that he entereth into any speech of that which passed during the banquet and afterwards, he rehearseth the communication held betwene Thales and those of his company upon the way of Corinth, where they take of matters handled more at large afterwards: then consequently he treateth of that which a guest ought to do who is invited to a banquet, and describeth what hapned among some of the guests: proceeding a little forward, he declareth what was the manner of the entrance, the sines and end of the banquet, to wit, modest, and seasoned with pleasant speeches (and those most honest and civil) of the host and his familie: which done, he entereth into the recitall of the talke that was held after the supper or banquet: of which the beginning grew from the musike of flutes, and by a certaine comparison devolved with a good grace, he causeth audience to be given unto Niloxenus a stranger; by occasion whereof, Bias doth expound the riddle or darke question sent by a king of Aethiopia unto the king of Aegypt, which in the same traine inferreth an excellent occasion to speake of the dueitie and office of kings; of which argument, all the foresaid Sages follow their minds summarily, together with the proper riddles and enigmaticall questions from the king of Aegypt to the king of Aethiopia. Now after the deciphering and solving of the said riddles, the former Sages fall into a discourse as touching the government popular and democraticall, upon which point they doe opine and speake their mindes in order, coming afterwards to conference together of certaine particularities of house-keeping, to wit, of drinking and of other pleasures; of the quantitie of goods that may suffice a man; of the frugalitie, thrift and sobrietie of men in olde times; of the necessity and delights of drinking and eating; and finally of the discomforts, inconveniences and miseries incident to mans life in this behalfe. And for a conclusion, bringeth in one Gorgias, who being arrived unluckily for, and coming suddenly in place, relateth the strange accident of Ation saved by the meanes of a dolphin; which report draweth on the company to other like narrations and tales: at the end whereof, after grace said and thanksgiving according to the accustomed manner of that people, the guests retire themselves and depart.

DIOCLES.

Ertes, the long proceesse and continuance of time (my good friend Nicarchus) can not chuse but breed and bring much darknesse, obscuritie and incertitude of mens actions and affaires; when as now in matters so fresh, so new, and so lately passed, you have met with certaine false reports, which notwithstanding are beleevied and received for true: for there were not onely those seven guests at the table in this feast as you have heard and are borne in hand, but more than twise so many, of whom my selfe made one, being familiar and inward with Periander, by reason of mine art and profession, and the host besides to Thales; (for by the commandement of Periander, he lodged in mine house) neither hath he (whoever he was that related the thing unto you) borne well in minde, and remembered what the speeches and discourses were, which they held; which maketh me verily to thinke that he was not himselfe one of them who were at the banquet. But seeing we are now at good leasure (and for that olde age is no suretie sufficient to give good warrantie for to defer and put off this report unto a farther time, and because you are so desirous to know the truth) I will rehearse unto you all in order even from the very beginning.

First and formost, the feast was prepared by Periander, not within the citie, but about the port or haven Lechaon, in a faire great hall or dining chamber neere to the Temple of Venus, unto whom there was also a sacrifice offered; for since the infortunate love of his mother, who voluntarily made herselfe away, having not sacrificed unto Venus, this was the first time that he was moved thereto, as being incited by certaine dreames of Melissa to worship and adore the said goddess. Now to every one of the guests invited to this banquet, there was a coach brought, richly appointed and set out accordingly, for to convey and conduct them to the place appointed, for that it was the Summer season, and all the port-way from the citie, as farre as to the seaside, was full of dust, and resounded with great noise by reason of a number of chariots and a world of people going to and fro betwene. As for Thales, seeing at my gates a coach standing and ready to carie him, he fel a smiling and laughing, and so sent it backe againe: he and I then put our selves in our way, and went faire and softly together on foot over the fields; and a third there was, who bare us companie, to wit, Niloxenus of Naucraria, a man of good worth, and one who had beene familiarly acquainted with Solon and Thales before-time in Aegypt, and as then was he sent the second time unto Bias, but wherefore, himselfe knew not, unless (as hee then was he sent the second time unto him a second question inclosed and sealed within a packet; for suspected) it were to bring unto him a second question inclosed and sealed within a packet; for this charge and commandement he had: That if Bias refused and would not take upon him to answer this charge and expound the same, he should shew it to the wisest Sages of the Greeks. Then began Niloxenus: An happy feast (quoth he) is this to me (my masters) and unexpected, wherein I shall finde you all together, for I carie with me thither a packet as you see, and with that he shewed it unto us: Then (quoth Thales smiling) if you have therein any hard and untoward question to be dissolved, carie it againe to Pyrene, for Bias will declare the meaning thereof, like as hee affoiled the former: What former question was that (quoth I): Mary (quoth he againe) hee sent unto him a sheepe for sacrifice, commanding that hee should take out of it the best and worst piece thereof, and so to send the said flesh unto him: hee therefore well and wisely plucked forth the tongue, and sent it unto him; for which hee was (by good right) well praised, highly esteemed, and held in great admiration. It was not therefore onely (quoth Niloxenus) that hee came to so great a name, but also for that hee refused not the amitie of princes and kings as you doe: for Amasis admired many more things in you, and namely among others, when you tooke the measure of the height of the Pyramis in Egypt, hee wondered exceedingly, and made high account of your conceit, for that without any great hand-labour, and the same requiring no instrument at all, by setting up a staffe onely plumbe upright, at the very point and end of the shadow which the said Pyramis cast, and by two Triangles which the beames of the sunne caused, you made demonstration, that what proportion there was betwene the length of both shadowes, to wit, of the Pyramis and the staffe, the same was betwene the height of the one and the other. But as I said before, you were accused unto the same king Amasis for bearing no good will unto kings and their estate, which was the cause of your disgrace and disfavour with him; besides, there were brought unto him and presented many slanderous speeches and contumelious answers of yours as touching tyrants: as for example; when Molpurgus a great lord of Ionia demanded upon a time of you what strange thing you had in your time seene? you answered: A tyrant living to be an old man: Again, at a certaine banquet there being some speech mooved as touching beasts which was the worst and did most harme? you made answer, that: Of wilde beasts a tyrant, and of tame beasts a flatterer was most dangerous; for I may tell you: Kings howsoever they say that they differ from tyrants, yet take they no pleasure at such Apophthegmes as those. That answer (quoth Thales againe) was none of mine, but Pittacus it was, who made it one day in scoffing merlie to Myrtilus: for mine one part, I doe not so much mervail at an aged tyrant, as I doe woonder to see an olde pilot: howbeit as touching this transposition and taking one for another, I am of the same minde, and am willing to say, as that yong man did who flung a stone at a dogge, and missing the dog hit his owne stepmother and felled her withall; whereat: It makes no matter (quoth he) for even so, the stone hath not light amisse. For, and in truth I my selfe alwaies esteemed Solona a right wife man, for that he refused to be the tyrant of his owne country: and even so Pittacus if he had never come to take upon him a monarchie, would not have delivered this speech; How hard a thing is it to be a good man! And it should seeme that Periander being seized upon (as a man would say) by the same tyranny, as an hereditarie disease from his father, so did not amisse to endeavour what he could to free himselfe and get out of it, by converting with the best men and frequenting their companie, as hee hath done to this day, and training unto him the societie of Sages and philosophers, and being ruled and advised by them, not approving nor admitting the perilous and unhappie counsell of my country-man Thrasibulus, perswading him to cut the chief men shorter by the heads: For a tyrant who chooseth to command and rule slaves and vasailes rather than free men indeed, nothing differeth from the husband-man, who had leiser gather locusts and catch foules, than reape and bring in good graine of wheat and barley; for these soveraigne dominions and principalities bring with them this only good thing in stead and recompence of many evils; to wit, a kind of honor and glorie: if men be so happie in as ruling over good men, they be better themselves, and in commanding great persons become greater themselves; as for such as in their government and place of command, aime at nothing but their securitie, without respect of honour and honestie, deserve to be set over a number of sleepe, horses, or beasts, and not of men: but this good gentleman stranger heere, hath (I wot not how) cast us upon such discourses which are nothing convenient for our present purpose, omitting both to speake and also to demaund those matters that besit better those who goe to a feast: for thinke you not that the guest who is bidden, ought not to goe prepared as well as the very master himselfe is to make preparation? For the Sybarites (as it should seeme) solemnly invite their dames to their feasts, & seeme to bid them a whole yeere before, of purpose that they might have time enough to trim themselves at their good leasure with rich array and jewels of gold against they goe to a feast; and for mine owne part, I assure you of this mind I am, that the right preparative of one who is to go unto a great dinner as he should, would require a longer time than so, by how much harder it is to find fit and decent ornament for the manners of the miñde, than to provide for the superfluous, needlesse, and unprofitable setting out of the bodie: for a wise man who hath wit and understanding, goeth not to a feast carying with him his body as a vessell to be filled, but he goes thither with an intention to passe the time either in serious discourses, or pleasant and merry talke; to speake I say and heare according as the time shal give occasion to the companie, if they meane with joy and mirth to converse together one with another. A man that is come to a feast may if he like not a dish of meat, or if it be naught refuse it; or if the wine be not good, have recourse unto the nymphes; but a troublesome guest, a talkative busi-bodie, and an unmannerly or untaught neighbour sitting at the boord, marreth all the grace of the viands, be they otherwise never so deinty, he corrupteth the wine, yea and all the sweetnesse of the musicke, how melodious so ever it be. Neither may a man when he list vomit and cast up readily againe this trouble and vexation once received: but in some, a mutuall discontentment and offence taken at the table one with another, sticketh by them and continueth as long as they have a day to live, inasmuch as they cannot endure the enterview one of another againe; but like an old fursuit, arisen of wrong done, or of anger conceived by drinking wine, the spight remaineth festerling & corrupting in the stomacke and never will be digested. In mine opinion therefore did Chilon very well and wisely, who being invited as it were yesterday to a feast, would never promise to come before he knew what other guests he should meet with there, even everie one of them; for this was his saying: That a man must endure will he nill he if he be once at sea, a rude companion and uncivil fellow-passenger in the same ship where he is embarked; as also in warfare a troublesome mate in the same pavilion, for that he is forced of necessitie to saile with the one and encampe with the other; but for a man to fort himselfe indifferently and without discretion with all kinds of men at a banker, bewraith one that is void of all wit and judgement. As for the fashion and maners of the Egyptians, namely to bring in place ordinarily at their feasts a Scelet, that is to say, a drie and withered anatomic of a dead man, and there to shew it before all the guests at the boord, to put them in minde of death, and that within a while they all should become such; although I must needs say that such a one were an unwelcome guest, and came very unseasonably among them; yet it cannot be denied but there is some good use thereof; for although he cheere not up the guests there to drinke freely and to make merry, yet he inviteth and sturth them up to carie mutuall love and affection one to the other, in admonishing them to remember that their life being of it selfe short, they should not seeke to make it long and tedious by troublesome businesse and affaires.

Thus spent we the time by the way, until at length we were come to the banquetting house. And as for Thales he refused to wash or go into a baine: For that (quoth he) I am appointed already; but in the meane time that the rest were bathing, he went walking up and downe to see the pleasant races, the wrestling places, and the faire grove which along the sea was very well planted and kept accordingly; not because he wondered at the sight of any of all these delights, but for that he would not seeme to despise Periander, or disdain his magnificence in any thing. As for the others, according as any of them were washed or anointed, the servitors were ready to conduct them into the hall or dining place, appointed for men, and that through a porch or gallerie, within which sate Anacharsis, and before him stood a damosell plaiting and combing the haire of his head with her hands (whom as the ran toward Thales) most willingly and courteously he kissed, and after a smiling manner: Well done (quoth he) make that stranger, who of himselfe himselfe is the mildest and gentlest man in the world, to have a pleasant and faire countenance, that he looke not upon us fearfull and hideous to see to. I enquired then what pretie maiden this was: Why (quoth Thales) know you not that wife damosell so famous and to much renowned, Eumetis? for that is the name that her father gave her, howsoever the people call her after her fathers name Cleobuline. You praise this virgin (quoth Thales, doe you not) for her quick spirit in propounding, and her subtil wit and wisdom in affording riddles and darke questions, such as be called Enigmies? For by report there be some of her enigmaticall questions, which are gone as far as Egypt: No marie (quoth Thales againe) I say not so; for the usef them but as dice or coc-kall bones, when she list to disport her selfe and passe away the time with those that encounter her, and are disposed to enter into contention with her: but of a woonderfull courage and haughtie mind she is; a politike head she hath of her owne worthly to governe a State; of a courteous nature she is beside, and of sweet behaviour; in regard of which her carriage, she maketh her father to seeme a more milde and popular ruler among his citizens and subjects. It may well be so (quoth Thales) for surely the seemeth no lesse, if a man behold her homely apparell, and how simply she goes: but how cometh this inward affection and kindnesse to Anacharsis that so lovingly she dresseth and trimmeth him? Because (quoth Thales) he is a temperate and sober man, and besides a great schollar and a learned clarke, and for that he hath willingly and at large recounted unto her the manner of the Tartarians life, and namely how they use to charme the maladies of those that are sicke; and I verily beleve that even now whiles she maketh so much of the man, stroking his head, plaiting and broiding his haire, she learneth somewhat of him, or discoureth with him about some point of learning. Now when we drew neere to the hall or dining chamber abovesaid, who should meet us but Alexidamus the Milesian, a bastard sonne of Thrasibulus the Tyrant? who was newly come forth from thence in a great heat, distempered and troubled, and saying (I wot not what) to himselfe in a pelting chafe: for understad we could not plainly what his words were, he spake them so huddle: he had no sooner his eie upon Thales, but he seemed to reclaime himselfe, and so staid a little, breaking out into these audible tearmes: Periander (quoth he) hath offered me abuse & done me great wrong, in that he would not give me leave to depart, when I was willing and readie to embarke, but by his entreatie hath importuned me to stay supper; and now forsooth that I am come, he hath set me at the table in a place most dishonorable for my person, and hath preferred the Acolians, the Islanders, and other base companions, and indeed whom not, and before Thrasibulus; for apparant it is, that he despiseth my father who sent me, and meaneth that the disgrace offered unto me should redound upon him. How now (quoth Thales) is it so indeed? and are you afraid that like as the Egyptians hold opinion & say? That the stars in making their ordinarie revolutions, are one while elevated on high, & another while afterwards falling as low, and according to their heights, or baseness of the place, become either better or worse than they were? so you in regard of the place that is given you, should be advanced or debased more or lesse; for by this meanes you are worse & more base minded than the Laconian, who being by the master of the ceremonies set in the lowest place of the quire or daunce, was no more moved thereat, but said: Well done of you, I see you can skill of the meanes how to make this place more honorable: for when wee be set at a table, wee ought not to looke and regard, either beneath whom we sit, or after whom we are placed, but rather how we may accommodate and frame our selves to sort and agree with those next to whom wee sit; shewing presently at the verie first that wee have in our selves the beginning and handle (as a man would say) of amitie, in that we can finde in our hearts not to be offended with the place that is given us, but to praise our fortune in that wee are matched with so good companie: for he that is angrie about a place or seat, is more offended with him to whom he sitteth next, than with the master of the feast that bad him, and hee maketh himselfe odious as well to the one as the other. Tush (quoth Alexidamus) these are but words; for in verie deed I have observed, that even you who would be counted Sages and wise men, lay for meanes enough to make your selves honored; and with that he passed by us and went his way. Now as we mused and wondered much at this strange fashion and behaviour of the man: Thales turning unto us; This man (quoth he) is a brain-sicke foole, and of a monstrous nature, as you may well know by one trick that he plaied when he was a verie youth: for when there was brought unto Thrasibulus his father, a most excellent, sweet and precious ointment, he powred it out all into a great boll or standing cup, and wine likewise upon it, and when he had so done, drunke it up himselfe every drop, working by this meanes enmitie in stead of friendship to Thrasibulus. Immediately after this there comes to me a servitor with these words: Periander requesteth you to take Thales & this other stranger with you, and to come and see a thing that is newly presented and brought unto him, for to know your opinion, whether he is to take it as an accident happened by mere chance, or rather a prodigie that doth presage and prognosticate some strange event, for he himselfe is much troubled in minde thereat, and mightily feareth that it be some pollution or stain to this his feastivall sacrifice; hee had no sooner said this, but he brought us into one of the houses that stood upon the garden, where we found a young lad, seeming unto us to be some heard-man, he had not yet an haire on his face, and otherwife (believe me) he was faire enough and well-favoured, who opening a leather poke or bag that he had, shewed unto us a young monstrous babe, which (as he said) was borne of a mare; in the upper parts about the necke and armes shaped like a man, but all the rest resembling an horse; howbeit, crying and wrawling, as like as possibly might be to an infant new come into the world: at which sight Niloxenus turning his face at one side, cried out: God blesse us, & turne away his displeasure from us. But Thales after he had looked wistly a good while upon the young lad afore said, smiled at the matter (as his maner was to play and make good game with me about mine art: ) Are you not minded (quoth he) o Diocles to go about some expiatorie sacrifice for this prodigious sight, and to set on worke those gods whose care and charge it is to divert such imminent perils and misfortunes, this being as it is so fearfull a prodigie and unluckie accident? How else? (quoth I againe) for I assure you this is a token presaging discord and sedition; and I much feare lest this matter proceed as farre as to marriages, and the act of generation, even to the prejudice of posteritie, considering that the goddess before the expiation and satisfaction of her former anger, threateth thus the second time, as you see. Thales answered never a word to this, but departed laughing. And when Periander met us at the vetie hall doore, and enquired what we thought of this strange occurrent which we went to see: Thales left me, and taking him by the hand: As touching that (quoth he) which Diocles wil perswade you unto, do you as he willesh you at your best leisure: for mine owne part, mine advice and counsell unto you is, that you entertaine no more such youthes as this to keepe your mares, or at least wife, that you give them wives to wed. At the hearing of which words, it seemed unto me that Periander was exceeding well pleased; for he laughed a good, and after he had embraced Thales, kissed him. Then Thales turning unto me: I suppose verily (quoth he) o Diocles that this prodigious token hath wrought the effect, and is come to an end already; for see you not what an evill accident is befallen unto us, in that Alexidemus will not dine with us? Well, when we were come within the hall, Thales beginning to speake with a loude voice: And where is the place (quoth he) wherein this honest man thought some, & tooke such snuffe to be set: which when it was shewed unto him, he turned about, and went to sit there himselfe, and so tooke us with him; saying withall, I would (for mine owne part) have given any money (rather than failed) to sit at the same boord with Ardalus. Now was this Ardalus a Troezenian, by profession a Piper, and a Priest serving the Ardalun Muses, whose images ancient Ardalus the Troezenian had erected and dedicated. Then Aescop, who not long before had bene sent by king Crasus, as well to Periander as to the oracle of Apollo in the citie of Delphos, being set upon a low settle neere to Solon, who sat above him, came in with his fable, and thus said: A mule (quoth he) of Lydia having beheld the forme and shape of his owne body within a river, and wondrous much at the beaute and goodly stature thereof, began to runne with full carriere, to fling and shake his head and his maine, like a lustie brave horse; but within a while, remembering that hee was an asses sonne, and foaled by an asse, hee staid his swift course all on a sudden, and laid away his pride and insolent braverie. At these words, Chilo briefly in his Laconian language: Thou hast told (quoth he) a tale by thine owne selfe, who being a slow-backe like and asse, will needs runne as the said mule. After this entered in dame Melissa, and tooke her place close unto Periander: Eumetis also saie downe to supper with them: Then Thales address'd his speech unto me who fate next above Bias, and said: My friend Diocles, how hapneth it that you tell not Bias, that your friend and guest Niloxenus of Naurat is come from beyond sea the second time, sent from his lord the King unto him with new questions and riddles for to assoile, to the end that he may take knowledge of them while he is sober, and in case for to studie and thinke upon their solutions? Then Bias taking the word out of his mouth: It hath bene (quoth he) his old fashions of long time, for to seeme to fright & astonish me with such admonitions & advertisements as thes; as for me I know full wel that as Bacchus otherwife is a wife and powerfull god, so in regard of his wisdom he is surnamed Lysus, which is as much to say, as unfolding and undoing the knots of all difficulties; which is the cause that I have no feare at all, that if I be full of him, I shal

bee lesse heartie and able to mainteine the combat when I come to it and am put to dispute. These and such like pleasant speeches passed to and fro in merriment as they sat at meat. Now when I saw the setting out, and provision of this supper more frugall and sparie than ordinarie, I thought in my minde that to make a feast and give entertainment to wife and good men, putteth a man to no greater cost and expences, but rather easeth him off some charges: for that it abridgeth all curiositie of daintie viands, exquisite cates, costly perfumes, precious ointments, confitures and march-pains brought from forreine and farre countries, yea and fine and delicate wines, wherewith Periander being served daily at his ordinary, according to the magnificence of his princely estate, riches, affaires and occasions, yet at such a time he tooke a glorie among these Sages and wife men, in sobriety, frugallitie, and slender provision; for not in other things onely he cut-off and concealed all superfluitie and needlesse furniture which was usuall in his house-keeping, but also in his wives attire and ornaments, whom hee shewed to his friends and guests nothing costly arraid, nor keeping state, but meanelly set out and adorned. Now when the tables were taken away, and that Melissa had given and dealt chaplets of flowers unto us round about, we rendered thanks and said grace unto the gods, in powring out unto them devoutly a little wine; and the minstrell woman having sung a while after our grace, and according to our vowes, departed out of the roome.

Then Ardalus calling unto Anacharsis by name, demanded of him whether among the Scythians there were any such singing women & minstrell wenches that could play upon wind instruments? unto which demand he answered ex tempore and without studying for the matter; No (quoth he) nor so much as vines; and as Ardalus replied againe: But yet there are some gods among them, are there not? Yes iwis (quoth he) that there be, and those who understand the speech and language of men; but yet the Scythians are not of the same mind that the Greeks, who although they thinke themselves to speake more freely and elegantly than the Scythians, yet they hold opinion that the gods take more pleasure to heare the found of bones and wood, whereof their flutes and hautboies are made than the voice of man. But my good friend (quoth Aescop then) what would you say, if you knew what this pipe-makers do nowe a daies, who cast away the bones of young hind-calves and fawnes, and choose before them asses bones, saying forsooth that they make a better found? whereupon Cleobuline made one of her

Of braying asse	Did force the eare	Of mightie stag
when hee dead was,	with sound so cleare	with hornes to brag
The long shanke-bone.	Upright anone,	As hard as stone.

in such sort, that it is a wonder how an asse which is otherwise a most blockish and absurd beast, of any other most remote from all sweet harmonie of musick, should yeeld a bone so slicke, so smooth, and proper, to make thereof a most musically instrument. Certes, (quoth Niloxenus then) this is the reason that the inhabitants of the city Bufris, reproch all us of Naurat, for that we likewise have already taken two asse-bones for the making of our pipes; and as for them, it is not lawfull to heare so much as the sound of a trumpeter, because it somewhat doth resemble the braying of an asse; and you all know that the asse is infamous and odious with the Egyptians, because of Typhon. Upon this every man held his peace for a while; and when Periander perceived that Niloxenus had a good minde to speake, but yet durst not begin or broach any speech; My masters (quoth he) I doe like very well of the custome of cities and head-magistrates, in that they give audience and dispatch unto all strangers, before their owne citizens; and therefore me thinks it were well that for a time both you & we forbore our speeches which are so familiar and as it were native and home-borne among us in our owne countrey, to give acceffe and audience, as it were in a solemne counsell and assembly of estate, unto those questions and demands which our good friend heere hath brought out of Aegypt; and namely such as are moved from the king to Bias, and Bias I doubt not will confer with you about the same.

Then Bias seconding this motion of his: And in what place (quoth he) or with what companie would a man with rather for to hazard and trie his skill than in this, for to make answers accordingly and give solutions, if he be put unto it and need require? especially, seeing that the king himselfe hath given expresse commandement, that in proposing this question he should first begin within, & afterwards go round about the rest & present the same unto you all? Heerupon Niloxenus delivered unto him the kings letter, desiring him to breake it open, and to reade the same with an audible and loud voice before all the companie. Now the substance or tenor of the said letter ran in this forme. Amasis the king of the Egyptians, unto Bias the wisest

Sage

"Sage of all the Greekes sendeth greeting. So it is, that the king of the Aethiopians is entred into contestation and contention with me, as touching wisdom: and being in all other propositions put downe by me and found my inferior, in the end after all, he hath imposed upon me a commandement very strange, wonderfull, and hard to be performed, willing me forthwith to drinke up the whole sea. Now if I may compasse the solution of this riddle and darke question, I shall gaine thereby many townes, villages & cities of his: but in case I cannot affoile the same, I must yeeld unto him all my cities within the country Elephantine. These are therefore to request you, that after you have well considered of the premisses, you sende backe unto me Niloxenus incontinently with the interpretation thereof. And if either your selfe or any of your citizens and country-men have occasion to use me in your affaires and occasions, be sure you shall not faile of me wherein I may stead you. Farewell.

This letter being read, Bias made no long stay, but after some little pause and meditation with himselfe, he rounded Cleobulus in the eare, who sat close unto him: And then, what is that you say (my friend of Nauratia) will your master and lord king Amasis (who commandeth so great a multitude of men, and possesseth so large, so faire and plentifull a countrey) drinke all the sea, for to get thereby, I wot not what poore townes and villages of no importance? Then Niloxenus laughing at the matter: I pray you (quoth he) consider upon the point what is possible to be done, even as you will your selfe: Mary then (quoth he) let him send word vnto the Aethiopian king, and enioine him to stay the course of all rivers that discharge themselves into the sea, untill he have drunke up in the meane time all the water in the sea that is now at this present; for of that onely, his demand and commandement is to be understood, and not of the sea that shall be hereafter. These words were no sooner spoken, but Niloxenus tooke so great a contentment therein, that he could not holde, but needs he must embrace and kisse him immediately for it; yea, and all the rest commended and approved likewise his speech: but Chilo laughing heartily: O my friend (quoth he) of Nauratia, I beseech you before all the sea be drie and cleane spent, faile home with all speed, and do the king your master to understand, that he shal not need to travell and busie his braines in searching how he may consume so great a quantitie of salt water, but rather how he may make his regiment and roiall rule (now brackish and unpleasent) to be sweet and potable unto his subjects; for in these feats Bias is a most cunning workman and a singular master, which when king Amasis hath well and thoroughly learned of him, he shall not have any use of that golden bafen to wash his feet in, and for to containe the Aegyptians in awe and obedience, but they shall serve him all willingly and love him affectionately, when they shall see him become a good prince, although hee were a thousand times more odious unto them than he seemeth now to be. Certes (quoth Periander) then it were worthily done of us all to contribute unto K. Amasis such like first fruits & presents andragas, as Homer speaketh, that is to say, every one of us by the poll, and one after another in order; for by this meanes the accersarie haply and addition will arise to a greater matter, and be more woorth unto him than the principall or stocke for the negotiation wherefore this voiage was undertaken, and besides, there will accrew unto ech of us also some great profit. Meet it were then (quoth Chilo) that Solon should begin the speech; not only for that he is of all our ancient, and hath the highest place of the table, but also because he beareth the greatest and most absolute office, being the man who ordeined and established the lawes of Athens. Niloxenus then turning toward me, and speaking softly in mine eare: I beleeve verily (quoth he) o Diocles, that many things goe for currant and are beleeved, although they be untrue, and many men there be who are delighted with the false rumors and sinister reports that goe of great and wise men, both which themselves do devise, and also which they receive readily from others; as namely those be which are brought unto us as farre as into Aegypt, of Chilon, namely, that he should renounce all amitie and hospitalitie with Solon for maintaining this: That all lawes were mutable. A foolish and ridiculous report is this (quoth I:) for if it were so, Chilon should have fallen out with Lycargus, and condemned him, who together with his lawes, altered and changed the whole State of the Lacedemonians. Then Solon, after a little pause made, began to speake in this wise: For mine owne part, I am of this minde, that a king or soveraigne prince can finde no meanes to make himselfe more glorious, than by turning his monarchie or absolute government into a democratic or popular state, in communicating his authority soveraigne indifferently to his subjects. In the second place spake Bias, and said: That a prince could not do better for his owne honour, than to be the first man that submitted himselfe to the positive lawes of his countrey. After him opined Thales: I repute (quoth he) that prince and soveraigne ruler happie, who liveth to olde age, and dieth by a naturall death. Amasis inferred thus much more in the fourth place: If he be onely wife. With that said Cleobulus in his turne: If he repose no confidence in any one about his person. Sixty came Pittachus with his opinion, saying: If a prince could so nurture and schoole his subjects, that they should not feare him, but for his sake. And after him, in the last place, delivered Chilo this speech: That a prince ought to amule his minde about no mortall and transitorie things, but meditate onely upon that which was eternall and immortall. Now when every one of these Sages had given out his mor, we requested of Periander, that he also would say somewhat for his part; but he with a countenance nothing mery and cheerefull, but composed to sadnesse and severitie: I will tell you (quoth he) what I thinke of all these sentences thus delivered by these my lords; that they all in a maner be enough to fright a man who is of judgement and understanding, from all soveraigne rule and government. Then Aesop as one who ever loved to be crosse and finding faults: It were meet therefore (quoth he) that everie one of us should deale in this point apart and severally, left in pretending to be counsellors unto princes, and make profession of friendship unto them, we become their accusers. Then Solon laying his hand upon his head, and smiling withall: Thinke you not (quoth he) o Aesop, that he maketh a ruler more reasonable and a tyrant more gracious and inclined to clemencie, who perswadeth him that it is simply better, not to rule, than to rule? And who is he (quoth Aesop againe) that will beleeve you in this, rather than the very god himselfe who delivered unto you this sentence, by way of oracle:

I holde that citie happie alone,

*Where voice is heard of * Sergeant one.*

Why (quoth Solon) Is there any man heareth at Athens now any more voices than of one Sergeant, and one sole magistrate, which is the Law? notwithstanding, the citie hold of a popular State, but you Aesop are so deeply scene in hearing and understanding the voices of crows and gaies, that you heare not wel and perfectly in the meane time your owne speech and language; for you that thinke according to the oracle of Apollo, that citie most happie which heareth the voice but of one, suppose notwithstanding that it is the grace of a feast, when all the guests therein meet, may reason and discourse, yea and of every matter. True it is (quoth Aesop) for you have not yet set downe a law, that household servants should not be allowed wherewith to be drunke; like as you have made one at Athens, forbidding servants to make love or to be anointed drie, that is, without the baine. Solon began to laugh at this reply of his: and Cleodemus the Physician inferred thereupon: In mine opinion (quoth he) it is all one to anoint (as you say) drie, and to talke freely when a man is well whited and drenched with wine, for most delectable and pleasant is both the one and the other. Chilo taking hold of this speech; Why then (quoth he) so much the rather it behooveth to abstaine from it. Aesop rejoined againe; and verily Thales seemed to say, that it is a meanes whereby a man shall verie quickly age and looke old. Hereat Periander began to take up a laughter and said: Now truly Aesop, we are well enough served, and are worthily punished according to our desert, in that we have suffered our selves to be carried away into other discourses and disputations, before wee have heard out all the rest of the contents in King Amasis letters, according as wee purposed in the beginning; and therefore good sir Niloxenus go on with that which followeth in your letters nussive, and make use of these personages heere assembled, whiles they bee all in place together. Now truly (quoth Niloxenus) in my conceit that demand of the Aethiopian, a man may well and properly say to bee nothing else (but if I may use the wordes of Archilochus) a tewed or bruised whip: but King Amasis your host, in proposing of such questions is more gentle and civil; for hee propounded unto him these demands to bee answered: What thing in the whole world is eldest or most ancient? What is the fairest? What the greatest? What most wife? What most common? Over and besides, What most profitable? What is most hurtfull? What most puissant? and What most easie? What (quoth Periander) did the Aethiopian prince answer to these demands, & affoile them all? Will you see (quoth Niloxenus then) what answers he made? and after you have heard his answers, be you judge whether he satisfied them or no? for the king my master hath proceeded therein so sincerely, that he would not for any thing in the world, be justly thought to cavill and carpe like a sycophant at the answers of another, and yet his care and endeavour is, not to faile in reprooving that wherein one hath erred and is deceived: but I will from point to point recite unto you his answers. What is most ancient? Time (quoth he.) What most wife? Truth. What most beautifull? The light. What most common? Death. What most profitable? God. What most hurtfull? The Divell. What most mightie? Fortune.

tune. What most easie? The thing that pleaseth. When these answers were read (O Nicharchus) they all remained silent for a time: and then Thales asked of Niloxenus, whether King Amasis approved these solutions or no: Niloxenus answered, that some of them he allowed; but with others of them he rested not well contented: And yet (quoth Thales againe) there is not one of them all but deserveth great reprehension, for they doe everie one bewray much error and grosse ignorance; and to begin withall; How can it be held and maintained, that Time should be the eldest thing that is, considering that one part thereof is passed already; another present, and a third yet to come? for the future time which is to follow us, can not chooseth but by all reason be esteemed younger than all men, or all things which are present. Againe, to thinke that veritie were wisdom, in my judgement is as much as if a man should say, that the eie and the light is all one. Furthermore, if he reputed the light to be a false thing (as no doubt it is) how happeneth it that he forgot the sunne? Moreover, as touching his answers of God and the devils, they are verie audacious and dangerous. But concerning Fortune, there is no probability or likelihood of truth therein; for if she were so powerfull and puissant (as he saith) how cometh it about that she turneth and changeth so easily as she doth? Neither is death the commonest thing in the world; for common it is not to the living. But because it shall not be thought, that we can skill of naught, but reprooving and correcting others; let us conferre a little our particular opinions and sentences in this behalfe with his: and if Niloxenus thinke so good, I am content to offer my selfe first, to answer unto these demands before said, one after another. Now will I therefore declare unto you (Nicharchus) in order the interrogatories and answers, according as they were propounded and delivered. What is most ancient? God (quoth Thales) for he never had beginning nor nativité. What is greatest? Place; for as the world containeth all things else, so place containeth it. What is fairest? The world. And why? because whatsoever is disposed in lively order, is a part thereof. What is wisest? Time; for it hath found all things already devised, and will finde out all inventions hereafter. What is most common? Hope; for it remaineth still with them who have nothing else. What most profitable? Vertue; in that it maketh all things commodious, according as they be used. What is most hurtfull? Vice; for it marreth all good things besides, wheresoever it is. What is most mightie? Necessitie; for that onely is invincible. What is most easie? That which agreeth to nature; for even pleasures many times we do abandon and forsake. Now when all the companie had approved, and commended highly the answers of Thales: These be questions in deed (quoth Cleodemus unto Niloxenus) meet for kings and princes, both to propose and also to asloile: as for that barbarous king of Aethiopia, who enjoined king Amasis to drinke up the sea, deserveth as short an answer as that was which Pittacus made to king Alxatres, who when he demanded somewhat of the Lesbians by his arrogant and proud letters, had no other answer returned him from Pittacus but this: That he should eate oinions and hot bread, upon which words Periander inferred and said: I assure you Cleodemus, it hath bene the manner in old time among the ancient Greeks, to propose one unto another such questions as these. For we have heard by report, that in times past, the most skilfull and excellent Poets which were in those daies, met at the funerals and obsequies of Amphidamas within the citie of Choleis: Now had this Amphidamas bene a man of great honour in government of the common-weale in his country; who having put the Eretrians to much trouble in those wars which they waged against those of Choleis, in the quarrell of Lilantes, hapned to leese his life at the last in a battell. And for that the curious verses which the said poets provided and brought to be scanned of, were intricate and hard to be judged of by those who were chosen as judges of the doubtfull victorie; and besides the glorie of two renowned concurrents, Homer and Hesiodus held the judges in great perplexitie, and shame to give their sentences as touching two so famous personages, they grew to suchas these questions in the end: and propounded one unto another as Lesches saith after this maner.

Now helpe me Muse for to endire

what things have never benee,

Nor henceforth whiles the world endures

for ever shall be seene?

unto which demand, Hesiodus answered readily and extempore in this wise.

When needs to win the prize, with found

of feet shall runne amaine,

And at the tombe of Jupiter,

their chariots breake in twaine.

For which cause especially it is reported he was so highly admired, that thereby he wonne the tre-feet of gold. And what difference (quoth Cleodemus) is there betwene these questions and the riddles put forth by Eumetis? which haply are no more unseemly for her to devise in sport and mirth, and when she hath (as it were) twisted them, to propose unto daibes like herselfe, than for other women to delight for their pastime, to busie their heads in, and working girdles of tisse, or knitting net-work coifes and cawles; but certainly that men of wisdom and understanding should make any account thereof, were very ridiculous: and a meere mockerie. At which speech of his it seemed that Eumetis was willing enough to have replied, and said somewhat unto him againe, but that maidenly modestie staied her; for her bloud was up, and she blushed as red as skarlet all her face over: But Aslope taking her part as it were to revenge her quarrell: Nay were it not (quoth he) more ridiculous farre, not to bee able to solve such questions? and namely such a riddle as this, which she put forth unto us a little before supper:

A man I saw, with helpe of fire,
who set a peece of brasfe,
Fust to a man, so as it seem'd
to him it sove it was.

Now tell me, can you with all your cunning say what this should be? No iwis (quoth Cleodemus, neither meane I to beate my braines about the knowledge of it: And yet there is no man (quoth he) knoweth this thing better, nor useth it more than you; and if you denie it, I will call to witness your ventoses and cupping boxes. Hereat Cleodemus could not chufe but laugh: for there was not a physician in those daies that used cupping and boxing so much as he, and in regard that he practised it so much, this remedie or devise in physicke was in no small request and reputation. But Anesiphilus the Athenian a familiar friend and zealous follower of Solon, began to speake in this wise unto Periander: Sir, if I might be so bold, I thinke it good, & my desire is, that the speeches and discourses of this good company, may not bee dealt among the rich and noble persons onely who are heere in place, but parted equally and indifferently among them all, and go round like a cup of wine, as the manner is in democratic or state of a citie, governed by the people: this I speake for that we who live in a popular common-wealth, participate in nothing of all that which you have right now delivered as touching soveraigne rule of prince & king: we thinke it reason therefore that you would enter every one of you into a discourse of popular government, & deliver your several opinions upon the point, beginning first againe at Solon. To this motion they all agreed; whereupon Solon thus began to speake: As for you (O Anesiphilus) like as all the other inhabitants of Athens, you have heard heretofore what mine opinion is concerning the government of a weale publike: and yet if it please to heare me now also, I say againe that in my judgement that citie is right well governed, and maintaineth best the popular estate and libertie, wherein those very persons who have not bene wronged and oppressed, do prosecute the law upon an oppressor and wrong doer, yea and seeke to punish him, no lesse than the partie himselfe who hath susteined the injurie & outrage. After him Bias opined thus: That the popular government was best, in which all the inhabitants feared the law as much as a rigorous tyrant. Then Thales followed in this maner: That he reputed such a common-wealth best ordered which had in it neither too wealthie, nor yet over poore citizens. Next to him tooke Anacharsis his turne and delivered his minde in these words: That in his conceit that citie was right well governed wherein all other things being equally determined among the inhabitants, the better condition was measured by vertue, & the worse by vice. In the fifth place Cleobulus affirmed; That the policie of that popular city was simple best, the citizens whereof did more dread dishonor than the law. Then Pittacus in his course gave his opinion thus: That he accounted a State passing well governed in which wicked persons might not beare any authoritie but good men onely. Then Chilo when his turne came pronounced: That policie to exceed all others when as the people gave greatest care unto the lawes, and least hearkened unto oratours. After them all Periander in the last place gave his judgement, saying: That he reckoned that popular estate seemed to be best, which came neereit unto an aristocratic or regiment of a wife and noble Senate.

Now when this disputation was ended, I requested them to proceed farther, and to instruct us as touching oeconomie or an householde, how it ought to be ordered; for that few men were called unto the government of cities and realmes, but every one of us had an house and familie of his owne to be governed: Not so (quoth Aslope, & therewith he laughed) if you reckon

Anacharsis

Anacharsis in the number of us; for no house hath he of his owne, and (forsooth) he glorieth therein, that none he hath, saying: That he maketh his abode in a chariot, as (men say) the sun doth, who is caried round about the world in his chaire, and one while goeth to this quarter, and another while to that quarter of the heaven: And even in this respect (quoth Anacharsis) the sunne onely is free, or at least wife more at libertie, and at his owne dispose, than any other of all the gods, commanding all, and not commanded of any; and therefore he reigneth in deed, and having the reines in his owne hand, conducteth his owne chariot himselfe: but me thinks you never conceived and comprised the grandence and beautie of the sunne, how excellent and admirable his chariot is; for otherwise you would never in bound and by way of merry jest have compared it to ours: furthermore, it seemeth that you take an house to be these cloisters covered with tile, and walled with clay or earth; which is as much to say, that a tortoise is the shell, and not the living creature which is therein: and therefore I nothing wonder that you mocked Solon upon a time, for that he having viewed the palace of king Cresus, richly furnished and sumptuously adorned, deemed not by and by the owner and lord thereof to be stately and happily lodged; but desired first to see and behold the good parts that were within him, rather than the goods which were about him; and herein it seemeth unto mee, that you have forgotten your owne tale of the fox, who being come to contest and debate with the leopard, whether of the twaine were beset with more colours and divers spots, required of the judge betwene them, that he would not regard and consider so much the outward painting of the skin, as the varietie of the spirit and soule within, for that he should finde the same bedight with a world of divers spots; but you looke onely to the workmanship of cutters in stone, and of masons, esteeming that onely to be the house, and not that which is domesticall and within, to wit, children, wife, friends and servitors, unto whom (being wife, sober and of good conditions) the father of the familie, and householder, communicating and imparting that which he hath (say he were within a birds-neest or in an emmets hole) may avouch that he dwelleth in a good and blessed house. Lo what mine answer is to Aesope, as also for my part, what collation and dole I contribute unto Dioetes; now for the rest of you, let every man conferre (as reason is) to it, what he thinketh good; and utter his mind. Then Solon: That house (in mine opinion) is best, the goods where-in, were neither gotten by unjust and indirect means, nor bred any feare, suspicion and doubt for the keeping, ne yet drew repentance for the spending of them. After him Bias opined: That he held the familie best, the master whereof was of himselfe the same man within, as (for feare of the law) abroad. Then Thales: Wherein the master may live at most ease and greatest leisure. And Cleobulus: Wherein there be more persons that love, than feare the master. Next delivered Pittacus his minde, and said: That he tooke that to be the best house, wherein there was no desire of superfluities, nor misse of necessaries. After him came Chilo with his sentence: That an house ought as much as is possible, to resemble a citie or state governed by the absolute commandement of a king; adding moreover, that which Lycurgus answered sometimes unto one who advised him to establish in the citie Sparta the popular government: Beginne (quoth he) first thy selfe to ordeine in thine owne house a popular estate, where every one may be as great a lord and master as another. After this speech also finished, Eumetis and Melissa went forth. Then Periander taking a great cup in his hand, dranke to Chilon, and Chilon likewise in order to Bias. Then Ardalus stood up, & addressing his speech unto Aesope: Wil not you neither (quoth he) let the cup come unto us, seeing that they there fend it round about from hand to hand among them, as if it were the can of Bathycles, and will not impart and let it passe to others? Then (quoth Solon) neither is this cup (so farre as I see) any whit popular, standing as it hath done a long time before Solon onely. Whereat Pittacus calling unto Mnesiphilus by name: What is the reason (quoth he) that Solon drinketh not, but goeth against his owne Poems, wherein himselfe hath written these verses:

The sports of Venus ladie bright,
And Bacchus, now are my delight:

In musicke eke I pleasure take,

For why? these three, mens joys do make.

Then Anacharsis helped him out, and spake in his behalfe, saying: He doth it (Pittacus) for feare of you and that severe and rigorous law of yours, by which you have ordeined, that whosoever by occasion of drunkennesse chanceth to commit a fault, what-ever it be, shall incurre a double penalty, and be fined twice as much as if he had done it whiles he was sober. Then Pittacus: Yet nevertheless (quoth he) you carie your selfe so proudly and disdainfully in mockage of this my stature, stature, that both the last yere nor long since, being at my brother Lybius his house, when you were drunke, you demanded to have the prize thereof & called for the garland & crown. And why not (quoth Anacharsis) considering there was propoed a reward for the victory to him that drunke most and if I were overcharged with wine & drunk with the first, should not I challenge by right the prize & reward of victory? or els tell me what other end is there of drinking lustily, than to be drunke? Pittacus hereat began to laugh; & then Aesope told such a tale as this: The wolfe (quoth he) perceiving upon a time the shepheards to eate a mutton within their cottage, approched unto them and said: Oh what a stirre and outcrie would you have made at us if I had done that which you doe? Heereat Chilon: Aesope (quoth he) hath well revenged himselfe now (whose mouth ere while we stopped that he had not a word to say) seeing at this present as he doth, that others had taken the answer out of Mnesiphilus his mouth, and not given him libertie to speake, being demanded the question why Solon dranke not? and like it was that he should have answered in his behalfe. Then Mnesiphilus rendered this reason and said: That he wist well Solon was of this opinion, that the proper worke of every art and facultie, as well divine as humane, was rather the effect and thing by it wrought, than that whereby it was effected; and the end thereof rather than the meanes tending thereto: for so I suppose that a weaver will say, that his worke is to make a web for a mantle, a coat or such a robe, and not to spoole, winde quil, lay his warpe, shoot oufe, or raise and let fall the weights and stones hanging to the loome: Also that the worke of a smith is to foder iron, or to give the temper of Steele for the edge of an axe head rather than any other thing needfull to such an effect, to wit, the kindling of coles and setting them on fire, or the preparing of any stone-grit serving for the former purpose. Semblably, a carpenter or mason employed in architecture, would much more complaine and finde fault with us, if we should say, that neither a ship nor an house were their worke, but the boaring of holes in timber with an auger or the temping of mortar. In like manner would the mules take exceeding great indignation, and not without good cause, if wee should thinke that their workes were either harpes, lutes, pipes, and such instruments of musicke: and not the reforming and institution of folks maners, the dulcing and appeasing of their passions who delight in song, harmonie, and muscalle accord. And even to we must confesse that the worke of Venus is not carnall companie and medling of two bodies; nor of Bacchus, wine-bibbing and drunkenness, but rather mirth and solace, affectionate love, mutuall amitie, conversation, and familiarity one with another, which are procured unto us thereby: for these be the works indeed which Plato calleth divine and heavenly: and these he saith that he desired and pursued when he grew aged and was well stept in yeeres. For I assure you Venus is the work-mistresse of mutuall concord, solace and benevolence betwene men and women, mingling and melting (as it were) together with the bodies their soules also, by the meanes of pleasure: Bacchus likewise in many who before had no great familiaritie together, nor any knowledge and acquaintance to speake of, by softning and moistning the hardnes of their maners, and that by the meanes of wine (like as fire worketh iron to be gentle and pliable) hath engendred a beginning of commixtion and incorporation one with another. True it is I must needs say, that when such personages are met and assembled together, as Periander hath hither invited, there is no need either of cup or flagon for to bring them acquainted: for the mules setting in mids before them a cup of sobriety, to wit, their conference and speech, wherein there is not onely store of pleasure and delight, but also of erudition, learning, and serious matter, doe excite, drench, enlarge and spread abroad by the meanes of discourse and talke, the amiable joy of such guests, suffering for the most part the wine pot or flagon to stand still above the cup or goblet: a thing that Hesiodus forbade expressly among such as could skill better to carrouse than to discourse. And whereas we read thus in Homer,

For howsoever other Greeks that wear their haire so long, Doe drinke about their measure just allowed them among:
Your cup I see stands ever full,
no gage to you is set,
But hartie draughts you may carrouse,
no man there is to let.

Me thinks I heare and understand heereby that our auncients called this manner of drinking one to another by way of challenge & provocation Δαμνις, according to the tearme that Homer

giveth it, and so every man dranke a certaine measure in order: yea and afterwards (like as Ajax did) each one divided portions of flesh to his next fellow sitting at the boord: Now when Ambrosius had thus said: Cherfus the poet, whom lately Periander had quit of certaine imputations charged upon him, and who was newly returned into his favour at the earnest request of Chilon: I would gladly know (quoth he) whether Jupiter gage the rest of the gods with a certaine measure and hint of drinking, (for that they use to drinke one to another when they dine and sup with him) like as Agamemnon dealt by the princes of the Greeks when they were at his table? Then Cleodemus: It it be true (quoth he) friend Cherfus as you and other poets doe say, that certaine doves flying hardly and with great difficultie over the rocks called Planite, bring unto Jupiter that celestiall meat named Ambrosia; thinke you not likewise that he had much ado to get the heavenly drinke Nectar, and that he had but small store thereof, whereby he could not chuse but make spare and give of it to every one according to measure? Yes verily (quoth Cherfus) and peradventure they had it distributed equally among them: but since we are fallen againe into a fresh discourse of house-keeping, which of you will goe on and finish the rest which remaineth to be said thereof? Then Cleobulus inferred this speech and said: As for wise men indeed, the law (quoth he) hath given them a prescript measure; but as touching fooles, I will tell you a tale which I heard my mother once relate unto a brother of mine: The time was (quoth he) that the moone praised her mother to make her a petticoate fit & proportionable for her body: Why, how is it possible (quoth her mother) that I should knit or weave one to fit well about thee considering that I see thee one while full, another while croissant or in the waime, & 10 pointed with tips of horns, & sometime againe halfe round? Even so (friend Cherfus) a man is not able to set downe a definit & just proportion of substance & goods to maintaine an house unto a foolish or a naughty person; for such a one hath need one while of this thing, and another while of that, according to his divers desires & variable events & occasions, much like to Asop dog, who as he saith, in the winter season shrinking together, & lying round for cold wherewith he is ready to be frozen and sterved, is of mind to build himselfe an house: but in summer when he lies sleeping stretched out at length, he thinkes himselfe to be very great, and supposeth it a needlesse thing to builde an house, and besides no small peece of worke to set up a frame bigge and large enough to receive his bodie. See you not likewise o Cherfus, that these kinde of folke will bee thought nowe but small and little, and restraîne themselves into a 20 narrow compasse, proposing forsooth a streight and laconicall manner of life; but anon all at once they will bee aloft, and if they may not have all that they see, and possesse not onely the estate of private persons, but also of kings and princes, they are undone for ever, and complaine as if they were pined and readie to die for hunger: at which words Cherfus held his peace. But Cleodemus then began and said: Howbeit, we all see (quoth he) that you my masters your selves who are sage and wise, have your goods and possessions unequally dealt among you, if a man would go about to measure and count them. True indeed my good friend (answered Cleobulus againe) and this is because the law (like unto a good weaver or knitter) hath given unto everie one of us that which is fit, suitable, and convenient for us; and even so your you selfe fit, in your direction for diet, nourishment, and purging of your patients by reason, after the pre- 40 scription (as it were) of law, do not set them downe receipts and orders all alike, but such as are agreeable and meete for everie one. upon this speech Ardalus replied, saying: How then? Is there a law that commaundeth Epimenides here our familiar friend and Solon's hoste, to forbear all other viands, and by taking onely in his mouth a little of the composition called Almon, which hath vertue to put-by hunger (which pleasant electuarie or confection he maketh himselfe) to continue a whole day without meate and drinke, without dinner and supper. This speech mooved attention and silence in the whole companie there in place: onely Thales after a jocund and merrie manner answered: That Epimenides did well and wisely not to busie and trouble himselfe about grinding corne, baking meale, or dressing his owne meates (as Pittacus did): for my selfe (quoth he) whiles I was in the Isle Lesbos, heard a wench of a forein country, 50 as she turned the querne about, sing thus, Grind mil, Grind; for even Pittacus the king of Great Mitylene, is a miller and grindeth. But Solon said; I woonder much Ardalus, that you never read in Hesiodus his Poeme, the receipt of the regiment of that mans diet: for he was the first who gave unto Epimenides the seeds of this nourishment, and taught him to learch:

In Mallowes and in Asphodels, which grow on everie ground;
What use and profit manifold,

for

for man here may be found.

Why? thinke you (quoth Periander) that Hesiodus had any such meaning in that verse; and not rather (as he is alwaies a great praiser of sparing and frugallitie) that he exhorted us unto the simplest viands, as to those which were most pleasant: for surely the Mallow is good to eate, and the Asphodell stem verie sweete in taste: as for those which the Physicians came Alima and Asphel, that is to say, putting-by hunger and thirst; I heare say and understand that they be medicines and not meates, and that among other ingredients that go to their making, they receive honic and a certaine barbarous kinde of cheefe, besides many other seeds which are easie enough to come by: for how else should not (as we read in Hesiodus)

The plough beame hang aloft in smotherie smoke,

The oxen and mule each both to draw in yoke.

if need there were of so great provision? But I marvell much Solon, at your hoste, that having but lately celebrated a solemne feast of Purification among the Delians, he observed not how they themselves brought with great ceremonie into their temple, the enignes and monuments of the ancient and primitive nourishment of mankind: and namely, among other things very common, and which grow of themselves without mans hand, the Mallow and the Asphodell: which two hearbs (it is verie probable and like) that Hesiodus also recommended unto us for their simplicitie & profit. Not in those regards onely (quoth Anacharsis) but for that they both the one as well as the other, are commended as especiall hearbs for the health of man. True 20 (quoth Cleodemus) and great reason you have so to say: for Hesiodus was well scene in Physicke, as may appeare by that which he hath written so exactly and skillfully of diet, and the regiment of our feeding, of the manner of tempering wine, of the vertue and goodnesse of water, the use of baines, bathes and women, of the time of keeping companie with them, and of the posture of infants in the wombe, and when they should be borne. But to judge aright, Asop had more reason than Epimenides to avow himselfe the disciple of Hesiodus, for the talke which the haike had with the nightingall, gave unto Asop the first beginning of his faire, variable, and many tongued learning of his. But willing I am to heare Solon; for verie like it is, that he having lived and conversed so familiarly many yeeres together with Epimenides at Athens, asked of him oftentimes and knew full well upon what accident or occasion, and for what purpose he chose 30 and followed this strait course of life. And what need was there (quoth Solon) to demaund that of him? for all the world knoweth, and most evident it is, that as the greatest and most soveraigne good of man, is to have no need at all of nouriture; so the next unto it is to require the least nourishment that is: Not so (quoth Cleodemus) if I may be so bold as to speake my mind: For I do not thinke that the soveraigne good of man is to eate nothing, especially when the table is laide and furnished with meate; for to take away the viands set thereupon, is as much as to subvert the altar and sacrifice unto the gods, and to overthrow the amity and hospitalitie among men. And like as Thales saith: That if the earth were taken out of the world, there mult of necessitie ensue a generall confusion of all things; even so we may say, put downe the boord, you doe as much as rinate the whole house; for with it you abolish fire which keepeth the house; the 40 tutel-deitie of Pesta; the amiable custome of drinking together out of one boll and cup; the laudable manner of feasting friends; the kind fashion of entertaining strangers, and all reciprocal hospitalitie, and mutuall usage of guests; which be the principall and most courteous conversations that can bee devised among men one with another: and to speake in summe more truly; farewell then, all the sweetnes of humane life and societie, in case there be allowed any retreat at all, solace and passion apart from businesse and affaires, whereof the need of sustenance and the preparation thereto belonging, yeeldeth most matter, and affoordeth the greatest part. Moreover, the mischief hereof would reach as far as to agriculture, and that were great pity, considering that if husbandrie were laid downe with the decay & ruine thereof, there would ensue againe a rude & deformed face of the whole earth, as being neglected, & not clesned from fruit- 50 lesse trees, bushes & weeds, and overflowed with the inundation of waters & rivers running out of their chanelles to and fro without order, for want of good husbandrie and the diligent hand of man: over and besides, perish there shall with it, all arts and handicrafts which the table main- teineth and keepeth in traine, giving unto them their foundation & matter, in such sort as they will come all to nothing, if you take it away: may more than that; What will become of religion and worship done to the gods? for surely, men will exhibit but little or none honour at all unto the Sunne, and much lesse unto the Moone, as having nought els from them but their light & heat onely: and who will ever cause an altar to be reared and furnished as it ought to be, to Ju- piter, piter,

pter, for sending downe seasonable raine, or to Ceres the patronesse of agriculture, or to Neptune the protectour of trees and plants? who will ever-after offer any sacrifices unto them? how shall Bacchus be the authour of joy and mirth, if we have no more any need of that pleasant liquor of wine which he giveth? what shall we sacrifice? what shall we powre upon the altars? what oblations shall we offer unto the gods? and whereof shall we present any first fruits? In one word, this abuse would bring with it a totall subversion and generall confusion of the best and chiefe things. True it is, that to follow all kinde of pleasures, and in every manner were brutishnesse; and even so to flie them all, and in no wise to embrace them, were no lesse follie and foolishnesse. The soule may well enough enjoy other pleasures and delights, which are better and more noble; but the bodie can finde none at all more harmlesse and honest, to content it selfe with, than to eat and drinke, whereby it is fed and nourished; a thing that there is no man but he both knoweth and acknowledgeth; in regard whereof, men use to set and spread their tables in publicke and open places, for to eat and drinke together in the broad day-light; whereas to take the pleasure of Venus, they wait for the night, and seeke all the darknesse they can, supposing it to be as beastly and shamelesse to do the one in publicke and common, as not at all to doe the other but forbeare it altogether. When Cleodemus herewith brake off, and ended his speech, I followed in the same traine, and seconded his words in this wise: But you overpasse one thing besides, namely, that by this meanes, together with our food and nourishment, we banish and drive away all sleepe: now if there be no sleepe, there will be no dreames, & so by consequence, we may bid farewell to a most ancient kinde of oracle and divination which we have by them. Over and besides, our life will be alwaies after one fashion, and to no purpose, but in vaine shall the soule be clad (as a man would say) within the bodie, seeing that the greatest number and the principall parts of the said bodie were made and framed by nature for to serve as instruments of nourishment; as for example, the tongue, the teeth, the stomacke and the liver, &c. for there is nothing in the whole structure and composition of mans body, that either lieth still & idle, or is ordeined for any other use; in somuch as whosoever hath no need of food, needeth not the body also; which is as much to say, as that hee standeth in no need of himselfe; for every one of us doth consist aswell of bodie as soule. Thus much may serve for my part, to have spoken in the defence of the bellie; now if Solon or any other have ought to say and object against it, by way of accusation, ready we are and disposed to give him the hearing. Yes mary (quoth Solon) unlesse we would be reputed of lesse judgement and understanding than the Aegyptians, who ripping open the belly of a dead bodie, shew it unto the sunne, and cast away the guts and entrails together with the paunch, into a running river; but afterwards, when they have thus rid away the garbage, and cleansed the corps, the rest they imbalme and be carefull of: for to say a trueth, these inward parts, be the very pollution and iniquation of the flesh, and to speake properly, the very hell of our bodie; for so they say, that the place of the damned is full of (I wot not what) horrible rivers and winds confused together with fire and dead carcasses. For no creature living, is nourished with any food that liveth; but we (in killing those creatures which we foules, or in destroying plants, herbs and fruits which participate likewise of life, inasmuch as we see them to be nourished and grow) do evill, and sinne very grievously, forasmuch as whatsoever is transmuted and turned into another, loseth that nature which it had before, and wholly is corrupted, for to become nourishment to another. As for abstinence from eating of flesh, as (by report) Orpheus did in olde time, is rather a subtil shift of Sophistrie, than any perfect thinning or forbearing of those finnes which are committed in delicious fare and superfluous gormandize; but the onely way to avoid enormitie in this behalfe, and the meanes to keepe a mans selfe perfectly pure and undefiled, according to the absolute rule of justice, is to be content with that which is within himselfe, and to live without desire of any thing without, whatsoever: but he that is by God framed to that nature and condition, that without the damage and hurt of another, he can not possibly preserve his owne being and safetie; unto him he hath given a nature which will continually move him to injustice, & to commit wrong. Were it not then (my good friend Dioctes) very meet and requisite to cut off together with injustice and sinfulness, the belly, stomacke and liver, yea, and all other such parts which give unto us the appetite of nothing in the world that is honest, but resemble partly the instruments of a cooke, and vessels of the kitchen, to wit, chopping-knives, cawdrons, pots and kettles, and in part are like unto the utensils of a mill, of a chimney, oven or furnace, or such tooles as serve either to digge pits, or be used in bake-house and pastrie? for to say a trueth, you may plainly see and perceive that the soule in many men lieth hidden within the bodie, as it were in a certaine mill-house, turning continually tinually (as one would say) about a querne, in pursue after the necessities thereof, even as we here-while perceived by experience in our owne selves, when we neither saw nor heard, nor regarded one another; but every one of us inclining forward and stooping downe to our victuals served our owne need & looked to our food, but now when the tables be taken up, as you see, having chapters of flowers on our heads, we take delight in devising together, & holding honest discourses, we rejoyce in fellowship & good company, we passe the time away in ease & repose, being once come to that point, that we have no more any desire or need of nourishment: If then we could hold us so still, & continue while we live in this present state, so that we neither feared want & poverty, nor yet knew what was covertnesses & desire of riches, should we not lead (thinke you) a blessed and easie life, as having leisure to converse together and joy in our mutual societie? For know wel this, that looking after the needles superfluities immediately ensteth upon the appetite and desire of things necessarie. But whereas Cleobulus is of this opinion, that needs there must be meat & food, to the end that their might be tables and standing cups upon them, that men may drinke one to another, also that they might sacrifice to Jane Ceres & her daughter Proserpina; another man may as well and truly say: There ought to be waives and battels, to the end that we may have wals and fortifications for our cities, arsenals for our navy, and armories also, that for the killing of an hundred enemies, were might in thanksgiving to the gods offer sacrifices thereupon, called Hecatombonia, according as they say, there is a statute importing so much among the Messians. Or all one it were as if some other should be angry or offended with health, saying: It were great pitee, if because there are none sicke, any more there should be no use of easie beds, fine linnen sheets, soft pillows and coverings, nor any need to sacrifice unto Asculapius or other gods, to divert and tume away our maladies; and so the art of physick, with all the tooles, instruments, drugs and medicines belonging thereto, be cast aside and neglected, without honor and regard. For what ods is there betweene the one and the other, considering that we receive food as a medicine to cure our hunger? Besides, all they that keepe a certaine diet, are said to cure themselves, using this remedie, not as a pleasure delightful and desirable, but as meanes to content and satisfie nature. For surely we may reckon more paines than pleasures, that come unto a man by his feeding; or to speake more truly, the pleasure of eating hath but a little place, and continueth as small a while in mans bodie; but the trouble and difficultie which it hath in providing and preparing, with how many shamefull inconveniences and painefull travells it pestereth us, what should I relate unto you? for I suppose, that in regard of all these vexations, Homer took upon him to prove, that the gods died not, by this argument, that they received no food:

For neither care they bread in heaven,
nor pleasant wine to drinke:
Thus bloodlesse since they be, we them
immortal name and thinke.

As if by these verses he would give us to understand, that our eating and drinking is not onely the meanes of our life, but also the cause of our death: for thereupon a number of diseases take hold of our bodies, which are gathered within the same, and proceed no lesse from fulnesse than emptinesse, and many times we have more adoe to concoct, consume, and dissipate our foode, than we had to get and provide it. And much like as if the daughters of Danaus were in doubt what to do, and what life to lead, or how to be employed, after they were delivered and freed once from their servile taske imposed upon them, for to fill their tunne boared full of holes; even so doubt we (in case we were come to this passe, as to cease from stuffing and cramming this unsatiable flesh of ours, which will never say Ho, with all sorts of viands that land or sea may afford) what we should do? and al because for want of experience & knowledge what things be good & honest, we love all our life time to seeke for to be provided of necessaries: and like as they who have bene slaves a long time, after they come once to be delivered from servitude, do of themselves and for themselves the verie same services, which they were wont to performe for their masters, when they were bound; even so, the soule taketh now great paines and travel to feed the bodie, but if once she might be dispatched and discharged from this yoke of bondage, no sooner shall she finde her selfe free and at libertie, but she will nourish and regard herselfe, she will have an eie then, to the knowledge of the truth, and nothing shall plucke her away, or divert and withdraw her from it. Thus much of Nisibarchus as touching those points which were then delivered concerning nourishment. But before that Solon had fully finished his speech, Gorgias the brother of Periander cutted into the place, being newly returned from Tanarus, whither he had bene sent before by occasion of (I wot not what) oracles, for to carrie thither certaine oblations unto Neptune, and to doe sacrifice unto him; we all saluted him and welcomed him home; but Periander his brother coming toward and kissed him, causing him afterwards to sit downe by himselfe upon the bed-side, where hee made relation unto him alone of certaine newes. Periander gave good care unto his brother, and shewed by his countenance that he was diversly affected, and verie passionate upon that which he heard him to report; and by his visage it seemed one while that he sorrowed and grieved, another while that he was angry and offended; he made semblant for a time, as if he distrusted and would not give credit unto him, and anon againe he seemed as much to wonder and stand in admiration; in the end he laughed and said unto us: Verie gladly would I out of hand recount unto you the tidings which my brother hath told me, but hardly dare I neither will I be over hastie so to doe, for feare of Thales, whom I have heard otherwise to say: That well we might make report of newes that be probable and like to be true; but touching things impossible, we ought altogether for to hold our peace. Hereupon Bias: But as wise a saying (quoth he) was this of Thales: That as we ought not to believe our enemies in things that be credible, so we are not to discredit our friends even in those things that are incredible. For mine owne part, I thinke verily by this speech of his, that hee tooke thole for his enemies who were leawd and foolish, and reputed for friends such as were good and wise. I would advise you therefore (o Gorgias) that either you would declare your newes here before all this companie, or rather reduce that narration which you come withall to pronounce aloud unto us, into those new kinde of verses which are called Dithyrambes. Then Gorgias set tale on end and began to speake in this manner: After we had sacrificed for the space of three daies together, and the last day performed in a generall assembly all the night a festiual solemnitie with plaies and dances along the strand by the sea side, as the moone shone at full upon the sea, without any winde in the world stirring at all, so as there was a gentle generall calme, and every thing still and quiet; behold we might discover a farre off a certaine moition or trouble in the sea, bending toward a promontorie or cape, and as it approached neerer thereto, raised withall a little scumme, and that with a great noise by reason of the agitation of the water and waves that it made in such sort, as that all the companie of us wondered what it might be, and ran toward the place whereunto it seemed to make way and bend the course for to arrive; but before that we could by any conjecture gesse what it was, (the swiftnesse thereof was such) we might evidently descric with our eie a number of dolphins, some swimming round about it thicke together, others directing the whole troupe toward the easiest and gentlest landing place of the banke, and some there were againe that followed behinde as it were in the rereward: now in the mids of all this troupe there appeared above the water I wot not what lumpie or masse of a bodie floating aloft, which we could neither discern nor devise what it was, untill such time as the said dolphins all close together and shooting themselves into the shore, landed upon the banke a man both alive and also moving; which done they returned toward the rocks or promontorie aforesaid, leaping and dauncing wantonly as it should seeme for verie joy more than they did before: which the greatest part of our company (quoth Gorgias) seeing, were so greatly afraid, that they fled from the sea amaine all amazed; my selfe with some few others tooke better heart and approached nere, where we found that it was Arion the harper, who of himselfe tolde to us his name, and easie he was otherwise to be knowne, for that he had the same apparell which he was wont to weare when he plaied in publike place upon his harpe: So we tooke him up incontinently and brought him into a tent (for harme he had none in the world, save only that by reason of the swiftnesse & violent force of his carriage he was wearie and seemed ready to faint) where we heard from his mouth a strange tale, and to all men incredible, unlesse it were to us who saw the end and issue thereof. For this Arion reported unto us, that having bene of long time resolved to returne out of Italy and so much the rather because Periander had written unto him for to make haste & come away upon the first opportunity presented to him of a Corinthian carrie that made saile fro thence, he presently embarked, but no sooner were they come into the broad and open sea, and that with a gentle gale of winde, but he perceived that the mariners conspired together for to take away his life, whereof the pilot himselfe allo of the same ship gave him advertisement secretly, namely, that they intended to put the thing in execution that night. Arion thus finding himselfe destitute of all succour, and not knowing what to doe; it came into his minde as it were by a certaine heavenly and divine inspiration (whiles hee had yet some time to live) for to adorne his bodie with those ornaments which he accustomed to put on when he was to play upon his harpe for a prize in some frequent Theater; to the end that the same habit might serve him for his funerall weed now at his death; and withall to sing a dolefull song and lamentable dittie before his departure out of this life, and not to shew himselfe in this case lesse generous than the swans: being therefore thus armed and decked accordingly, and doing the mariners to wit before hand, that he had a wonderful desire to chaunte a sonet or hymne unto Apollo Pythius, for the safetie of himselfe, the ship and all those fellow passengers who were within it, he stood upright on his feet in the poope close to the ship side, and after he had founded a certaine invocation or prayer to the sea-gods, he chanted the canticle before said, and as he was in the mids of his song, the sunne went downe and seemed to settle within the sea, and with that they began to discover Peloponnesus. Then the mariners who could no longer stay nor tarry for the darke night, came toward for to kill him; when he saw their naked swords drawn, and beheld the fore said Pilot how he covered his face, because he would not see so vilanous a spectacle, he cast himselfe over ship-board, and leapt as farre into the sea from the ship as he could; but before that his whole bodie was under the water, the dolphins made haste, and from beneath were readie to beare him up for sinking. Full of feare and perturbation of spirit hee was at first, inso much as being astonied therat, hee wist not what it might be; but within a while after, perceiving that he was carried at ease, and seeing a great floc of dolphins environing gently round about him; and that they succeeded and conceded one another by turnes, for to take the charge of carrying him, as if it had bene a service imposed upon them all, and whereunto they were necessarily obliged; and seeing besides that the carrie was a good way behind (by which he gathered that he went apace, and was carried away with great celerity:) He was not (quoth Gorgias) so feareful of death, or desirous otherwise to live, as hee had an ambitious desire to arrive once at the haven of safetie, to the end that the world might know that he stood in the grace and favour of the gods, and that hee reposed an assured belief and firme affiance in them, beholding as hee did the skie full of starres, the moone arising pure and cleere with exceeding brightnesse, and the whole sea about him smooth and calmes; but that the course of these dolphins traced out a certaine way and path, so that hee thought thus within himselfe, that the divine justice had not one eie alone, but as many eies as there were starres in the heaven, and that God beheld all about whatsoever was done both by sea and land: Which cogitations and thoughts of mind (quoth he) mightily strengthened and sustained my bodie, which otherwise was readie to faint and yeeld with travell and wearinesse: finally, when the dolphins were come as farre as to the great promontorie of Tenarus, so high and steepe, they were verie warie and careful that they ran not upon it, but turned gently at one side, and swam behind it a long the coast, as if they would have conducted a baile safe and found, to a sure bay and landing place, whereby he perceived evidently that carried he was thus by the guidance of the divine providence. After that Arion (said Gorgias) had made all this discourse unto us, I inquired of him, where he thought that the ship above said intended to arrive. At Corinth (quoth he) without all doubt, but it will be very late first, for it being toward evening when I leapt into the sea, I suppose that I was carried upon the dolphins backs no lesse than a course of five hundred furlongs, and no sooner was I from ship-board, but there ensued presently a great calme at sea. Moreover, Gorgias said: That he having learned the names aswell of the ship-master as the pilot, and withall known what badge or ensigne the ship carried, made out certaine pinnaces, and those manned with souldiours, for to observe what creeks, commodious bays, and landing places there were upon the said coast; but as for Arion, Gorgias conveyed him secretly with him, for feare lest if the mariners should have had any advertisement of his deliverie and safetie, they might flie away and escape: But as God would have it, every thing fell out so, as we might see (quoth Gorgias) the very immediat hand of the divine power; for at one and the same instant that I arrived here, I had intelligence also that the said ship was fallen into the hands of those souldiours whom I set out; and so the mariners and passengers within it were taken all prisoners. Hereupon Periander commanded Gorgias presently to arise to apprehend them, and lay them up fast in close prison, where no person might have access unto them, or certifie them that Arion was alive and safe. Then Aesop: Mocke on now (quoth he) at my gaies and crowes that talke and tell tales, when you see that dolphins also can in this wise play their youthfull parts, and achieve such prowesses. Nay (quoth I then) we are able to report, Aesop, another narration like to this, which hath bene set downe in writing, and received for currant and good these thousand yeeres passed and more, even from the daies of Iso and Athamas. Then Solon taking occasion of speech by these words: Yea, but these matters, o Diocles (quoth he) concerne the gods more neerely, and surpasse our puissance; but as for that which befell to Hejodus, was a meere humane accident and not impertinent unto us, for I suppose you have heard the historie tolde. No I assure you (quoth I :) But worth it is the hearing (quoth Solon againe.) And thus by report it was. A certaine Milesian with whom as it should seeme Hejodus had familiar acquaintance, in so much as they lodged, eat and drunke together ordinarily in the cite of Laeres kept their hosts daughter secretly, and abused her body, so as in the end he was taken with the manner. Now was Hejodus suspected to have bene privie to him of this villannie from the verie beginning; yea and to have kept the doore and assisted him in concealing the same, whereas indeed he was in no fault at all, nor culpable any way; howbeit, by means of false suspicions and sinister surmizes of people, hee incurred much anger and was hardly thought of, neither could he avoide the unjust imputations of the world: for the brethren of the yong damosell lay in ambush for him neere unto a wood about Loeri, set upon and slew him outright together with his servant or page Troilus, who tended upon him. After this murder committed, and their bodies cast into the sea, it chanced that the corps of Troilus being carried forth into the river Daphnus, rested upon a rocke environed and dashed round about with the water, and the same not far from the sea, which rocke thereupon tooke his name, and is so called at this day. But the dead bodie of Hejodus, immediately from the land was received by a float or troupe of Dolphins, and by them carried as farre as to the capes Rhion and Molychia. It fortuned at the verie same time that the citizens of Loeri, held a solemne assembly and celebrated festivall sacrifices, called Rhia, which they performe even at this daie also in the verie same place with great magnificence and state: this corps being espied floating toward them, (you may wel thinke) caused all the company there to marvell not a little, who thereupon ranne all to the shore, and taking knowledge that it was the corps of Hejodus, because it seemed fresh killed, they laid all other butinesse apart & with all speed, sent about and made inquisition of this murder, by reason of the great renoume and name that went of Hejodus: and this they followed with such diligence, that quickly they found out the murderers, whom after they were apprehended, they threw alive headlong presently into the sea, drowned them, and razed their house. Now was the corps of Hejodus entered neere unto the said Nemeum; howbeit, few strangers there be that know of this his sepulcher, for concealed of purpose it is, by reason of the Orchonenians who made search for it (by report) and were desirous by the appointment of certaine oracles to take up his reliques, and burie them in their countrey. If then the Dolphins be so kind and lovingly affected to the dead, much more probable it is, that they be willing and ready to helpe those who are alive, especially if they be drawn and allured by the sound of the pipes, flutes or other harmonie: for who is there of us all that knoweth not how these creatures are delighted in song, following and swimming along those vessels where they heare musike, as taking great pleasure in the songs and musically instruments of those passengers, who do sing or play in a faire and calme season: also they are not a little pleased to see yong children swimming & they joy and strive to be dousing, badling, & diving together with them: and therefore provided it is by an unwritten law, as touching their securitie, that they should not be hurt; by vertue whereof none doe fish for them, nor doe them any harme, unlesse haply when they chance to be taken in any nets, they hinder the taking of other fishes, or otherwise hurt them, and then beaten they are and corrected gently for it, like as little children who have done amisse and made a fault. And here I call to minde what I have heard recounted for certaintie of the inhabitants of Lesbos, that in times past within their countrey, there was a yong maiden saved by a Dolphin, from perill of being drowned in the sea: but for that Pittacus should know this much better, it were more reason that he himselfe reported it. True it is indeed (quoth Pittacus) the tale is verie notorious and related by many. For there was an answer given by oracle to those founders, who first peopled Lesbos; that when in sailing upon the sea they arrived at a rock called Messogean, that is to say, Mediterranean, they should cast into the sea for Neptune a bull, but for dame Amphirrite and the Nymphs Nereides a virgin alive. Now seven principall conductors & kings there were of that company which were to inhabit there, and Echelus made the eight, expressly named by the oracle for the planting of a colony, and he as yet a bachelor & unmarried. Now when the other seven, who had daughters marriageable, & yet unwedded, cast lots among themselves whose daughter should be offered (as is before said) it fell out so, that the lot light upon the daughter of Smithenus; her therefore they arrayed with rich robes, & adorned with costly jewels of gold for that purpose, and being come to the place appointed, after they had made their prayers and oraisons accordingly, as in such a case, and were now at the verie point to throw her into the sea; a certaine yong man, one of the passengers in the ship, of a gentle nature

nature and good disposition (as it appeared) whose name was Enalus, being enamoured of the said yong damosell, entred presently into a resolution to succor her in this extremitie, although hee saw well that it was in manner impossible, and embracing her fast about the middle, he cast himselfe and her together into the sea: and even then there ran a rumor, although without any certaine ground or author; howbeit beleived by many of the armie, that both of them were carried to land and saved alive: but afterwards (by report) the said Enalus was seen in the isle Lesbos, who made relation, that he and shee both were mounted upon dolphins backs, and so carried safe to the firme land without any danger. I could rehearse other strange narrations belonging hereto, more marvellous than these, able as well to ravish with admiration, as to affect with delectation the minds of any that shall heare them; but hard it is to averre them all for true, and to bring prooffe thereof, namely: That when there arose a mightie huge billow of water about the island like a rocke, so as no men durst approach nere unto the sea, Enalus only came thither and a number of Polype fishes, or poulpes followed after, and accompanied him to the temple of Neptune, where the biggest of them brought unto Enalus, a stone which he tooke and dedicated there in memoriall of this miracle; which stone we call Eti to this day. But in summe (quoth he) if a man knew well the difference betwene impossible and unusuall, and could distinguish betwene that which is contrarie to the order or course of nature, and the common opinion of men, in not beleiving too rashly, nor discrediting a thing too easily, he might observe wel from time to time your rule Chilon, [Nothing overmuch] which you ordeine to be kept. After him spake Anacharsis, saying: That is not to be wondered at, that the goodliest and greatest matters in the world were done by the will and providence of God, considering that according to the good and wise opinion of Thales, there is in all the chiefe and principall parts thereof a certaine soule: for as the organ and instrument of the soule is the body; so the instrument of God is the soule: and like as the body hath many motions of the owne, but the greater part of them, and namely those which are most noble, proceed from the soule; even so the soule likewise doth worke some of her operations by her owne instinct, but in others she yeeldeth herselfe to be ordered, turned, managed and directed by God, as it pleaseth him to use her, being indeed of all instruments the most meet and handfome: for it were a very strange and absurd thing, that wind, water, clouds & raine, should be Gods instruments, by means whereof he nourisheth and maintaineth many creatures, and whereby he destroyeth and overthroweth as many; and that he should use the ministerie of no living creatures in any worke of his: Reason it is yet and probable, that seeing such creatures depend wholly upon the puissance and omnipotencie of God, that they should serve al his motions, yea and obey his wils and second his purposes, more than bowes are accomodate to the Scythians, and harpes or hautboies to the Greeces. After this speech the poet Cherfias made mention of many others who had bene miraculously and beyond all hope & expectation saved from death, and among the rest he gave instance of Cypselus the father of Periander, whom being but a yong babe and infant new borne, certeine bloudie murderers were sent to kill, and upon the sight of him, for verie pittie turned away and forbore to commit so bloody a fact; but afterwards bethinking themselves, and repenting such foolish compassion, they returned backe againe to seeke him out but could not finde him, for that his mother had hidden him within a little corne flasket or twiggen hamper, called in Greeke Cypselus: in remembrance whereof Cypselus afterwards when he was a man dedicated a chappell within the temple of Apollo in Delphos, as beleieving how at that time hee had bene miraculously preserved, and by the hand of God kept from crying, which might have bewraied him to the murderers. Then Pittacus addressing his speech to Periander said thus: Cherfias hath done me a great pleasure to mention this chappell or cell; for many a time desirous I was to know of you what should be the meaning of those frogs which are seene graven round about the foot of the palme tree therein; and what they did concerne either the said God Apollo, or the man himselfe who built and dedicated the said house. And when Periander willed him to aske Cherfias that question, who wist well enough what it was, for that he was with Cypselus at the dedication thereof; Cherfias smiled and said: I will not expound the mysterie thereof, unlesse I may know first of them that be heere, what is meant by these olde said sawes; Nothing too much. Know thy selfe: and that other mot, (which hath caused some to continue single and unmarried, others to forbeare surety-ship, and many to be distrustfull, to be mute and silent) to wit, Give thy word and pay: Be surety, and be sure of a shrewd turne. And what need is there quoth Pittacus that we should interpret and declare these sentences, considering you so greatly praise the fables that Aesope hath composed, which shew the substance of every one? Aesope answered: So faith

Cherfias

Cherſias indeed when he is diſpoſed to jeſt and be merry with me: but when he ſpeaketh in good earneſt, he affirmeth that Homer was the firſt author of theſe ſentences, ſaying that Homer knew himſelfe well enough, who advancing forward to ſet upon other captaines of the Greeks,

*Reſuſed well and wiſely for to fight,
With Ajax, ſonne of Telamon that knight.*

He ſaith moreover, that Ulyſſes approved and commended this ſentence, No thing too much; when he admoniſhed Diomedes in theſe tearmes:

*Sir Diomedes, praſe me not overmuch
Ne yet diſpraſe I love no doings ſuch.*

And as for ſurety-ſhip, others are of opinion that he condemneth it as a leawd, naughty, and ſo dangerous thing in theſe words

*Who ſureties are for men diſtreſt and in calamity,
T' aſte oftentimes for their kind heart much inſortunity.*

But this Poet Cherſias here ſaith: That the fiend Aze, which is as much to ſay as Plague or Infortunitie, was by Jupiter ſlung downe from heaven to earth, for that ſhe was preſent at the caution or warrantive which he interpoſed as touching the nativitie of Hercules, whereby Jupiter was circumvented and overtaken. Then Solon: Seeing it is ſo (quoth he) I am of this minde, that we ſhould give care and credit to the moſt wiſe Poet Homer, whoſe counſell this is:

*Since that the night comes on apace,
and hath ſurprized us,
Full meet it is her to obey,
and end our ſpeeches thus.*

After we have therefore given thanks in powring out wine and offering it to the Muſes, Neptunus and Amphitrite, let us (if you thinke ſo good) end this our aſſembly and banquet. Thus Nicarchus this our merry meeting brake up, and was for that time diſſolved.

INSTRVCTIONS FOR THEM THAT MANAGE AFFAIRES OF STATE.

The Summarie.

Tranſſie in any publique government, be it of prince, ſeignourie or people, as it is dangerous and deſeſtable; ſo we are no leſſe to feare anarchie, and the horrible conſuſion of thoſe States where every one is a lord & maſter. The wiſe man ſaid very well: That a people or citie deſtitute of government, is neere to ruine; and publique affaires proſper well, when there be ſtore of good counſellers. And on the other ſide, experience ſheweth, that humane ſocietie can not ſtand without magiſtrates, the maine ſteers of lawes & good order, which be the nerves or ſinewes, the cords and props of our life and converſation one with another. But if there be any way in the world ſlipperie, it is that of the management of State affaires, by reaſon of the leawdneſſe of ſome, whom I may call Sage ſofoles, who runne by heaps after publique offices, not ſuffering men of honour to enter into them, as fearing to be afterwards ranged and ordered by reaſon. Since then this ambition is a mortall plague in the mind and underſtanding of him who would advance himſelfe by crooked and indirect meanes, it behooveth on the contrary ſide, that thoſe who have a ſincere affection to ſerve in publique place, take heed that they be not diſcouraged, although otherwiles they be kept under and put downe by ſuch perſons as by good right ought to ſerve, and not command. To holde therefore ſome meane in this caſe, betwene mounting up unto vain-glory, and ſitting into covariſe, Plutarch for to content and ſatiate a friend of his, giveth good inſtructions to every man that enreth into the managing of State affaires: and in the firſt place he requirerh at his hands a good will, free from vanitie and lightneſſe, void of avarice, and deliver'd from ambition and envie: after wards, his advice is, that he endeavour to know thoſe well, whom he muſt governe, for to acquit him well in his owne dutie in caſe he be induc't unto any high degree in reforming himſelfe and bring furniſhed with a good confidence, knowledge & eloquence, proper inſtruments for to go thorow all diſculties. This done, he teacheth a States-man to manage well his owne words, alſo what way he ought to take for the entrance into the conduct of his weightie affaires; what friends he is to choſe, and how he is to demean himſelfe aſwell with them as his enemies: afterwards, he diſcuſſeth and handleth this queſtion, to wit, Whether ſuch a perſon as he whom he hath repreſented, ought to intermeddle and deale in all offices, and reſolveth that he ought to manage none but that which is of greateſt importance. From this he proceedeth to ſpeake of that diſcretion which is requiſit for the ranging and bringing into order of ſtandards and enemies; and withall, with what manner of affaires a politician ſhould buſie and employ himſelfe, and whereto his ſpirit and minde is to tend; wiſhing above all, that he ſhould emertime the amitie of other lords and rulers, who are able to further and advance the publique good; and in the meane time to be well adviſed that he doe not goe about to ſave, or ruinate rather, his owne country by ſoverne meanes. Hereupon he diſcoureth of thoſe maladiſes wherunto common-wealths be ſubject, and holdeth this: That if there doe ariſe any miſchiefe, it ought to be repreſſed, kept downe and cured at home. Conſequently, he ſheweth unto a magiſtrate the manner of converſing with his colleagues or companions in office: and after he had commended thoſe who walke ſingly & ſoberly and plainly to worke, hee entretch very prettily into a diſcourſe ariſing from the precedents, namely, a touching policie and good government, declaring whereto it doth conſiſt: and ſo toucheth in a word, the dutie of good ſubjects in a ſtate well ruled. Which done, he returneth to his former purpoſe, and maketh mention of certaine caſes whereto a magiſtrate may accommodate and frame himſelfe to his owne people: alſo what perſons he ought to uſe & employ for aſſiſtance in the execution of important affaires, and from what vices he is to keepe himſelfe pure and cleane; how he ought to eſteeme and regard true honour, ſtanding upon two points: the one, that he do truſt and relye upon himſelfe: the other, that he be well beloved of the people, unto whom he ought to ſhew himſelfe liberall. To this above ſaid, there is joined a certaine diſcretion to be uſed in the largeſſe of magiſtrates to their ſubjects (a thing much practiſed in old time, and in theſe daies turned cleane againſt the haire) propoſing all in one traine, the true and moſt expedite way how to gaine the hearts of men, to which no prince nor governour ſhall ever attaine unleſſe he be ſuch an one as our author doth deſcribe: and repreſenting on the other ſide, the ridiculous and unhappie condition of ambitious perſons, and other ſuch as thiſt after ſhamefull glorie, whoſe name ſerveth for nought els but to play with the leaſt peties in a common-wealth. And for a ſmall concluſion, he treateth of ſeditious and civil warres; namely, how a good magiſtrate ought to carry himſelfe therein; what a care he ſhould have to quench with all ſpeed ſuch fire, and keepe his ſubjects in good unitie and concord, and how he ſhould eaſily come thereto, which is the very cloſing up of the booke, enriched with notable arguments, ſentences, ſimilitudes and examples, for thoſe eſpecially, who have the command of others, and yet are beſides, to appeare before the throne of their ſovereigne, 40 the examination, trial and ſearefull judgement of whom, they can not avoid.

INSTRVCTIONS FOR THEM that manage affaires of State.

Let there be any ſpeech in the world, ſir Menemachus, unto which a man may properly apply theſe verſes of the Poet Homer:

*Of all the Greekes there is no man,
Who blame theſe words or gaineſay can;
But yet for ſooth you ſay not all,
Nor come are ſo to the ſinall.*

certainly, it is in the caſe of thoſe Philoſophers, who exhort ſufficiently in generall tearmes, to undertake the affaires of State and publique government: but they teach us not how, nor give us precepts and directions thereto; who (me thinks) may wel be reſembled to thoſe, who ſnuffe and draw out the wicke of a lampe, but they powre no oyle into it. Seeing then that you

you have upon verie good reason deliberated and resolved to meddle in the State affaires of your country, and desire according to the nobilitie of your house and native country, from whence you are defended;

*To frame your speech with seemly grace,
And deeds performe, meetes for your place.*

and considering that you are not yet come to that maturitie of yeeres, as to have scene evidently the life of a wise man and true Philosopher in matters of government, or viewed his carriage and demeanour in State affaires; ne yet to bee a spectator of worthie and goodly examples practised in deed and effect, and not discoursed upon in word onely; in which regards you have requested me earnestly to give unto you certaine rules, precepts, and advertisements for your better knowledge & instruction, how you ought to behave your selfe in this behalfe; me thought I could not with any honestie deny your request: but my desire & wish rather is, that whatsoever I have collected to this purpose, may be answerable both to the ardent zeale of your intention, and also to the willing forwardnes of mine affection; and verily to gratifie your minde, I have accompanied these precepts with many faire and beautifull examples.

First and formost therefore, let this be laid for a sure ground & strong foundation, That whoe soever mindeth to be a States man, and to manage affaires of policie, bring with him a good intent, mooved by reason and judgement, and in no wise arising upon any blind passion, or desire of vaine-glorie, or jealousie and emulation of another, or finally upon default of other occupations: for like as there be some who spend most of their time in the common-hall or market place, although they have nothing there to do, because they have no good thing at home to be employed about; even so, you shall have diverse men that thrust themselves into civill and publicke affaires, for that they have no private busines of their owne, worth tending, and so they use policie as a course of life, or rather a pastime and recreation. Others there be againe, who being by some fortune or chance arrived, or rather cast upon the management of common-weale, and having thereof enough & (as it were) their bellies full, can not with any ease withdraw and retire themselves, when they are once in, resembling those for all the world, who being embarked in some vessel take the sea, only for to be rocked & shaken therein a little for their exercise; but after they be carried by a gale of winde into the deepe, when their heads once begin to turne, and their stomacks sicke and readie to cast, they looke out backe toward the land, but for all that, forced they be to tarric still on ship-board, and to frame themselves to their present fortune.

*Their lovely joys and pleasures are then gon,
To walke upon the batches gaily dight,
With rowers seats in foist or gallion,
Whiles sea is calme and weather faire and light:
Which yeelds prospect most pleasant to their sight,
And hearts content, so cut the waves aright.*

And these are they, who as much as any, or rather most of all, discredit the thing, in that they repent and be much discontented with their choise; namely, when in stead of glorie which they promised themselves, they fall into infamie, and whereas they looked to be feared of others by the meanes of their great credit and authoritie, they bee carried into a world of affaires full of troubles and dangers. But he who commeth to the government of weale publicke, and beginneth to enter upon it by sound judgement and true discourse of reason, as a most honest vocation in it selfe, and most agreeable to his estate and qualitie, will no whit be discouraged or dismayed at any of these accidents, nor ever change his resolution. For a man is not to take upon him the managment of State affaires, with intent to negotiate and trafficke there, or to make a gainefull trade and occupation thereof to himselfe, like as in times past at Athens, Stratocles and Demetrias, with those about them, for to go unto their golden harveyst (for so by way of jest and meterie speech they called the Tribunall seat, and publicke pulpit where orations were made unto the people) no nor upon any fit of a sudden passion that commeth upon him, as Cajus Gracchus did so at Rome sometime, who at the verie time when his brothers troubles were hot, and his death fresh and new, retired for a while out of the way, and betooke himselfe to a private course of life, farre remote from the common-wealth affaires; but afterwarde, being suddenly enkindled and inflamed againe with choler, upon certaine outrageous dealings and opprobrious wordes given him by some, would needes in all the haste upon a spleene, rush into the government of State, and quickly had his handes full of businesse, and his ambitious humour was soone fed and satisfied: but then when as he would, with all his heart have withdrawn

when himselfe, changed his life, and taken his repose, he could not by any meanes lay downe his authoritie and puissance (to such greatnes it was growen) but was killed before he could bring that about. As for these who compasse and dresse themselves as plaiers for to act upon the scaffold in some great Theater, and champions to contend with other concurrents, or else aime at fold in vaine-glorie; it can not be, but they must needs repent of that which they have done, especially when they once see that they must serve those whom they thought they were woorthie to rule, or that they can not chuse but displease them, whom they were desirous to gratifie and content. And verily this is my conceit of such, that they runne headlong upon policie and State matters, like unto those who by some misadventure, and sooner than they looked for, be fallen into a pit; for it can not otherwise be, but they be woonderously disquieted, seeing the depth thereof, and with they had never come there, but were out againe, whereas they, who confidently, and upon good deliberation goe downe into the said pit, carrie themselves soberly with quietnes and contentment of spirit, they are vexed, offended and dismayed at nothing, as who at their first entrie, put on a resolute minde, proposing unto themselves vertue and their dutie onely, and intending no other thing for to be the scop: and end of all their actions.

Thus when as men have well grounded their choise in themselves, untill it be so surely settled & confirmed, that unneeth or hardly it can be altered or changed; then they ought to bend all their wits to the consideration and knowledge of the nature, of their citizens and subjects, whose charge they have undertaken, or at leastwise of that disposition, which being compounded (as it were) of them all, appeereth most and carrieth greatest sway among them. For at the verie first and all at once, to goe about a change and to order and to reforme the nature of a whole commonalitie, were an enterprise, neither easie nor safe to be practised: as being a thing that requirith long time and great authoritie and power. But doe they must as wine doth in our bodies; which at the beginning is moistned (as it were) and overcome by the nature of him who drinke it, but afterwards by gentle warning his stomacke, and by little and little entering into his veines, it becommeth of strength to affect the drinker, and make a change and alteration in him; semblably, a wise politician and governor, untill such time as he hath wonne by the confidence reposed in him, and the good reputation that he hath gotten, so much authority among the people, that he is not able to rule and lead them at his pleasure, will accommodate and apply himselfe to their manners and fashions such as he findeth them, and thereby conjecture and consider their humors, untill he know wherein they take pleasure, whereto they are inclined, and what it is, wherewith they will soonest be lead and carried away. As for example, the Athenians as they are given to be hastic and cholericke; so they be as soone turned to pitie and mercy; more willing to entertaine a suspition quickly, than to have patience and at leaseure to be informed, and take certaine knowledge of a thing; and as they be more enclined and readie to succour base persons and of low condition; so they love, embrace and esteeme merrie words and pleasant conceits, delivered in game and laughter, more than sage and serious sentences; they are best pleased when they heare themselves praised, and least offended againe with those that flout and mocke them; terrible they are and dread, to their verie rulers and magistrates, and yet courteous and milde enough, even to the pardoning of their professed enemies. The nature of the Carthaginian people is farre otherwise, bitter, fell, fierce, sterne and full of revenge; obsequious to their betters and superiours; churlish and imperious over their inferiours and underlings; in feare most base and cowardly; in anger most cruell; firme and constant in their resolution, and where they have taken a pitch; hard to be mooved with any sports, pastimes, and jolitie; and in one word, rough & untractable. You should not have scene these fellows, if Cleon had requested them sitting in counsell (forasmuch as he had sacrificed unto the gods, and was minded to feast some strangers that were his friends, and come to visit him) to put off their assembly to another day; to arise laughing and clapping their hands for joy; nor, if whiles Alcibiades was a making unto them a solemne oration, a quaille should have escaped from under his gowne and gotten away, would they have runne after her away to catch her, and given her to him againe? nay they would have fallen all upon him; they would have killed them both in the place, as if they had contemned them and made fooles of them: considering that the banished captaine Hanno, because in the campe and armie when he marched, he used a lion as a sumptier horse to carrie some of his baggage; saying, that this favoured strongly of a man that affected tyrannie. Neither do I thinke that the Thebans could ever have contained themselves, but have opened the letters of their enemies, if they had come into their hands: like as the Athenians did, who having surprized king Philips posts and curriers would never suffer one of their letters mislike to be broke open, which had the superscription to Queene Olympias my wife; nor discover the love-secrets and merrie conceits passing from an husband being absent in another countrey, and writing to his wife. Neither doe I thinke, that the Athenians on the other side, would have endured and borne with patience the proude spirit and scornfull contempt of Epaminondas, who would not make answer to an imputation charged against him, before the bodie of the people of Thebes, but arose out of the Theater where the people was assembled, and throw them all went his way, and departed into the place of publike exercises. The Lacedaemonians likewise would never have put up the insolent behaviour and mockerie of Stratocles, who having perswaded the Athenians to sacrifice unto the gods, in token of thanksgiving for a victorie, as if they had beene conquerours, and afterwards upon the certaine newes of a defeat and overthrow received, when he saw the people highly offended and displeased with him, demanded of them what injurie he had done them, if by his meanes they had beene merrie and feasted three daies together?

As for the flatterers that belong to Princes courts, they play by their lords and masters, as those fowlers do, who catch their birds by a pipe counterfeiting their voices; for even so they, to winde and insinuate themselves into the favour of kings and princes, doe resemble them for all the world, and by this devise entrap and deceive them. But for a good governour of a State, it is not meet and convenient that he should imitate the nature and the manners of the people under his government; but to know them and to make use of those meanes to every particular person, by which he knoweth that he may best win and gaine them to him: for the ignorance and want of skill in this behalfe, namely, how to handle men according to their humours, bringeth with it all disorders, and is the cause of irregular enormities, as well in popular governments, as among minnions and favorites of princes. Now after that a ruler hath gotten authority and credit once among the people, then ought he to strive and labour, for to reforme their nature and conditions if they be faultie; then is he by little and little to lead them gently (as it were) by hand unto that which is better: for a most painefull and difficult thing it is to change and alter a multitude all at once: and to bring this about the better, he ought first to begin with himselfe, and to amend the misdemeanours and disorders in his owne life and manners, knowing that he is to live from thence forth (as it were) in open Theater, where he may be scene and viewed on everie side. Now if haply it be an hard matter for a man to free his owne mind from all sorts of vices at once, yet at least wife he is to cut-off, and put away those that bee most apparent and notorious to the eyes of the world. For you have heard (I am sure) how Themistocles when hee minded to enter upon the manning of State-matters, weaned himselfe from such company wherein hee did nothing but drinke, daunce, revell and make good chere; and when he fell to sitting up late and watching at his booke, to fasting and studying hard, hee was wont to say to his familiars, that the Trophee of Alibiades would not suffer him to sleepe and take his rest. Pericles in like case altered his fashions in the whole course and maner of his life, in his person, in his sober and grave going, in his affable and courteous speech, shewing alwaies a staied and settled countenance, holding his hand ever more under his robe, and never putting it forth, and not going abroad to any place in the citie, but onely to the tribunall and pulpit for publike orations, or els to the counsell house. For it is not an easie matter to weld and manage a multitude of people, neither are they to be caught of every one, and taken with their safetie in the catching; but a gracious and gainfull piece of worke it were, if a man may bring it thus much about, that like unto suspicious & craftie wilde beasts, they be not affrighted nor let a madding at that which they heare and see, but gently suffer themselves to be handled, and be apt to receive instruction; and therefore this would not in any wise be neglected, neither are such to have a small regard to their owne life and maners, but they ought to studie and labor as much as possibly they can, that the same be without all touch and reproch: for that they who take in hand the government of publike affaires, are not to give account, nor to answer for that onely which they either say or doe in publike, but they are searched narrowly into, and manie a curious eye there is upon them at their boord; much listning after that which passeth in their beds; great sitting and scanning of their marriages and their behaviour in wedlocke, and in one word all that ever they doe privately, whether it be in jest or in good earnest. For what need we write of Alibiades, who being a man of action and execution, as famous and renowned a captain as any one in his time, and having borne himselfe alwaies invincible and inferiour to none in the managing of the publike State, yet notwithstanding ended his daies wretchedly, by meanes of his dissolute looseness and outrageous demeanour, in his private life and conversation at home, inasmuch as he bereft his owne countrey of the benefit they might have had by his other good parts and commendable qualities, even by his intemperance and sumptuous superfluities in expence? Those of Athens found fault with Cimon, because he had a care to have good wine; and the Romans finding no other thing in Scipio to reprove, blamed him for that hee loved his bed too well: the ill-willers of Pompey the Great, having observed in him that otherwhiles he scratched his head with one finger, reproched him for it. For like as a little freckle, mole or pendant-wert in the face of man or woman is more offensive, than blacke and blew marks, than scars or maimes in all the rest of the bodie; even so, small and light faults otherwise of themselves, shew great in the lives of Princes, and those who have the government of the weale-publike in their hands, and that in regard of an opinion imprinted in the minds of men touching the estate of governours and magistrates, esteeming it a great thing, and that it ought to be pure and cleere from all faults and imperfections. And therefore deserved Julius Drusus, a noble Senatour and great ruler in Rome to be highly praised, in that, when one of his workemen promised him (if he would) to devise and contrive his house so, that whereas his neighbours overlooked him, and saw into many parts thereof, they should have no place therein exposed to their view and discoverie, and that this translating and alteration thereof should cost him but five talents: Nay (quoth he) thou shalt have ten talents, and make mine house so, that it may be scene into on everie side, to the end that all the citie may both see and know how I live; for in truth he was a grave, wise, honest, and comely personage. But peradventure it is not so necessarie that a house lie so open as to be looked into on all sides: for the people have eyes to pierce and enter into the verie bottom of governours manners, of their counsels, actions, and lives, which a man would thinke to be most covert & secret, & no lesse quick-sighted are they in their private carriage, as in that which they see them doe, and heare them speake in publike; loving some with a kinde of admiration, and hating others in disdainfull and contemptuous manner. What? will some one say, do not some cities otherwhiles love to be ruled by governours, whom they know to be dissolute and disordinate in their manner of life? Yes, I believe it verie well. And so forsooth, we see some women when they are with childe, long many times to eate grit of stones, and they who are stomacke-sicke, and have a peevish appetite, desire salt-fish, and such other naughtie meates; but within a while after, when the fit is once past, they reject, refuse and lothe the same; even so many States and Comminalties often-times upon an insolencie, wantonnesse and disordinate desire, or for default of better governours, be served with those that come first, and they care not with whom, notwithstanding they have them in contempt and detestation, but afterwards they are very well content when such speeches goe of them, as Plato a comical Poet in one of his Comedies inferreth to be spoken by the people themselves:

Take me by hand, take holde and that right soone,

Aegyrtius 'I'll captaine chuse anon.

And againe in another place, he bringeth in the people calling for a bason and a feather for to provoke vomit, saying thus:

At my tribunall seat most eminent,

Her selfe to me Mantle doth present.

And a little after,

A stinking head it keepees and feedeth now,

A maladise most foule, I do avow.

And the people of Rome, at what time as Carbo vowed a thing, and bound it by a great oath, yea, and the same with a curse and execration, if it were not so; yet for all that all with one voice sware aloud to the contrary, and protested that they would not beleve him. Also at Lacedaemon, when one Demotheneas a wicked and dissolute person, had delivered his opinion and advice, verie well fitting and behoovefull to the matter in question, the people rejected it; but the Ephori having chosen one of their Ancients and honourable counsellors of Estate, willed him to speake to the same point and the like effect; which was as much as if they had taken it out of one foule and filthie vessel, and put the same into another that was faire and cleane, and all to please and content the people and multitude: so effectually is for the government of an Estate, the assured perswasion of the honestie of a personage, and as forcible likewise is the contrarie. I write not thus to this end, that we should neglect the grace of eloquence and the powerfull skill of well-speaking, as if all should lie upon vertue, and nothing els, but that we are to thinke, that Rhetoricall speech and brave utterance is not the thing alone which perswadeth the people, but that it is a good helpe, and doth cooperate in perswasion, so that we may in some sort correct and amend that sentence of Alexander:

*The honest life of him that speaks in place,
And not his tongue, doth credit win and grace.*

For life and language both ought to concur, unless haply one would say, That it is the pilot onely that governeth the ship, and not the helme; and the rider alone turneth the horse head, and not the reins or bridle; semblably, that the science of policie and government of weale-publicke useth maners and not eloquence, as an helme or bridle, to manage, direct and governe a whole citie, which is (according to Plato) a creature (as one would say) most easie to be turned, so that it be conducted and guided, as it were, in the poepe: for seeing that those great kings, the sonnes of Jupiter (as Homer calleth them) set out and puffed up their magnificent part, with long robes of purple, with scepters in their hands, with a guard of squires and pensioners about their persons, with whom they were environed on everie side, yea, and with the oracles of the gods in their favour, subjecting unto their obeisance (by this outward venerable shew) the common fort, and imprinting an opinion that they are in greater state than men; and yet for all this, were desirous to learne how to speake wisely, and not carelesse and negligent to winne grace by good speech,

*And eloquence, whereby more perfect they
In warlike feares might be another day.*

not recommending themselves to Jupiter onely the Counsellor, nor to bloodie Mars and war-like Minerva, but invoking likewise the Muse Calliope,

*Who doth upon great kings attend,
And makes them as more reverend.*

with her perswasive grace and vertue dulcing and appeasing the violent mood and fiercenesse of the people. Seeing (I say) that mightie princes be furnished with so many helps and means; is it possible that a private person, with a simple robe and popular habit, taking upon him to weld and rule a whole citie or State, should ever be able to effect his purpose, namely, to tame and range into order an unruly multitude, unless he have eloquence to aide him in this businesse, for to perswade and bring them to the bent of his bow? for mine owne part, I thinke No. As for the matters and captaines of gallies and other ships, they have other officers under them, as their boar-swaines, to give knowledge what they would have to be done; but a good governour of State ought to have within himselfe the skill and knowledge of the steeres-man to sit at sterne and guide the helme, and besides that, good speech also to make known his will and pleasure, to the end that he need not at all the voice of another, nor be forced to say as Epicharmus did when he was overcome and braved out by the eloquent words of Aristophan: My adversaries plaier acteth better than mine, but surely my play is much better than theirs: and that he have not need often-times to have in his mouth these verses of Euripides:

*Would God the seed and race of mortall men
Were speechlesse cleane, or could not speake words ten.*

As also of these:

*Oh God, that mens affaires and causes all Required no words, and for no speech did call,
Thas oratours, whose tongues do plead so hard,
Were not employed, nor in so good regard.*

For these sentences perhaps might give leave to some Alcarnenes, Nesiotis, and Idines, or such maner of people, who live by their handy-work, get their living by the sweat of their browes, and are past all hope to attaine unto any perfection of eloquence, to flie there-ffo: as it is reported of two Architects or great Masons at Athens sometimes, who came in question for their skill, whether of the twaine was more sufficient to make a great fabrick and publike piece of worke; the one, who could speake very well and expresse his minde with varietie and elegancie of words, pronounced a premeditate oration as touching the frame and building thereof; which he did so well, that he moved the whole assembly therewith; the other, who was more skilfull in Architecture, & the better workman by far, but one that could not deliver his mind so eloquently, when he came before the people, said no more but thus: My masters of Athens, that which this man here hath said, I will do. And verily such good fellowes as these, acknowledge no other goddesse or patronesse than Minerva the artizan, surnamed Ergane, and who as Sophocles saith:

upon

*upon the masive anvil et a me,
With weightie strokes of hammer strong,
A livelesse barre of yron, and frame
Obeisant to their labours long.*

But the minister or prophet to Minerva Polias, that is to say, the protectresse of cities, and to Themis or Justice the protectresse of counsell:

*Who of mens counsels president,
Disposes, or holds them resident.*

he (I say) having but one instrument to use and occupie, which is his speech, by forming and fashioning some things to his owne mould, and others which he findeth untoward and not pliable to the dessein of his worke (as if they were knurres and knots in timber, or flaws in the end of a whole citie) by softning, polishing and making plaine and smoothe, embelisheth in the end a whole citie. By this means the Common-wealth of Pericles, in name and outward appearance being popular, was in trueth and effect a principality and regall State, governed by one man the principall person of the citie: and what was it that did the deed? surely the force and power of his eloquence: for at the same time there lived Cimon, a good man, Ephialtes also and Thucydides, who being one day demanded by Archidamus the king of the Lacedaemonians, whether hee or Pericles wrestled better: That were (quoth hee) very hard to say; for when in wrestling I beare him downe to the ground, he is by his words able to perswade the standers-by and beholders, that he is not fallen, and so goeth cleere away with it. And verily, this gift of his brought not onely to him honour & glorie, but also safetie to the whole citie; which being by him ruled and perswaded, preserved and maintained full well the wealth and estate which it had of her owne, and forbore to desire the conquest of any other: whereas poore Nicias, although hee had the same good meaning and intention, yet because he wanted that perswasive facultie with his smooth tongue and eloquent speech, like unto a gentle bit, when he went about to bridle & restrain the covetous desire of the people, could not compasse it, but mauger and in spight of his heart was overswaied, caried away, and haled by the very necke unto Sicilie; such was the violence of the people. An olde said saw it is, and a true proverbe: That it is not good holding of a wolfe by the eares; but surely of a city or State, a man must principally take hold by the eares; and not as some doe, who are not sufficiently exercised nor well seene in the feat of eloquence, search other absurd and foolish handles to catch hold by, for to win and draw the people unto them: for divers you shall have, who thinke to draw and leade the multitude by the belly, in making great feasts and banqueting them; others by the purse, in giving them largesses of silver; some by the eie, in exhibiting unto them goodly fights of plaies, games, warlike dances and combats of fencers at the utterance; which devices are not to draw and leade the people gently, but to catch them rather cunningly: for the drawing or leading of a multitude is properly to perswade them by force of eloquence; whereas the other allurements and enticements resemble very well the baits that are laied for to take brute and wilde beasts, or the fodder that herd-men use to feed them with. Since then it is so, that the chiefe instrument of a wife and sage governour, is his speech, this principall care would be had, that the same be not too much painted and set out, as if he were some yong gallant that desired to shew his eloquence in a Theater and frequent assembly of a great faire or market, composing his oration as a chaplet of flowers with the most beautifull, sweet and pleasant phrases or tearmes that he can chuse; neither ought the same to be so painfully studied and premeditated as that oration of Demosthenes was, which Pylarchus said (by way of reproch) that it smelled of lamp-oile; nor full of over-much sophistical curiositie of enthymemes and arguments too witty and subtiltie; nor yet with clauses and periods exactly measured to the rule and compasse. But like as Musicians are desirous that in touching and stroke of their strings there should appeare a sweet and kinde affection, and not a rude beating; even so in the speech of a sage ruler, whether it be in giving counsell or decreeing any thing, there ought not to be seene the artificial cunning of an Oratour, nor any curious affection; neither must it in any wise tend to his owne praise, as if he had spoken learnedly, formally, subtilly, wittily and with precise respect and distinctions: let it be full rather of naturall affection without arte, of true heart and magnanimitie, of franke and fatherly remonstrance, as may become the father of his countrey, full of forecalt and providence, of a good mind and understanding, carefull of the common-weale, having together with honest and comely dignitie a lovely grace that is attractive, consisting of grave tearmes, pertinent reasons, and proper sentences, and the same significant and perswasive. For in trueth the oration and stile of a Statesman and governour admitteth in comparifon of a lawier or advocate pleading at the barre in court, more fententious fpeeches, hiftories, fables and metaphors, which do then move and affect the multitude moft, when the fpeaker knoweth how to ufe them with meafure, in time and place convenient; like as he did, who faid: My mafters, fee that you make not Greece one-cied: (fpeaking of the citie of Athens, when they were about to deftroy it) and according as Demades alfo did, when he faid, that he fat at ftirne to governe, not a fhip, but the fhipwracke of a citie and Commonwealt: Semblably Archilochus in faying,

Let not the ftone of Tantalus

This ifle alwaies hung over thū.

Likewife Pericles when he gave advice and commanded to take away th. : eie-fore of the haven 10 Piræan, meaning thereby the little ifle Aegina. In the fame maner Phocion fpeaking of the victorie atchieved by Generall Leosthenes, faid thus: The ftadium or fhort race of this warre is good, but I feare (quoth he) the dolichum thereof; that is to fay, the afterclaps and length thereof. In fumm, a fpeech ftanding fomewhat of haughtineffe, grauitie, and greatneffe, is more befitting a governour of State: and for example heereof, go no further than to the orations of Demosthenes penned againft king Philip, and among other fpeeches, fet downe by Thucydides, that which was delivered by the Ephorus Shenelaidas: alfo that of king Archidamus, in the citie Platææ: likewife the oration of Pericles after that great peftilence at Athens. As for thofe long fermons, carying a great traine of fentences and continued periods after them, which Theopompus, Ephorus and Anaximenes, bring in to be pronounced by captaines unto their 20 foldiours when they be armed and ftand arranged in battell-ray, a man may fay of fuch as the Poet did:

What fooles would fpeake thus many words,

So neere to edge and dint of fwords.

Over and befides; true it is that a man of government may otherwhiles give a taunt and nipping fcoffe, he may caft out alfo a merrie jeft to moove laughter, and namely, if it be to rebuke, chaftife, yea and to quippe one and take him vp for his good, after a modeft maner, and not to touch him too neere and wound him in honour and credite to his difgrace, with a kinde of fcurrilitie. But above all it may becomme him thus to doe when he is provoked thereunto, and is driven to replie and give one for another by way of exchange: for to begin firft in that fort, 30 and to come prepared with fuch premeditate ftuffe, is more befitting a pleafant or common jefter, who would make the companie laugh, befides that, it carieth alfo an opinion of a malicious and fpitefull minde: and fuch are the biting frumpes and broad jefts of Cicero and Caio the elder; likewife of one Enxirchus a familiar and difciple of Aristotle; for thefe many times began firft to fcoffe and taunt; but when a man never doth it but by way of reply or rejoinder, the fodaine occafion giveth him pardon to be revenged, and withall fuch requitals carie the greater grace with them. Thus dealt Demosthenes by one who was deeply fufpected to be a theefe: for when he would feeme to twit Demosthenes by his watching and fitting up all night at his booke for to endite and write: I wot well (quoth Demosthenes) that I trouble and hinder thee very much with keeping my candle or lampe burning all night long. Alfo when he anfwe- 40 red Demades, who cried out aloud: Demosthenes would correct me (as much to fay forfooth) as if according to the common proverbe, the fow fhould teach Minerva: Minerva (quoth he, taking that word out of his mouth) what's that you fay? Minerva was furprized not long fince in adulterie. Semblably it was with no ill grace that Xenetus answered his country-men and fellow citizens, who caft in his teeth and upbraided him, for that being their leader and captaine he fled out of the field: With you (quoth he) my loving and deere friends, I ran away for companie. But great regard and heed would be taken, that in this kinde he overpaffe not himfelfe, nor go beyond the bonds of mediocritie in fuch ridiculous jefts, for feare that either he offend and difpleafe the hearers unfeafonably, or debase and abject himfelfe too grofly, by giving out fuch ridiculous fpeeches: which was the fault of one Democrates, who mounting one day up into the pulpit or publicke place of audience, faid openly to the people there affembled; That himfelfe was like unto their citie, for that he had fmall force, and yet was puffed up with much winde. Another time alfo, and namely when the great field was loft before Charonea, he prefented himfelfe to fpeake unto the people in this maner: I would not for any thing that the common wealt were driven to fuch calamitie and fo hard an exigent, that you fhould have patience to heare me, and neede to take counfell at my hands: for as in the one he fhewed himfelfe a bafe and vile perfon, fo in the other he plaied the brain-ficke foole and fencelefleaffe: but for a man of 50 State

State, neither is the one nor the other decent and agreeable. Furthermore, Phocion is had in admiration for his brevite of fpeech, in fomuch as Polyenctus giving his judgement of him, faid: Demosthenes indeed is the greateft Orator, and the moft famous Rhetorician, but Phocion beleve me, is the beft fpeaker; for that his pithie fpeech was fo couched, that in few words it contained much fubftance and good matter. And even Demosthenes himfelfe, howfoever he made no reckoning of all other orators in his time, yet if Phocion rofe up to deliver a fpeech after him, would fay: Lo heere ftandeth up now the hatchet or pruning knife of my words. Well then, endeavour you as much as poffibly you can, when you are to make a fpeech before the multitude to fpeake confiderately and with great circumfpection, directing your words fo, as 10 they may tend to fafetie and fecuritie, and not in any cafe to ufe vaine and frivolous language: knowing well that Pericles himfelfe, that great governour, was wont to make his praier unto the gods before hee entred into his oration in publicke audience: That he might let fall no word out of his mouth impertinent to the matter which he was to handle; and yet for all this, you muft be well exercifed nevertheleffe, and praiftised in the knowledge how to be able to anfwer and replie readily; for many occafions paffe in a moment, and bring with them as many fudden cafes and occurrences, efpecially in matters of government. In which regard, Demosthenes was (by report) reputed inferior to many others in his time, for that otherwhiles he would withdraw himfelfe and not be feene when occafion was offered, if he had not well premeditated and ftudied aforehand of that which he had to fay. Theophrastus alfo writeth 20 of Alibiades, that being defirous to fpeake, not onely that which was convenient, but alfo in maner and forme as it was meet; many a time in the mids of his oration would make a ftay, and be at a nonplus, whiles he fought and ftudied for fome proper tearmes, and laboured to couch and compofe them fitting for his purpofe: but he who taketh occafion to ftand up for to make a fpeech of fudden occurrences, and refpective to the occafions and times prefented unto him, fuch a one I fay of all others doth moft moove and aftonifh a multitude, he I fay is able to leade them as he lift and difpofe of them at his pleafure. After this maner plaied Leon the Bizantine, who was fent upon a time from thofe of Conftantinople unto the Athenians, being at civill debate and diffection among themfelves, for to make remonftrances unto them of pacification and agreement: for a very little man was he of ftature, and when the people fawe him 30 mounted up into the place of audience, everie one began to teigh, tittre, and laugh at him; which he perceiving well enough: And what would you do and fay then (quoth he) if you fawe my wife, whose crowne of hir head will hardly reach up fo high as my knee? At which word, they tooke up a greater fit of laughter then before throughout the whole affembly: And yet (quoth he againe) as little as we both be, if we chance to be at variance and debate one with another, the whole citie of Conftantinople is not big enough for us, nor able to holde us twaine. Pytheas likewife, the Orator, at what time as he fpake againft the honors which were decreed for king Alexander, when one faid unto him: How now fir, dare you presume to fpeake of fo great matters, being as you are, fo yoong a man? And why not (quoth he) for Alexander whom you make a god among you by your decrees, is yoonger than my felfe.

40 Furthermore, over and befides a ready tongue and well exercifed, he ought to bring with him a ftrong voice, a good breaft and a long breath, to this combat of State government; which I affure you, is not lightly to be accounted of, but wherein the champion is to be provided for all feare of mafferies or fight; for feare left if it chance that his voice faile or be wearie and faint, he be overcome and fupplanted by fome one

Catchpoll, Crier, and of that ranke,

Wide-mouth'd Jugler or mount-banke.

And yet Catb the yoonger, when he fufpected that either the Senate or the people were fore-ftalled by graces, laboring for voices and fuch like prevention, fo as he had no hope to perfwade and compaffe fuch matters as he went about, would rife up and holde them all a day long with an 50 oration; which he did to drive away the time, that at leaft-wife upon fuch a day there fhould be nothing done or paffe againft his mind. But as touching the fpeech of a governour, how powerful and effectuall it is, and how it ought to be prepared, we have this already fufficiently treated, efpecially for fuch an one as is able of himfelfe to devife all the reft, which confequently followeth hereupon.

Moreover, two avenues (as it were) or waies there be to come unto the credit of government; the one fhort and compendious, yeelding an honourable courfe to win glory and reputation; but it is not without fome danger; the other longer and more bafe and obfcure, howbeit

alwaies

alwaies safe and sure. For somethere be, who making faile and setting their course (as a man would say) from some high rocke situate in the maine sea, have ventured at the first upon some great and worthy enterprise, which required valour and hardinesse, and so at the very beginning entred into the middes of State-affaires, supposing that the Poet Pindarus said true in these his verses:

*A worthy worke who will begin,
Must when he enters first therein,
Set out a gay forefront to view
Which may sarre off the lustre thereof.*

For certainly the multitude and common sort being satisfied and full already of those governours whom they have bene used to a long time, receive more willingly all beginners and newcomers, much-like as the spectators and beholders of plaies or games have better affection a great deale to see a new champion entring fresh into the lists. And verily all those honours, dignities and powerfull authorities which have a sudden beginning and glorious encrease, doe ordinarily astonish and daunt all envie: for neither doth the fire (as Ariston saith) make a smoke which is quickly kindled; and made to burne out of a light flame; nor glorie breed envie when it is gotten at once and speedily; but such as grow up by little and little, at leisure, those be they that are caught therewith, some one way and some another. And this is the cause that before they come to flower (as it were) and grow to any credit of government, fade and become dead and withered about the publike place of audience. But whereas it falleth out according to the 20 Epigram of the courtier or runner Ladas,

*No sooner came the sound of whip to eare,
But he was at the end of his carriere,
And then withall, in one and selfe-same triec
He crowned was with laurell for his price.*

that some one hath at first performed an ambassage honourably, rode in triumph gloriously, or conducted an armie valiantly, neither envious persons nor spitefull ill-willers have like power against such as against others. Thus came Atatus into credit the very first day, for that he had defeated and overthrown the tyrant Nicoles. Thus Alcibiades wooon the furies, when he practised and wrought the alliance betweene the Mantimeans and the Athenians against the Lacedaemonians. And when Pompey the great would have entred the citie of Rome in triumph, before he had shewed himselfe unto the Senate, and was withstood by Sylla, who meant to impeach him, he stucke not to say unto him: More men there be sir, who worship the Sun rising, than the Sun setting; which when Sylla heard, he gave place and yeelded unto him without one word replying to the contrary. And when as the people of Rome chose and declared Cornelius Scipio Consull all on a sudden, and that against the ordinary course of law, when as himselfe stood onely to be Aedile, it was not upon some vulgar beginning and ordinary entrance into affaires of State, but for the great admiration they had of his rare and singular prowesse, in that being but a very youth, he had maintained single fight and combat hand to hand with his enemy in Spain, and vanquished him; yea, and within a while after, in the necke of it, had achieved many 40 worthy exploits against the Carthaginians, being but a militarie Tribune or Colonel of a thousand foot: for which brave acts and services of his, Cato the elder as he returned out of the campe cried out with a loud voice of him:

*Right wise and sage indeed alone is he,
The rest to him but slitting shadows be.*

But now sir, seeing that the cities & States of Greece are brought to such tearmes, that they have no more armies to conduct, nor tyrants to be put downe, nor yet alliances to be treated and made, what noble and brave enterprise would you have a young gentleman performe at his beginning and entrance into government? Mary, there are left for him publike causes to plead, ambassages to negotiate unto the Emperour or some soveraigne potentate; which occasions 50 do ordinarily require a man of action, hardy and ardent at the first enterprise, wise and warie in the final execution. Besides, there be many good and honest customes of ancient time, either for-let or grown out of kinde by negligence, which may be set on foot, renewed and reformed againe: many abuses also by ill custome are crept into cities, where they have taken deepe root, and bene seled, to the great dishonour and damage of the common-wealth: which may be redressed by his means. It falleth out many times, that a great controversie judged and decided aright; the trial likewise and proove of faithfull trust and diligence in a poore mans cause maintained trained and defended frankly and boldly against the oppression of some great and mightie adversarie; also a plaine and stout speech delivered in the behalfe of right and justice, against some grand Signiour who is unjust and injurious, have afforded honorable entries unto the management of State affaires. And many there be, who have put forth themselves, made their parts known, and come up, by entreteining quarrels and enmities with those personages, whose authority was odious, envied and terrible to the people: for we alwaies see that presently the puissance and power of him that is put downe and overthrown, doth accrue unto him who had the upper hand, with greater reputation: which I speake not as if I did approve and thought it good for one to oppose himselfe by way of envie unto a man of honour and good respect, and who by his vertue holdeth the chiefe place of credit in his countrey, thereby to undermine his estate, like as Simmias dealt by Pericles, Alcmaeon by Themistocles, Clodius by Pompeius, and Meneclides the Oratour by Epaminondas; for this course is neither good nor honourable, and besides, lesse gainefull and profitable: for say that the people in a sudden fit of furious choler commit some outrage and abuse upon a man of worth; afterwards, when they repent at leisure (being coole) that which they did hastily in their heat of blood, they thinke there is no readier nor juster means to excuse themselves to him, than to deface, yea, and undoe the said partie who first moved and induced them to those proceedings. And verily, to set upon a wicked person, who either by his audacious and inconsiderate rashnesse, or by his fine & cautelous devices hath gotten the head over a whole citie, or brought a state to his devotion, such as were in olde time Cleon and Clitophon at Athens; to set upon those (I say) for to bring them under, yea, and utterly to destroy them out of the way, were a notable preamble (as it were) to the Comedy for him that is mounted upon the stage of a common-wealth, and newly entred into the government thereof. I am not ignorant likewise, that some by clipping the wings, or paring the nailes (as a man would say) of an imperious Senate and lordly Seignoury, taking upon them too much, and tyrannizing by vertue of their absolute soverieignty, which was the practise of one Ephialtes at Athens; and another in the citie Ela, whose name was Phormio, have acquired honour and reputation in their countrey: but I holde this to be a dangerous beginning for to be enterprised by them that would come to the managing of State-affaires. And it seemeth that Solan made choise of a better entrance than so, for the citie of Athens being divided into three parts or regions; the first of those that did inhabit the hill; the second of them who dwelt upon the plaine; and the third of such as kept by the water-side; he would not seeme to side with any one of these three parts, but caried himselfe indifferent unto them all, saying & doing what he could to reconcile and reunite them together: by which meanes chosen he was, by the generall consent of them all, the lord Reformer, to draw new lawes and conditions of pacification among them; and by this practise he established and confirmed the State of Athens. Thus you see how a man may enter into the government of the common-wealth by honourable and glorious commencements: and this may suffice for the former avenue of the twaine aforesaid unto the affaires of State.

As for the other way, which as it giveth more sure access, so it is not so expedite and short; there have bene many notable men who in old time made choise thereof, and loved it better: 40 and by name, Aristides, Phocion, Pammenes the Theban, Lucullus in Rome, Cato and Agefilas at Lacedaemon: for like as the ivie windeth about trees stronger than it selfe, and riseth up aloft together with them; even so each one of these before-named, being yet young novices and unknown, joining and coupling themselves with other ancient personages who were already in credit by rising leisurely under the wing and shadow of others, and growing with them, grounded themselves and took good root against the time that they undertooke the government of State. Thus Clisphenes raised Aristides; Chabrias advanced Phocion; by Sylla, Lucullus rose; Cato by Fab. Maximus; Epaminondas came up by Pammenes; and Agefilas by Lysander; but this man named last, upon a certaine inordinate ambition and importune jealousie did wrong unto his owne reputation, by casting and rejecting behind him a worthy personage, who guided and 50 directed him in all his actions: but all the rest wisely and honestly revered, acknowledged, yea, and aided with all their power, even to the very end, the authors of their rising and advancement; much like unto those bodies which are opposed full against the Sunne, in returning and sending backe the light that shineth upon them, doe augment and illustrate the same so much the more. Thus when evil tongued persons, who envied and malignd the glory of Scipio, gave out that he was but the plaier and actour onely of those worthy feats of armes which he executed; for the author thereof was Laelius his familiar friend: yet Laelius for all these speeches was never moved nor altered in his purpose, but continued still the same man to promote and second cond the glory and vertue of Scipio. As for Africanus the friend of Pompeius, notwithstanding he was but of base and low degree, yet being upon tearmes to be chosen Consul, when he understood that Pompeius favoured others, gave over his sute, and let fall the possibilitie that he had; saying withal: That it would not be so honourable unto him for to be promoted unto that dignitie of Consulate, as grievous and troublefome, to obtaine the same against the good will, and without the favour and assistance of Pompeius; and so in deferring and putting off the matter but one yeere longer, he had not the repulse when the time came, and therewith he kept his friend still, and enjoyed his favour. And by this meanes it cometh to passe, that those who are thus led by the hand of others, and trained to the way of preferment and glorie, in gratifying one, do gratifie many withall; and besides, if any inconvenience chance to ensue, the lesse odious they to be and hatefull for it: which was the reason that Philip king of Macedonie earnestly exhorted and admonished his sonne Alexander that he should provide himselfe of many friends and servants whiles he might, and had leasure, even during the reigne of another, namely, by converting and conferring graciously with every one, and by cheerefull behaviour and affabilitie to all, for to winne their love and favour; but when he was once invested in the kingdome, to chuse for his guide and conductour in the managing of State-affaires, not simply him who is of most credit and greatest reputation, but rather the man who is such an one by his desert and vertue, as like as every tree will not admit a vine to wind about the trunk & body thereof; for some there be that do choke & utterly marre the growth of it; even so in the government of cities & States, those who are not truly honest and lovers of vertue, but ambitious and desirous of honour and sovereignty onely, afford not unto yong men the meanes and occasions of worthy enterprises and noble acts, but upon envie and jealousie holde them under and put them backe as farres they can, and thus make them to consume and languish, as if they deteined from them their glorie, and cut them thort of that which is their onely food and nourishment. Thus did Marius in Africke first, and afterwards in Galatia by Sylla, by whose meanes hee had performed much good service; and in the end would not use him at all, but cast him off; for that in trueth, hee was vexed at the heart to see him growe up as hee did, and to winne so great reputation under him, howsoever hee would have seemed to colour the matter, and make the signet in the colet of his ring which he sealed withall, the pretense and cloake thereof. For Sylla being treasurer in Africke, vnder Marius the lord General, was sent by him unto king Bocchus, and brought with him Jugurtha prisoner; and being a yong gentleman as he was, and beginning to taste the sweetnesse of glorie, he could not carrie himselfe modestly in this good fortune of his, but must needs weare upon his finger a faire scale ring, wherein he caused to be engraven the historie of this exploit, and namely how Bocchus delivered into his hands Jugurtha prisoner: heere at Sylla tooke exceptions, laid this to his charge, and made it a colourable occasion of rejecting and putting him out of his place: but he joining himselfe with Catulus and Metellus, good men both, and the adversaries of Marius; soone after chased Marius and turned him out of all in a civil war, which was well neere the ruine and overthrow of the Romaine empire. Sylla dealt not so with Pompeius, for he evermore advanced & graced him from his very youth, he would arise out of his chaire, and vaile bonet vnto him when hee came in place: semblably hee carried himselfe toward other yong gentlemen and gallants of Rome, imparting unto some the meanes of doing the exploits of captaines and commanders: yea quickning and putting others forward who were unwilling of themselves; and in so doing he filled all his armies with zeale, emulation, and desire of honor, striving who should doe better, and by this meanes became himselfe superior evermore, and ruled all; at length desirous to be not the onely man, but the first and the greatest among many that were likewise great. These be the men therefore with whom a yong States-man ought to joine; to these he ought to cleave, & in them as it were to be incorporate: not as that cockatrice or Basilisk in Aesops fables, who being carried aloft on the shoulders of the eagle, no sooner came neere to the sunne beames, but suddenly tooke his flight, and came to the place before the eagle: and after that maner to rob them of their honour, and secretly to catch their glorie from them; but contrariwise to receive it of them with their consent and good favour, and to give them to understand that they had never knowne how to rule unless they had learned first of them to obey well, as Plato saith.

Next after this followeth the election and chioise that they ought to make of their friends: In which point, they are not to take example either by Themistocles or Cleon: As for Cleon when he knew that he was to undertake the government upon him, assembled all his friends together, and declared unto them that he renounced all their amitie, saying; That friendship was offentimes

offentimes a cause that disabled men, and withdrew them from their right intention in affaires of State; but it had bene farre better done of him to have exiled and chased out of his minde all avarice and contentious humors, to have clenched his heart from envie and malice: for the government of cities hath not need of those who are friendlesse and destitute of familiar companions, but of such as be wife and honest: but when he had banished and put away his friends, he entertained round about him a sort of flatterers, who daily stroked and licked him, as the comickall poets use to say. He became rough and severe to good and civill men, but in stead thereof he debased himselfe to court, flatter, and please the multitude, doing and saying all things to content them, and taking rewards at every mans hand, combining and sorting himselfe with the worst and most leaud people in the whole citie, by their meanes to make head, and set against the best and most honorable persons. Themistocles yet tooke another course, who when one said unto him; You shall do the part of a good ruler and magistrate, in case you make your selfe equal unto every one alike; answered thus; I pray God I may never sit in such a throne or seate, wherein my friends may not prevaile more with me, than they that are not my friends. But herein he did not well, no more than the other, thus to promise any part and authoritie of his government unto those with whom he had amitie, and to submit the publicke affaires unto his private and particuler affections: howbeit, for all this, he answered very well unto Simonides, requesting somewhat at his hand that was not just: Neither were he a good musician or poet, (quoth he) who should sing against measures: nor the magistrate righteous who in favour of any person doth ought against the lawes. For in trueth a shamefull thing it were and a great indignitie; that in a ship the master or owner thereof should giue order to be provided of a good pilot and stereliman; that the pilot also should chuse good bote-swaines and other mariners,

Who can the helme rule in the sterne below,

And hoise up saile above, when winde do blow.

Also that an architect or master builder, knoweth how to chuse those workemen and laborers under him, who will in no case hurt his worke, but set it forward, and take paines with him for his best behoofe: and a States-man or governour, who as Pindarus saith well,

Of justice, is the architect,

And policy ought to direct.

not know at the very first to chuse friends of the same zeale and affection that he is himselfe, to second and assist him in his enterprises, and to be as it were the spirits to inspire him with a desire of well doing; but to suffer himselfe to be bent and made pliable unjustly and violentie; now to gratifie the will of one; and anon, to serve the turne and appetite of another: For such a man resembleth properly a carpenter or mason, who by error, ignorance, and want of experience, useth his squires, his plumbs, levels and rules so, that they make his worke to rise crooked and out of square in the end. For certainly frends be the very lively tooles, and sensible instruments of governors; and in case they doe amisse and worke without the right line, the rulers themselves are not to slip and go awry with them for companie, but to have a carefull eie unto this, that unwitting to them they doe not erre and commit a fault. For this it was that wrought Solon dishonor, and caused him to be reproched and accused by his owne citizens, for that having an intention to ease mens greivous debts, and to bring in that which at Athen they called Sisychia, as if one would say, an alleviation of some heave burden, which was a pleasing and plausible name, importing a generall striking out of all debts, and a cancelling of bonds; he imparted this desseigne and purpose of his to some of his friends, who did him a threwd turne, and most unjustly wrought him much mischief; for upon this iynking given unto them, they made haste to take up and borrow all the money they could, as farre as their credite would extend: not long after when this edict or proclamation aforesaid concerning the annulling of all debts was come forth and brought to light; these frends of his were found to have purchased goodly houses, and faire lands, with the monies which they had levied. Thus Solon was charged with the imputation of doing this wrong, together with them, when as himselfe indeede was wronged and abused by them. Agesilamus also shewed himselfe in the occasions and furies of his frends most weak and feeble minded, more iwis than in any thing else, resembling the horse Pegasus in Euripides,

Who swunke full low and yeelded what he could,

His backe to mount, more than the rider would.

and helping his familiar frends in all their distresses more affectionately and willingly than was meet and reason: for whensoever they were called into question in justice for any transgressions,

he entertained them againe. Some also there are who be wonderfull well pleased with the practise and fashion of Cretinas the Magnesian. This Cretinas had for his concurrent an adversary in the government of State, a noble man of the same citie named Hermias, who although he were not very rich, yet ambitious he was, and caried a brave and hautie minde: Cretinas in the time of the warre that Mithridates made for the conquest of Asia, seeing the citie in danger, went unto the said Hermias, and made an offer unto him to take the charge of capitaine generall for the defence of the citie, and in the meane while himselfe would go forth to retire to some other place; or otherwise, if he thought better that himselfe should take upon him the charge of the warre, then he would depart out of the citie into the country for the time, for feare lest if they taried both behinde and hindered one another as they were wont to doe by their ambitious minds, they should vndoo the state of the citie: This motion liked Hermias very well, who confessing that Cretinas was a more expert warrior than himselfe, departed with his wife and children out of the citie: Now Cretinas made meanes to fend him out before with a convoy, putting into his hands his owne money, as being more profitable to them who were without their houses and fled abroad, than to such as lay besieged within the citie, which being at the point to be lost, was by this meanes preserved beyond all hope and expectation: for if this be a noble and generous speech proceeding from a magnanimous hart, to say thus with a loud voice:

My children well I love, but of my hart,

My native soile by farre hath greater part.

Why should not they have this speech readier in their mouthes, to say unto every one? I hate this or that man, and willing I would be to doe him a displeasure; but my native country I love so much the more? For not to desire to be at variance and debate still with an enimie, in such causes as for which we ought to abandon and cast off our friend, were the part of a most fell, savage, and barbarous nature: yet did Phocion and Cato better in mine opinion, who entertained not any enimie with their citizens in regard of difference and variance betwene them about bearing rule and government; but became implacable and irreconcilable onely in publicke causes, when question was of abandoning or hurting the weale publike; for otherwise in private matters, they caried themselves kindly enough, without any rancor or malice even toward them, against whom they had contested in open place, as touching the State; for we ought not to esteeme or repute any citizen an enimie, unlesse such an one be bred amongst them as Aristion, or Nabis, or Catiline, who are to be reckoned botches rather, and pestilent maladies of a citie than citizens; for all others if haply they be at a jarre or discord, a good magistrate ought to bring them into tune and good accord againe, by gently setting up and letting downe, as a skillfull Musician would doe by the strings of his instrument; and not in anger to come upon those that are delinquents, roughly and after an outrageous manner, even to their detriment and disgrace; but after a more milde and civill sort, as Homer speaketh in one place:

Certes, faire friend, I would have held,

That others for your wit you had exceed.

As also in another:

You know, if that you list (wits)

To tell a better tale than this.

Yea, and when they shall either say or do that which is good and convenient, not to shew himselfe to grieve and grudge at their credit and reputation which they win thereby, nor to be sparing in affoording them honourable words to their commendation and advantage: for in so doing, thus much will be gained, that the blame which shall be laied upon them another time when they deserve it, will be better taken, and more credit given to it: and besides, by how much more we shall exalt their vertues, so much the more we may beat downe and depreesse their vices when they do amisse, by making comparison of them both, and shewing how much the one is more worthy and becomen than the other: for mine owne part, I holde it meet and good, that a man of government should give testimony in the behalfe of his adversaries in righteous & just causes; also assist and helpe them out of troubles, in case they be brought into question by some leawd sycophants, yea, and discredit and disable the imputations charged upon them, namely, when he seeth that such matters for which they are molested, be farre from their intention and meaning. Thus Nero, a cruell tyrant though he was, a little before he put Thraseus to death, whom he hated and feared most of all men in the world, notwithstanding one laied to his charge before him that he had given a wrong dome or unjust sentence: I would (quoth he) that I could be assured that Thraseus loved me so well as I am sure he is most upright and just Judge. Neither ther were it amisse for the astonishing & daunting of others, who be of a naughty nature, when they doe commit any grosse faults, to make mention other-whiles of some adversarie of theirs who is of a more modest behaviour and civill carriage, by saying: Such an one (I warrant you) would never have said or done thus. Moreover, it were not impertinent to put some, who doe offend, in minde of their fathers and ancestours, that have bene good and honest, like as Homer did:

unlike himselfe, and much grown out of kinde.

And Appius Claudius being the concurrent to Scipio Africanus, when they stood both for one magistracie, laied unto him as he met him in the street: O Paulus Aemilius, how deeply wouldst thou sigh for griefe and sorow, in case thou wert advertised that one Philonicus a Publicane or Banker and no better, accompanied and guarded thy sonne thorow the city, going downe toward the assembly of Cornices for to be chosen Censour? This manner of reprehension, as it admonisheth the offender, so it doth honour unto the admonisher. Nestor likewise in a Tragedie of Sophocles, answereth as politickly unto Ajax; when he reproched him, saying:

I blame not you sir Ajax, for your speech,
Nought though it be; your words are nothing lice.

Semblably Cato who had contested against Pompey, for that being combined and in league with Julius Caesar, he assaulted and forced the citie of Rome, when as afterwards they were grown to open warre one against the other, opined and gave his advice to conferre the charge and regiment of the common-weale upon Pompeius, saying withall: That they who could doe most mischief, were the fittest men to stay the same: for thus a blame or reproofe mingled with a praise and commendation, especially if the same grow to no opprobrious termes, but be contained within the compasse of a franke and free remonstrance, working not a spitefull stonemacke, but a remorse of conscience and repentance, seemeth kinde and dutifull; whereas despituous reproches are never seemely and decent in the mouth of a magistrate and man of honour. Marke the opprobrious termes and taunts that Demosthenes let flie against Aeschines; those also that Aeschines gave him; likewise the bitter frumps which Hyperides wrote against Demades; and that Aeschines ever delivered such, or if there came the like out of the mouth of Pericles, of Lycourge the Lacedaemonian, or of Pittacus the Lesbian; and as for Demosthenes, he forbore such sharpe and cutting termes otherwise, and never used them but in pleading against some criminal causes; for his orations against Philip are cleere and voide of all nips, flouts, and scoffes whatsoever: and in truth such manner of dealing diffameth the speaker more, than those against whom they bee spoken; they bring confusion in all affaires; they trouble assemblies both in counsell house and also in common hall; In which regard, Phocion yeelding upon a time to one that was given to raile, brake off his oration, held his peace for a while and came downe; but after, the other with much ado held his tongue and gave over his foule language, he mounted up into the place of audience againe, and going on in his former speech which was interrupted and discontinued, said thus: Now that I have already my masters spoken sufficiently of horsemen, of armes, and soldiours heavily armed at all peeces, it remaineth to discourse of light footemen, and targuatiars nimble appointed.

But so far as much as this is an hard matter unto many, to beare with such broad language, and to containe, and oftentimes these taunting scoffers meete with their matches, and have their mouthes stopped, and are put to silence by some pretie replies; I would wish that the same were short, pitie, and delivered in very fewe words, not shewing any heate of anger and choler, but a kinde of sweete mildenesse, after the manner of a grave laughter, yet withall somewhat tart and biting; and such ordinarily be those that are returned sily in the same kinde against them that first began: for like as those darts which are recharged upon them that flung them first, seeme to be driven with good will, and sent backe againe with great force and firme strength of him who was shroken with them; even so it seemeth that a sharpe and biting speech retorted against him who first spake it, cometh forceable and with a power of wit and understanding from the partie who received it; such was the replie of Epinonidas unto Callistratus, who reproched and upbraided the Thebanes and Argives with the parents of Oedipus and Orestes, for that the one being borne in Thebes, slew his owne father, and the other at Argos killed his mother: true indeed quoth Epinonidas, and therefore we banished them out of our cities, but you receive them into yours. Semblable was the answer of Antalcidas a Lacedaemonian unto an Athenian, who laied unto him after a boasting and vaunting manner: We have driven you oftentimes from the river Cephassus; but we (quoth he) never yet drave you fro the river Eurotas: In like sort replied Phocion pleasantly upon Demades when he cried aloud, The Athenians will put thee to death if they enter once into their raging fits: But they (quoth he) will doe the same by thee, if they were in their right wits: and Crassus the oratour whē Domitius demanded this question of him; When the lamprey which you kept and fed in your poole was dead, did you never weepe for it, and say true? came upon him quickly againe in this wise: And you sir when you had buried three of your wives one after another, did you ever shed teare for the matter, & tell trthe? And verilie these rules are not onely to be practised in matters of State-affaires, but they have their use also in other parts of mans life.

Moreover, some there be who will intrude and thrust themselves into all sorts of publike affaires, as Cato did; and these are of opinion, that a good citizen should not refuse any charge or publike administration so farre forth as his power will extend: who highly commend Epaminondas; for that when his adversaries and evil willers upon envie had caused him to be chosen a bailife and receiver of the citie revenues; thereby to doe him a spight and shrewd turne; hee did not despise & thinke basely of the said office; but saying, that not onely magistracie sheweth what maner of man one is, but also a man sheweth what the magistracie is, he brought that office into great dignitie and reputation, which before was in no credite and account at all, as having the charge of nothing els but of keeping the streetes cleane, of gung-farming and carrying dung forth out of the narrow lanes and blinde allies, and turning water-courses. And even Plutarch my selfe doubt not, but I make good sport and game unto many who passe through our citie, when they see me in the open streetes otherwhiles busie and occupied about the like matters; but to meete with such, I might helpe my selfe with that which I have found written of Antisthenes; for when some there were that meruailed much at him for carrying openly in his hands through the market place a peece of salt fish, or stock-fish which he had bought: I is for mine own selfe (quoth he alowd) that I carie it; but corrariwise mine answer is to such, as reprove me when they finde me in proper person present, at the measuring and counting of bricks and tiles, or to see the stones, sand, and lime laid downe, which is brought into the citie; it is not for my selfe that I builde, but for the city and common-wealth, for many other things there be, which if a man exercise or manage in his owne person and for himselfe, hee may bee thought base minded and mechanical; but in case he do it for the common-wealth and the State, and for the country and place where he liveth, it cannot be accounted a vile or ungentleman-like service, but a great credite even to bee serviceable, ready and diligent to execute the meanest functions that be. Others there are, who thinke the fashion that Pericles used to be more stately, grave, and decent, and namely Critelaus the peripateticke among the rest, who was of this mind, that as the two great galiassees, to wit, Salaminia at Athens, and Paralos were not shor or lanchd into the sea for every small matter, but onely upon urgent and necessarie occasions; even so a man of government should be employed in the chiefe & greatest affaires, like as the soveraigne and king of the worlde, according to the poet Euripides, τοις ἄλλοις ὁ δὲ τιμῶν.

For God himselfe doth manage and dispen-things of most weight, by his sole government.
But matters high and of small consequence,
he doth referre to fortunes regiment.

For we cannot commend the excessive ambition, the aspiring and contentious spirit of Theragenes, who contented not himselfe to have gone through all the ordinary games with victory, and to have wonne the prizes in many other extraordinary maffries and feats of activity, to wit, not onely in that generall exercise Paneration, wherein hand and foote both is put to the uttermost at once, but also at buffets, & at running a course in the long race: Finally, being one day at a solemne anniverfari feast or yeeres-maund in the memorial of a certaine demi-god (as the manner was) when he was set, & the meat served up to the boord, he would needs rise from the table for to performe another general Paneration: as if forsooth it had belonged to no man in the world to achieve the victorie in such feats but himselfe, if hee were present in place: by which profession he had gotten together as good as twelve hundred coronets, as prizes at such combats, of which the most part were of small or no valew at all; a man would say they had beene chaffe or such refuse and raffe. Like unto him for all the world be those, who are ready (as a man would say) at all howers to cast off all their clothes to their verie single waistcot or shirt, for to undertreke all affaires that shall be presented; by which meanes, the people have enough enough and too much of them; they become odious and yrkesome unto them; in such sort that if they chance to do well and prosper, they envie them; if they do otherwise than well and miscarry, they reioice and be glad at heart therefore. Again, that which is admired in them at their first entrance into government, turneth in the end to a jeft and meere mockerie, much after this order, Metiochus is the Generall captaine; Metiochus looketh to the high waies; ter this order, Metiochus is the Generall captaine; Metiochus looketh to the high waies; Metiochus bakes our bread; Metiochus grinds our meale; Metiochus doth everie thing, and is all in all; finally, Metiochus shall pay for this one day, and crie woe is me in the end. Now was this Metiochus one of Pericles his followers and favorites, who making use of his authoritie out of measure and compasse, by the countenance thereof, would employ himselfe in all publike charges and commissions whatsoever, untill at the last he became contemptible and despised. For in truth a man of government ought to carry himselfe, as that the people should evermore have a longing appetite unto him, he in love with him, and alwaies desirous to see him againe, if he be absent. This policie did Scipio Africanus wisely practise; who aboied the most part of the time in the country; by this meanes both easing himselfe of the heave load of envie, and also giving those the while, good leasure to take breath, who seemed to bee kept downe by his glorie. Timefias the Clazomenian, was otherwise a good man and a sufficient politician, howbeit little wist he, how he was envied in the citie, because he would seeme to do everie thing by himselfe, untill such time as there befell unto him such an accident as this. There chanced to be playing in the mids of a street as he passed by, a companie of boies, and their game was, who could draw with a cudgell a certaine cockall bone out of an hole. Some boies there were who held, that the bone lay still within; but he who had smitten it, maintained the contrarie (and said withall) I would I had as well dashed out Timefias braines out of his head, as I am sure this bone was stricken out of the hole: Timefias overheard this word, and knowing thereby what envie and malice all the people bare unto him, returned home presently to his house, and told his wife the whole matter, commanding her to trusse and packe up all both bag and baggage, and to follow after him; who immediately went out of doores, and departed for ever out of the citie Clazomene. It should seeme also that Themistocles was almost in the same plight, & wanted but a litle of the like shrewd turne from the Athenians, when he was driven thus to say unto them: Ah my good friends and neighbours, why are you wearie and thinke much to receive so great good at my hands? But as touching these persons above said, some words of theirs were well placed, & others not. For a wise Statel-man, in care, affection & foresight, ought not to refuse any publik charge whatsoever, but to take paines in having an eye to all, & to understand and know every particular; and not to reserve himselfe close, as it were, some holy anchor or sacred tackling laid up in some secret cabin of a ship, and not to attend onely upon extremities, and to tarric untill he be employed upon occasions of great necessity and utmost danger. But like as good patrons or masters of a ship, lay their own hands to some businesse, but others they performe sitting themselves a farre off by the meanes of their tooles and instruments, and by the hands of other servitors, turning about, stretching and winding up, or letting downe and slackening the ropes as they see cause, employing the mariners, some to row, others to attend and slacken the ropes as they see cause, employing the mariners, some to row, others to attend and 40 be occupied in the prow and foreship; and others againe to crie unto their fellows to ply their worke; and some of them they call many times into the poope, and putting the helme into their hands, let them to steere and guide the steme; even so ought a wise governor of the common-wealth to yeeld now and then unto others the honor of commaund, and otherwhiles to call them after a gracious and courteous sort to the pulpit or publike place of audience, to make orations to the people, and not to moove all matters belonging to the State by his owne personal speeches nor by his decrees, sentences, and arts (and as it were) with his owne hands execute everie thing; but to have about him faithfull and trustie persons to be his ministers, who might second and assist him; and those he should employ, some in this charge, and others in that, according as he seeth them to be sufficient meet and fit for employment. After this manner did Pericles use Alenippus for his expeditions and conduct of warre affaires: thus by the 50 meanes of Ephialtes he tooke downe and abridged the authoritie of the high court Areopagus. Charinus he employed in compassing and contriving the law or decree that passed against the Megarians; and Lampon he sent with a colonie for to people the citie of Tharii. And in this doing, he not onely diminished the envie of the people against himselfe, in that it seemed that his power and authoritie was thus divided and parted among manie; but also hee managed the affaires of the State better and more commodiously by far. For like as the division of the hand into fingers enfeebled not the force of the whole hand, but maketh it more fit for use, to handle all tooles and instruments, or to worke any thing more artificially; even so, he that in matters of government doth communicate part of the management of the publike affaires with his friends, causeth by this participation all things to be better done, and with more expedition: whereas that man, who upon an insatiable desire to shew himselfe, to have credit, and to winne name and authoritie, laith all the weight of the State upon his owne shoulders, and will be doing of everie thing; undertaking oftentimes that charge, whereunto he is neither framed by nature, nor fitted by exercise; as Cleon did in leading an armie; Philopemenes in conducting a navie; and Anniball in making orations to the people, maketh himselfe inexcusable, if happily ought fall out otherwise than well. To such an one may well be applied a verse out of Esripides:

You worke not in timber, but in other matter Being your selfe but onely a Carpenter.

even so, you not able to deliver an eloquent speech, have undertaken an embassage; being idle and given to take your ease, you will needs have the charge of a steward and governe an house: not skilfull and readie in casting accounts, you will needs be a Treasurer or receiver, being aged and sickly, you are become a commander and generall of an armie. Pericles did farre better than so; for he parted the government with Cimon; and retaining to himselfe the whole power of ruling within the citie, he left unto Cimon full commission and authority to man the Armado, and in the meane while to make war upon the Barbarians, because he knew his owne selfe more fit for civill regiment at home, & the other more meet for warlike command abroad. In this respect Eubulus the Anaphyllian is highly commended, who, notwithstanding the people had a great affiance and trust in him, yea and gave him as much credit as no man more, yet could hee never be brought to deale in the forraigne affaires of Greece, nor to take upon him the conduct of an armie; but resolving with himselfe ever frō the beginning to attend & be employed in manie matters he mightily increased the revenewes of the citie, and enriched the State exceedingly. But Sphierates for exercising & practising to make declamations at home in his owne house in the presence of many others made a foole of himselfe, & was laughed to skorne for his labors; for say that he had proved no bad orator, but a most excellent speaker; yet should he have stood contented with the reputation that he had woen of a good warrior, by feats of armes, and have left the schooles of Rhetoricke, for sophisters, orators, and such professors.

But forasmuch as all common people are by nature malignant, especially to those who are in place of authoritie, taking pleasure to quarrell and finde fault with them; and suspecting ordinarily that many profitable acts and ordinances by them set downe, unless they be debated by factions & with some contradiction, are contrived by secret intelligence under hand, & by way of conspiracie; even this is the thing that most of all bringeth the private amities and societies of States-men and governours into an ill name and obloquie: howbeit, for all this, we are not to admit or grant unto them any true enmitie in deed or discord, as did sometimes a popular man and a governour of Chios; named Onomademus, who after he had in a certaine feditious tumult gotten the upper hand of his adversaries, would not banish out of the citie all those who had taken part against him: For feare lest that (quoth he) we fall out with our friends, when we have no more enemies: for surely this were mere follie. But whensoever the people shall suspect any ordinance or act proposed which is of great consequence and tending to their good, it behooveth not at such a time, that all (as it were) of one complot should deliver one and the same sentence; but that two or three opposing themselves without violence, should contradict their friend, and afterwards being convinced and overweighed by sound reasons, change their minde and range themselves to his opinion; for by this means they draw the people with them, namely, when they seeme themselves to be brought thereto in regard of a publike benefit and comoditie. And verily in trifling matters & of no great importance, it were not amisse to suffer our very friends in good earnest to differ and disagree from us, and to let every one take his way and follow his owne minde, to the end that when some maine points and principall matters of so great a moment shall come in question and be debated, it might not be thought that they have complotted together, and so grown to a point and accord about the best.

Moreover, we are thus to thinke: That a wife man and a politician is by nature alwaies the governour and chiefe magistrate of a citie, like as the king among the Bees: and upon this perswasion he ought to have evermore the reines in his hand, and to sway the affaires of State: howbeit he is not very often nor too hotly for to seeke after and pursue the offices and dignities which the people doe nominate and chuse by their free voices: for this office-managing, and desire desire to be alwaies in place of authoritie, is neither venerable for his person, nor yet plausible to the people; and yet must not he reject the same, in case the people call him lawfully to it, and conferre the same upon him, but to accept thereof, although peradventure they be offices somewhat inferior to the reputation that he hath already, yea, and to employ himselfe therein willingly and with good affection: for reason it is and equitie, that as we our selves have bene honoured already by places of great dignitie, so reciprocally we should grace and countenance those which be of meaneer qualitie; and whensoever we shall be chosen to supream magistracies, so wit, unto the estate of L. Governour and generall capitaine in the citie of Athens, or the Prytanship in Rhodes, or Boeotarchie which is here in Baotia, it may become us very well in modestie to yeeld and rebate a litle of the soveraigne power in our port, and with moderation to exercise the same; but contrariwise unto meaneer roomes to adde more dignity, and shew greater countenance, to the end that we be not envied in the one or despised in the other.

Now for a man that entreteth newly into any office whatsoever it be, he ought not onely to call to remembrance, and use the speeches that Pericles made the first time that he tooke upon him the rule of State, and was to shew himselfe in open place: namely, Looke to thy selfe Pericles, thou rulest free men and not bond-slaves; thou governeest Greeks and not Barbarians; nay, thou art the head magistrate of the citizens of Athens; but also he is to reason and say thus to himselfe: Thou art a commander and yet a subject withall; thou art the ruler of a citie under Romane Proconsuls, or els the Procuratours, Lieutenants and Deputies of Cesar. Here are not the plaines (as he said) of Lydia, for to runne with the lance, nor the ancient city Sardis, ne yet the puissance of the Lydians which was in times past. The robe must not be made so large, it must be worne more strait; your eie must be alwaies from the Emperours pavilion unto the tribunall seat of justice; and you are not to take so great pride, nor trust so much unto a crowne standing upon the head, seeing how horned shoes of the Romane Senators are above the same: but herein you ought to imitate the actors and plaiers in Tragedies, who adde somewhat of their owne to the roll or written part that they do play, to wit, their passionate affection, geiture, accent and countenance which is fit and agreeable to the person that they do represent; and yet withall, they forget not to have an eie and care both to the prompters. This (I say) we must do, for feare lest we passe those bounds and exceed the measures of that libertie which is given us by those who have the power to command us, for I assure you, to goe beyond those precincts and limits, bringeth with it danger; I say not to be hissed from off the stage, and to be laughed out of our coats; but many there have bene

*upon whose necks for punishment,
The edge of a vengbant axe and gleave
Hath fallen, to end all their torment,
And head from bodie soone did rescue.*

as it befell to Paralus your country-man, with those about him, for stepping a litle at one side without their limits. And such another also there was, who being confined into a certaine desert isle, became (as Solon saith)

A Sicilian or Pholegandrian, Who borne sometime was an Athenian.

We laugh hartly at little children, to see how otherwhiles they goe about to put their fathers shoes upon their owne feete, or to set crownes upon their heads in sport; and governors of cities relating foolishly oftentimes unto the people, the woorthie acts of their predecessors; their notable courage and brave minds, their notable enterprises achieved, farre different and disproportioned to the present times & proceedings in their daies, and exhorting them to follow the same, set the multitude aloft: but as they doe ridiculously, so afterwards (believe me) they suffer not that which deserveth to be laughed at, unless haply they be so base minded, that for their baseness there is no account made of them. For many other histories there be of ancient Greece, which afford examples to be recounted unto men living in this age, for to instruct and reforme their manners; as namely, those at Athens which put the people in remembrance, not of the prowess of their ancestors in martiall affaires, but for example to decree of that generall abolition and oblivion of all quarrels and matters past, which sometimes was concluded there, after that the citie was delivered and freed from their captivity under the thirtie Tyrants, as also another act, by vertue whereof they condemned in a grievous fine the Poet Phrynechus, for that he represented in a Tragedie the winning and racing of the citie Miletus. Likewise, how by a publike ordinance, every man wore chaplets of flowers upon their heads, when they heard say that Cassander reedified Thebes: and how, when intelligence came of the cruell execution and bloody massacre committed in Argos, wherein the Argives caused to be put to death 1500. of their owne citizens, they caused in a solemne procession and generall assembly of the whole citie, an expiatory sacrifice to be carried about, that it might please the gods to avert and turne away such cruell thoughts from the hearts of the Athenians; semblably, how at what time as there was a generall search made throughout the citie in everie house for those who banded with Harpalus, they passed by one house onely of a man newly married, and would not suffer it to be searched. For in these precedents & such like, they might well enough in these daies imitate and resemble their ancient forefathers. But as for the battell of Marathon: the field fought neere the river Eurynodon, and the noble fight at Platea, with other such examples which doe nothing els but blow and puffe up a multitude with vanitie, they should leave such stories for the schooles of Sophisters and masters of Rhetorike.

Well, we ought not in our severall governments to have a due regard onely to mainteine our selves and our cities so wisely, that our soveraignes have no occasion to complaine; but we must take order also to have one great Seignior or other, who hath most authoritie at Rome, and in the court of the emperour, to be our fast and speciall friend; who may serve us in steed of a rampier to backe us, and to defend all our actions and proceedings in the government of our countries: for such lords and great men of Rome stand ordinarily passing well affected to those affaires, which their dependants and favorites doe follow, and the fruit which may be reaped by the amitie and favour of such grand Seigniors, it were not good and honest to convert into the advancement and enriching of our selves, and our particular private friends; but to imploy the fame as Polybim did sometime and Pantium, who by the meanes of the good grace of Scipio wherein they stood, did benefit and advantage their countrey exceeding much: in which number may be ranged Arims, for when Cesar Augustus had forced the citie Alexandria, he entred into it, holding Arims by the hand, and devising with him alone of all his other friends what was to be done more: afterwards when the Alexandrians looked for no other but sackage and all extremities, and yet besought him to pardon them; I pardon you (quoth he) and receive you into my grace and favour, first in regard of the nobilitie and beaurie of your city; secondly for Alexander the great his sake, the founder thereof; and thirdly for the love of this my friend Arims your citizen. May a man with any reason compare with this gracious favour, the most large and gainfull commissions of ruling and governing provinces, which many make so great suit for at the court, and that with such abject servitude and base subjection, that some of them have even waxen old in giving attendance thereabout, at other mens garés; leaving in the meane while their owne home affaires at sixe and seven? were it not well to correct and amend a little the sentence in Euripides, singing and saying it thus? If it bee honest and lawfull to watch and make court at the gates of another, and to be subject to the fure of some great Seignior: surely most commendable and behoovefull it were so to doe, for the love and benefit of a mans country, in all other cases to seeke and embrace amities, under just and equal conditions.

Moreover, a governour in yeelding and reducing his country unto the obedience of mightie soveraignes abroad, ought to take good heed that he bring it not into servile subjection, lest when it is once tied by the legge, he suffer it to be bound also by the necke: for some there be who reporting all things both litle and great unto these potentates, make this their servitude reprochable; or to speake more truly, they deprive their country of all policie and forme of government, making it so fearefull, timorous, and fit for no authoritie and command at all; and like as they who use themselves to live so physically, that they can neither dine nor suppe, nor yet bath without their physitian, have not so much benefit of health as nature it selfe doth afford them; even so those cities and States which for every decree and resolution of their counsell, for all grace and favour, yea and for the smallest administration of publike affaires, must needs adjoigne the consent, judgement, and good liking of those Seigniors and good masters of theirs, they even compell the said great lords to be more powerfull and absolute over them than they would themselves. The causes hereof commonly be these; to wit, the avarice, jealousy, emulation of the chiefe and principall citizens in a State; for that being desirous otherwhiles to oppresse and keepe under those who be their inferiors, they constrain them to abandon their owne cities, or else being at some debate and difference with other citizens their equals, and unwilling to take the foile one at anothers hand in their owne citie; they have recourse unto other superior lords, and so bring in forreiners who are their betters. Heereupon

it cometh to passe, that Senate, people, Judiciall courts, and all that litle authoritie and power which they had is utterly lost. A good governour therefore ought to remedy this mischief, by appeasing such burgeses as be private and meane citizens, by equalitie, and those who are great and mightie, by reciprocall yeelding one to another; and so by this course to keepe all affaires within the compasse of the citie, to compose all quarrels, and determine all controversies at home, curing and healing such inconveniences as secret maladies of a common-wealth, with a civil and politicke medicine; that is to say, to chuse rather for his owne part for to be vanquished and overthrowen among fellow-citizens, than to vanquish & win the victorie by forren power, & not to offer wrong unto his natural country, and be a cause to overthrow the rights and priviledges thereof; as for all others, he is to beseech them, yea and to perswade with them particularly one by another, by good reasons and demonstrations, of how manie calamities peevisht obstinacie is the cause; and now because they would not ech one in his turne & course frame and accomodate themselves at home to their fellow-citizens, who manie times be of one minde and linage to their neighbours and companions in charges and offices, and that with honour and good favour; they are come to this passe, as to detect and lay open the secret dissensions and debates of their owne citie, at the gates of their advocates, and to put their causes into the hands of pragmaticall lawyers (at Rome) with no lesse shame and ignominie, than losse and damage.

Physicians are wont when they cannot expell and fully exclude out of the bodie inwardlie some kinde of maladies, to turne and drive the same without forth to the superficiall parts; but contrariwise, a man of government, if he be not able to keepe a citie altogether in peace & concord, but that some troubles will arise, yet at leastwise he must endeavour to contene that within the citie which is the cause thereof, and nureth the sedition, and in keeping it close to labour for to heale and remedie it; to this end, that if it be possible he have no need either of physician or physicke from forren parts; for the intentions of a man of State and government ought to be these, namely, to proceed in his affaires surely, and to flic the violent and furious motions of vaine-glorie, as hath bene said already, howbeit in his resolution,

*A courage bold and full of confidence
Unwunted heart, and fearlessse be must have
Which will not quail for any consequence,
But see the end: much like to soldiers brave
In field themselves who manly do behave,
And hazard lims and life for to defend Their countrey deere, and enemies to offend.*

and not onely to oppose himselfe against enemies, but also to be armed against perilous troubles and dangerous tumults, that he may be readie to resist and make head: for he ought not in any case himselfe to moove tempests and raise commotions, no nor when he seeth boisterous stormes comming, forsake and leave his countrey in time of need. He must not (I say) drive his citie under his charge upon apparent danger, but so soone as ever it once begin to be tossed, and to float in jeopardie, than is it his part to come to succor, by casting out from himselfe (as it were) a sacred Anchor, that is to say, to use his boldnesse and libertie of speech, considering that now the maine point of all lieth a bleeding, even the safetie of his countrey. Such were the dangers that hapned unto Pergamum in Neroes time, and of late daies to the Rhodians, during the Empire of Domitian, as also before unto the Theffalians, while Augustus was Emperour, by occasion that they had burned Petrus quick. In these and such like occurrences, a man of State and government, especially if he be woorthie of that name:

Ne ever shall you see Sleepie for to bee.

nor drawing his foote backe for feare, no nor to blame and lay the fault of others, ne yet to make shift for one, and put himselfe out of the medley of danger, but either going in embassage, or embarked in some ship at sea; or else readie to speake first, and to say not onely thus

*Wewe Apollo, have this murder don
From these our coasts, avert this plague anon.*

but although himselfe be not culpable at all with the multitude, yet will he put his person into danger for them. For surely this is an act right honest, and besides the honestie in it selfe, it hapneth divers times; that the vertue and noble courage of such a man hath bene so highly admired, that it hath daunted the anger conceived against a whole multitude, and dispatched all the fierceneffe fiere nesse and furie of a bitter menace : like as it befell unto a King of Perſia in regard of Bulſis and Sperhis two gentlemen of Sparta : and as it was ſcene in Pompey to his hoſt and friend Sthenon : for when he was fully determined to chaſtiſe the Mamertines ſharply, and to proceede againſt them in all rigor, for that they had rebelled, the ſaid Sthenon ſtept unto him, and thus frankly ſpake : That he ſhould do neither well nor juſtly, in caſe he did to death a number of innocents, for one man who alone was faultie ; for it is my ſelfe (quoth he) who cauſed the whole citie to revolt and take armes, inducing my friends for love, and forcing mine enemies for feare. Theſe words of his went to neere unto the heart of Pompey, that he pardoned the citie, and moſt courteouſly entreated Sthenon ; ſemblably, the hoſt of Sylla, having ſhewed the like valour and vertue, although it were not to the like perſon, died a noble death : for when Sylla had woon to the citie Pyreneſſe by aſſault, he meant to put all the inhabitants thereof to the ſword, excepting onely one hoſt of his, whom in regard of old hoſpitalite he ſpared and pardoned ; but this hoſt & friend ſaid flatly unto him, that he would never remaine alive to ſee that bloody maſſacre, nor hold his life by the murder of his country ; and ſo caſt himſelfe into the troupe of his fellow-citizens in the heate of execution, and was killed with them. Well, pray unto the gods we ought to preſerve and keepe us that we fall not into ſuch calamities and troubleſome times ; to hope alſo and looke for better daies.

Moreover, we are to eſteeme of everie publike magiſtracie, and of him who exerciſeth it, as of a great and ſacred thing, and in that regard to honour the ſame above all. Now the honour which is due unto authoritie, is the mutuall accord and love of thoſe who are ſet in place to execute the ſame together : and verily this honor is much more worth, than either all thoſe crownes and diademes which they beare upon their heads, or their ſtately mantles and robes of purple, wherewith they be arraigned. Howbeit, they that laid the firſt ground and beginning of amitie ; their ſervice in warres, when they were fellow-fouldiors, or the paſſing of their youthfull yeeres together ; and contrariwiſe, take this a cauſe now of enmitie, that they either are joined captaines in commiſſion for the conduct of an armie, or have the charge of the Common-weale together, it can not be avoided, but that they muſt incur one of theſe three miſchiefs. For either if they eſteem their fellowes and companions in government to be their equals, they begin themſelves firſt to grow into rearmes of diſſention ; or if they take them to be their betters, they fall to be envious ; or elſe in caſe they hold them to be inferior unto them in good parts, they deſpiſe, & contemne them. Whereas they ſhould indeed make court unto the greater, honor and adorne their equals, and advance their inferiours, and in one word to love and embrace all, as having an amitie and love engendred among themſelves, not becauſe they have eaten at one table, drunke of the ſame cup, or met together at one feaſt, but by a certaine common band and public obligation, as having in ſome ſort a certaine fatherly benevolence, contracted and grown upon the common affection unto their country. Certes, one reaſon why Scipio was not ſo well thought of at Rome was this ; that having invited all his friends to a ſolemne feaſt at the dedication of his temple to Hercules, he left out Mummus his colleague or fellow in office : for ſay that otherwiſe they tooke not one another for ſo good friends ; yet ſo it is that at ſuch a time and upon ſuch occaſions, they ought to have honored and made much one of the other, by reaſon of their common magiſtracie. If then Scipio, a noble perſonage otherwiſe, and a man of wonderfull regard, incurred the imputation and note of inſolence and preſumption, becauſe he forgot or omitted ſo ſmall a demonſtration and token of humanitie : how can it be, that he who goeth about to impair the dignitie and credit of his companions in government, or diſcrediteth and diſgraceth him in thoſe actions, eſpecially which proceed from honour and bountie, or upon an arrogant humour of his owne, will ſeeme to do all, and attribute the whole to himſelfe alone, how can ſuch an one (I ſay) be reputed, either modeſt or reaſonable ? I remember my ſelfe, that when I was but of yoong yeeres, I was ſent with another, in embaiſſage to the Proconſul ; and for that my companion ſtaid about (I wot not what behind) I went alone and did that which we had in commiſſion to do together : after my returne, when I was to give an account unto the State, and to report the effect of my charge & meſſage back againe ; my father aroſe, and taking me apart, willed me in no wiſe to ſpeak in the ſingular number, & ſay, I departed or went, but We departed ; Item, not I ſaid, or (quoth I) but We ſaid ; & in the whole recital of the reſt to joine alwaies my companion, as if he had beene aſſociat & at one hand with me in that which I did alone. And verily this is not onely decent, convenient, and civill, but that which more is, it taketh from glorie that which is offensive, to wit envie, which is the cauſe that great captaines attribute and aſcribe their noble acts to fortune and their good angell, as did Timoleon, even he who overthrowed the the Tyrannies eſtabliſhed in Sicilie ; who founded and erected a temple to Good-Fortune. Pytho alſo when he was highly praized and commended at Athens for having ſlain king Corys with his owne hand ; It was God (quoth he) who for to doe the deed uſed my hand. And Theopompus king of the Lacedemonians, when one ſaid unto him that Sparta was ſaved and ſtood upright, for that their kings know how to rule well ; Nay rather (quoth he) becauſe the people know how to obey well : and to ſay a truth, both theſe depend one upon the other ; howbeit, moſt men are of this opinion, and ſo they give out, that the better part of policie or knowledge belonging to civill government lieth in this, to fit men, and frame them meete to be well ruled and commanded ; for in every citie there is alwaies a greater number of ſubjects than rulers, and each one in his turne (eſpecially in a popular ſtate) is governour but a while, and for it, afterwards continueth governed all the reſt of his life, in ſuch ſort, that it is a moſt honeſt and profitable apprenticeship (as it were) to learne ſort to obey thoſe who have authoritie to command, although haply they have meaner parts otherwiſe, and be of leſſe credite and power than our ſelves : for a meer abſurditie it were, that (whereas a principall or excellent actour in a Tragedie, ſuch as Theodorus was of Potus, for hire waiteth oftentimes upon another mercenary plaier who hath not above three words in his part to ſay, and ſpeaketh unto him in all humilitie and reverence, becauſe peradventure he hath the roiall band of a diademe about his head, and a ſcepter in his hand) in the true and unfained actions of our life, and in caſe of policie and government, a rich and mightie perſon ſhould deſpiſe and ſet light by a magiſtrate for that he is a ſimple man otherwiſe, and peradventure poore and of meane eſtate, yea and proceede to wrong, violate and impair the publike dignitie wherein he is placed, yea and to offer violence thereby unto the authoritie of a State ; whereas he ought rather with his owne credite and puiſſance, helpe out the defect and weakeneſſe of ſuch a man, and by his greatneſſe, countenance, his authoritie : for thus in the citie of Lacedemon, the kings were wont to riſe up out of their thrones before the Ephori, and whoſoever els was ſummoned & called by them, came not an ordinary foot-pace, or faire and ſoftly, but running in great haſte, in token of obedience, and to ſhew unto other citizens how obedient they were, taking a great joy and glorie in this, that they honour their magiſtrates, nor as ſome vaine-glorious and ungracious ſots, voide of all civilitie and manners, wanting judgement and diſcretion, who to ſhewe forth their exceeding power upon which they ſtand much and pride themſelves, will not let to offer abuſe unto the judges and wardens of the publike games, combats, and paſtimes, or to give reprochfull termes to thoſe that leade the dance, or ſet out the plaies in the Bacchanale feaſt, yea and mocke captaines, and laught at the preſidents & wardens of the public exerciſes for youth, who have not the wit to know ; That to give honour is oftentimes more honorable than to be honored : for ſurely to an honourable perſon who beareth a great ſway, & carrieth a mightie port with him in a citie, it is a greater ornament & grace to accompany a magiſtrate, and as it were to guard and ſquire him, than if the ſaid magiſtrate ſhould put him before or ſeeme to waite upon him in his traine ; and to ſay a truth, as this were the way to worke him diſpleaſure and procure him envie from the hearts of as manie as ſee it ; ſo the other would win him true glorie which proceedeth of love and benevolence : And verily when ſuch a man is ſcene otherwhiles in the magiſtrates houſe, when he ſaluteth or greeteth him firſt, and either giveth him the upper-hand, or the middle place as they walke together, he addeth an ornament to the dignitie of the citie, and looſeth thereby none of his own. Moreover, it is a popular thing, and that which gaineth the hearts of the multitude, if ſuch a perſon can beare patiently the hard rearmes of a magiſtrates whiles he is in place, and endure his cholerick fits ; for then he may with Diomedes in Homer ſay thus to himſelfe :

How ever now I little do ſay,
It will be mine honor another day.

Or as one ſaid of Demoſthenes ; Well, he is not now Demoſthenes onely, but he is a law-giver, he is a preſident of the ſacred plaies and ſolemne games, and a crowne he hath upon his head, &c. and therefore it is good to put up all now, and to deſerre vengeance untill another time ; for either we ſhall come upon him when he is out of his office, or at leaſt wiſe we ſhall gaine thus much by delay, that choler will be well cooled and allayed by that time.

Moreover, in any government or magiſtracie whatſoever, a good ſubject ought to ſtrive (as it were) a vie with the rulers, eſpecially if they be perſons of good ſort and gracious behaviour, in diligence, care, and fore-caſt for the benefit of the State ; namely, in going to them, to give notice and intelligence of whatſoever is meete to be done, in putting into their hands ſort to be executed that which he hath with mature deliberation rightly reſolved upon, in giving meanes

unto them for to win themselves honour, and that by the benefit of the common-weale: But if such persons they be, as either for feare & false heart, or upon a froward peeuvhnesse & disposition give no care to such motions, and are not willing to put that in execution which is presented unto them; then it is his part himselfe in person to go and declare the same in publicke place to the body of the people, and in no wise to neglect, disanull, or passe with connivence any thing that concerneth the weale-publicke, and never to pretend any colourable excuse, by saying, it appertained unto none other but the head magistrate, thus to deale curiously and be busie occupied in meddling with the affaires of States; for a general law there is which giveth alwaies the first and principall place of rule in a common-wealth unto him who dealeth justly, practiseth righteousnesse, and knoweth what is expedient and profitable, as we may see by the example of Xenophon, who in one place writeth thus of himselfe: There was in the armie (quoth he) one named Xenophon, who was neither Lord General, nor Lieutenant; but for skill and knowledge of that which was to be done, and for resolution to enterprize and execute the same, put himselfe forward and gave charge unto others, wherein he so behaved himselfe that he saved the Greeks. And the most glorious feate of armes that ever Philopomen atchieved was this, that when hee heard newes how king Agis had surprized the citie of Messene, and that the generall of the Achaeans would not go with aide and rescue, but drew backe for feare; he with a troupe of the most forward and resolute gallants, without warrant or commission from the State, delivered the said citie from out of the hands of Agis; which I write not as if I allowed innovations or such newe enterprizes and extraordinary attempts upon every small and light occasion, but onely either in time of need and extremity, as Philopomen did then, or for honest occasions, as Epinonidus, who continued in his Beorarchie fower moneths longer than was ordinary by the lawes of the country, during which time he put on armes, and entred into Laconia, reedified Messene, and peopled it, to the end that if afterwards there should ensue any complaint or imputation, we may answer with credit, and either alledge for excuse, necessity, or set against it the perill to which we exposed our selves, the bravenesse of the exploits, and the service so well performed, to make amends and recompence.

There is reported a sentence of Jason who long since was the Tyrant or Monarch of Sicilie, which he had often in his mouth, and alwaies repeated so often as he did violence or outrages to any of his subjects; that they cannot choose but commit unjustice in final matters, who would do justice in great causes; as if a man would say, that necessarie it is for him to offer wrong in details who mindeth to do right in the grosse. But as touching this sentence, a man may soone perceive at the first sight, that it is a speech meet for him that intendeth to make himselfe an absolute lord, and to usurpe tyrannye. Yet is this rule more civill and politike, that a governour to gratifie the peole, is to passe by small matters, and to winke at them, that hee may in greater things stand against them, and stay them from breaking out to farre. For he that in everie thing will be peering and looking too narrowly without any yielding or relaxation, but is alwaies severe rigorous and inexorable, doth by his example traine and accustom the people likewise to be quarrellsome and contentious with him, yea and to be readie upon all occasions to take offence and discontentment:

*But softly for to strike the faile
Or slacke the helme doth much avail
With violence when billoves great Arise and on the ship do beat.*

and even so a governour ought in some things to yeeld, and not to bee so precise and straight laced himselfe, but to sport as it were and take his pastimes graciously with his people, as namely to celebrate festivall sacrifices, beholde solemne plaies, games, and combats, and to sit in the theaters with them, partly in making semblant as though he neither saw nor heard many things, like as we are wont to doe by the faults at home of our little children; to the end that the authoritie of reproving them roundly, and admonishing them frankly, like unto the vertue of a medicine not dull and enervate with much use, but remaining still in full vigor and strength, may be more effectually, carie the greater credite, touch the quicke indeed, and sting in matters of greater consequence. Alexander the great, when he heard that his sister had bene too familiarly acquainted with a lustie yong gentleman and a beautifull, was nothing displeased therewith, but said; We must give her also a little leave to enjoy somewhat the pleasure and prerogative of a prince; which was neither well done of him to allow such things in her, nor yet with good respect of his owne honour and dignitie; for we ought not to thinke this the fruition, but

40

the ruine and dishonour rather of a princely State. And therefore a wise governour will not permit as much as possibly lieth in him, that the bodie of the people shall doe injurie to any particular inhabitants, as namely in confiscation of other mens goods, or in distribution and parting among themselves the money of the common stocke; but to resist such courtes with all his power, and with remonstrances, perswasions, threats, and menaces withstand the inordinat desires of a multitude: contrarie to the practise of Athen and his followers at Athen, who feeding and fostering such foolish appetites and corrupt humors of the people, caused many drone bees (as Plato saith) to breed in the city, who did no other good butling and pricke one or other. But if the people at any time take occasion by solemnizing some festivall day, according to the custome of the country, or by the honour of some god or goddesse, to let out any goodly shew, play or stately spectacle, or to distribute some small dole, or to exhibit a pleasant gratitie, honest courtesie, or publicke magnificence; lawfull it is and reasonable, that they should in such cases enjoy in some sort the fruit both of their libertie, and also of their wealth and prosperitie. For in the governments of Pericles and Demetrius Phalerens, there bee many examples extant of the like nature; as for Cimon he beautified the market place of Athen with rowes of palme trees, planted directly, and raimed by him, with pleasant walkes and faire allies. And Cato seeing about the time of Caesars conspiracie, that the commons of Rome were in a commotion and hurlyburly by the faction of Julius Caesar; and grown in manner to these reames, for to bring in a change and alteration of the whole State; perswaded the Senate to ordeine, that there should be some pety dole of money given among the poore commoners; which coming in so good and fit a time, appeased the tumult, and repressed the sedition and insurrection that was like to grow. For like as a learned and expert physicion, after hee hath taken away a great quantitie of corrupt blood from his patient, giveth him anon some little nourishment that is good and wholesome; even so a discrete and well advised ruler of a popular State, when he hath put the people by some great matter which tended to their shame and losse, will againe by some light gratitie and pleasure which heis content to graunt, cheere and recomfort them, yea and allay their moode when they bee readie to whine and complaine. And otherwhiles, good policie it is, of purpose to withdraw them from some foolerie, unto which without all sense and reason their minde and affection standeth, to draw and leade them unto other things that be good and profitable; like as Demades his practise was, at what time as he had the receipt of all the revenues of the citie under his hands; for when the people of Athen were fully bent to send forth certaine gallies, for to succour those who had taken armes and rebelled against Alexander the great, and to that effect commaunded him to disburse money for the charges, hee made this speech unto them; My matters, there is money ready for you, for I have provided so, that I purpose to deale among you at this feast of Bacchanalles, that everie one of you may have halfe a Mue of silver now if you list to employ the same money to the setting out of a fleet, you may doe what pleaseth you with your owne, use it, or abuse it at your pleasure, it is all one to mee: by this cunning device, having turned them from the rigging and manning of the armado which they purposed to set out, and all for feare 40 they should lose the benefit of the foresaid dole or largesse which hee promised and pretended, he staied them from offending king Alexander, that he had no cause to finde himselfe grieved with them. Many such fits and humors are the people given unto, both hurtfull and damageable unto them; which it were impossible to breake them of, going directly to worke; but a man must go about with them, & by turnings & windings compasse them to his mindlike as Phoci on did upon a time when the Athenians would have had him in al haste to make a road & invade the country of Boonia; for he caused incontinently proclamation to be made by sound of trumpet; That all citizens from foureene yeeres of age upward unto threecore, should shew themselves in armes and follow him; upon which proclamation, when there arose a great noise and stirre among the elder sort, who began to mutine, for that he would force them at those yeeres 50 to the warres: What a strange matter firs is this (quoth he) I my selfe am fourecore yeeres of age, and you shall have me with you for your captaine. By this meanes a politicke governour may put by and breake the ranke of many unseasonable and needlesse embassages; namely, by joining many of them in commission together, and those whom he seeth to be unfit altogether for such voiaiges; thus may he stay the enterprises of going in hand with many great buildings unnecessary and to no purpose, in commanding them at such times to contribute money thereto out of their owne purses; also hinder the processe of many uncivill and unseasonable, namely, by assigning one and the same time for apparence in court, and for to be employed in sollici- ting ring causes abroad in forren parts: & for to bring these things about, he must draw and associate unto him those principall authors who have drawne out in writing any such bills to be proposed, or have incited the people and put those matters in their heads; and to them he shall intimate those crosse courses abovesaid; for either if they start backe and keepe out of the way, they shall seeme themselves to breake that which they proposed; or if they accept thereof and be present, they shall be sure to take part of the trouble and paines that is imposed upon them. Now when there shall be question of any exploit to be done of great consequence, and tending much to the good of the State, which requireth no small travell, industrie, and diligence; then have a speciall regard and endeavour, I advise you, to chuse those friends of yours who are of most sufficiency, and of greatest authoritie, and those among the rest which are of the mildest and best nature; for such you may be sure will crosse you least, and assist you most; so long as they have wit at will, and be withall void of jealousie and contention. And heerein it behooveth a man to know wel his owne nature, and finding that whereunto he is lesse apt than an other, to chuse for his adjuncts those rather who he perceiveth to be better able to go through with the businesse in hand, than such as otherwise be like unto himselfe: for so Diomedes being deputed to go in despite all for to view the campe of the enemies, chose for his companion the warriest & best advised person of all the Greeks, & let passe the most valiant souldiours. By this means all actions shall be counterpoised best, & lesse jealousie and emulation will grow betweene them who are desirous to have their good parts & valor seeme indifferent in vertues & qualities. If you have a cause to plead, or be to go in embassages, chuse for your companion & assistant (if you find your selfe not meet to speak) some man that is eloquent, like as Pelopidas in the like case chose Eparinondas. If you thinke your selfe unmeet to entertaine the common people with courtesie & affability, and of too high and loftie a minde for to debase your selfe and make court unto them, as Callistratus the captaine of the Lacedemonians was; take one unto you who is gracious, and can skill to court it and give entertainment. If your bodie be weake or feeble, and not able to endure much paines; have one with you who hath a stronger bodie, and who can away with travell, as Nicias did Lamachus. For this is the reason that Geryones was so wonderfull, because that having many legs, many armes, and many eyes, yet hee with all them was ruled and governed by one soule. But wise governors if they accord and agree well, may conferre and lay together not onely their bodies and goods, but also their fortunes, their credits and their vertues, and make use of them all in one affaire, in such sort that they shall compasse and execute fully whatsoever they enterpryse, much better than any other whatsoever: and not as the Argonauts did, who after they had left Hercules, were constrained to have recourse unto the charmes, forceries and enchantments of women for to save themselves, and to steale away the golden fleece.

Certaine temples there be, into which whosoever did enter, must leave without doores all the gold that they had about them; and as for iron they might not presume to goe withall into any one whatsoever. Considering therefore that the tribunall and judicall seat of justice is the temple of Jupiter, surnamed the Counsellor and Patron of cities, of Themis also and Dice, that is to say, equitie and justice; before ever thou set foot to mount up into it, presently rid and cleere thy soule of all avarice and covetousnesse of monie, as if it were iron, and a very maladie full of rust, and throw it farre from thee into the merchants hall, into the shops of tradesmen, occupiers, banquiers and usurers:

Thun it I say as far off as you can, & make this reckoning, that whosoever enricheth himselfe by the managing of the common-weale, is a church-rober, committing sacrilege in the highest degree, robbing temples, stealing out of the sepulchers of the dead, picking the coffers of his friends: making himselfe rich by treachery, treason, & false-wittnes: thinke him to be an untruly and faithlesse counsellor, a perjured judge, a corrupt magistrate, and full of bribery; in one word polluted and defiled with all wickednesse, and not cleere of any sinne whatsoever that may be committed; and therefore I shall not neede to speake more of this point.

As for ambition, although it carrie with it a fairer shewe than avarice, yet nevertheless it bringeth after it a traine of mischiefs and plagues, no lesse dangerous and pernicious unto the government of a common-wealth: for accompanied it is ordinarily with audacious rashnesse more than it; inasmuch as it useth not to breed in base mindes, or in natures feeble and idle, but principally in valiant, active, and vigorous spirits; and the voice of the people, who by their praises lift up many times and drive it forward, maketh the violence thereof more hard to be restrained, managed, and ruled. Like as therefore Plato writeth, that we ought to accustom young boies boies even from their verie infancie to have this sentence resounding in their eares: That it is not lawfull for them neither to carrie gold about their bodies as an outward ornament, nor so much as to have it in their purses, for that they have other golde as a proper cosier of their owne, and the same incorporate in their hearts: giving us to understand by these enigmaticall and covert speeches (as I take it) the vertue derived from their aunccestors, by descent and continuation of their race; even so wee may in some sort cure and remedie this desire of glorie, by making remonstrance unto ambitious spirits, that they have in themselves gold, that cannot corrupt, bee wasted or contaminated by envie, no nor by Atimus himselfe the reproover of the gods, to wit Honour, the which we alwaies encrease and augment, the more we discourse, consider, meditate, and thinke upon those things which have bene performed & accomplished by us in the government of the common-weale: and therefore they have no need of those other honours, which are either cast in moldes by founders, or cut and graven in brasle by mans hand, considering that all such glorie cometh from without forth, and is rather in others than in them, for whom they were made. For the statue of a trumpeter which Polydorus made, as also that other of an halbarder are commended in regard of the maker, and not of those whom they do represent, and for whose sake they were made. Certes, Cato at what time as the citie of Rome began to be well replenished with images and statues, would not suffer any one to be made for himselfe saying: That he had rather men would aske, why there was no image set up for him, than why it was? For surely such things bring envie, and the common people thinke themselves indebted still & beholden unto those, upon whom they have not bestowed such vanities: and contrariwise, such as receive them at their hands are odious & troublesome unto them, as if they had fought to have the publike affaires of the State in their hands, in hope to receive such a reward and salarie from them againe. Like as therefore he that hath sailed without danger along the gulfe Syrus, if afterwards hee chauce to be cast away and drowned in the mouth of the haven, hath done no such doughty deed, nor performed any speciall matter of praise in his voyage and navigation; even so, hee that hath escaped the common Treasure, and done well enough and saved himselfe, from the publike revenewes, customes, and commodities of the State; that is to say, hath not defiled his hands, either with robbing the citie-money, or dealt underhand with the farmers and undertakers of the cities hands, revenewes, &c. and then shall suffer himselfe to be overtaken and surpris'd with a desire to be a president and sit highest, or to be the head man and chiefe in counsell of a citie, is runne in deed upon an high rocke that reacheth up a loft, but drenched hee is over the eares, and as like to sinke as the rest, nevertheless. In best case he is therefore, who neither seeketh nor desireth any of these honours, but rejecteth and refuseth them altogether. Howbeit, if peradventure it be no easie matter to put backe a grace and favour, or some token of love, that the people otherwise desire to shew unto them who are entred into combat, as it were in the field of government, not in a game and maisterie for a silver prize, or for rich presents, but in the game in deed which is holy and sacred, yea and woorthie to be crowned, it may suffice and content a man to have some honourable inscription or title, in a tablet, some publike act or decree, some branch of lawrell or the olive: like as Epymenides who received one branch of the sacred olive, growing in the castle of Athens, because he had cleansed and purified the citie: and Anaxagoras refusing all other honours which the people would have ordained for him, demanded onely, that upon the day of his death the children might have leave to play, and not go to schoole all that day long. The seven gallant Gentlemen of Perfia, who killed the Tyrants, called Magi, were honoured onely with this priviledge, that both they and their posteritie might wear the Perlian pointed Cap or * Turbant, bending forward on their heads: for this was the signall which they were agreed upon among themselves when they went to execute the said enterprise. Likewise the honor which Pittacus received, did shew some modesty & civilitie: for when his citizens had permitted & granted unto him to have and enjoy of those lands which he had conquered from the enemy, as much as he would himselfe; he stood contented with so much, & no more as lay within one sling or shot of the javelin which he launced himselfe. And Cicilius the Roman tooke so much ground onely as he in his owne person could care with a plow in one day, being as he was a lame and maimed man. For a civill honour ought not to be in the nature of a salarie for a vertuous act performed, but a token rather and a memoriall that the remembrance thereof might continue long, as theirs did whom erewhiles we named: whereas in those three hundred statues of Demetrius Phalerem, there gathered not so much as rust, canker, or any ordure or filth whatsoever, but were all of them ere himselfe died, pulled downe and broken.

And as for the images of Demades, melted they were everie one, and of the mettall were made pispots and basins for clofe stooles: yea and many such honours have beene defaced, as being displeafant and odious to the world, not in regard onely of the wickednesse of the receiver, but also of the greatnesse and richnesse of the thing given and received: and therefore the goodliest and surest safeguard of honour, that it may endure and last longest, is, the least costlinesse and price bestowed thereupon: for such as bee excessive massie and immeasurall in greatnesse, may bee well compared unto huge colosses or statues not well ballaied and counterpoised, nor proportionably made, which soone fall downe to the ground of themselves. And here in this place I call Honors, these exterior things which the common people (so far forth as becometh them, according to the saying of Empedocles) so call. Howbeit I also affirme as well as others, that a wise governor & man of State ought not to despise true honor which consisteth in the benevolence & good affection of those who have in remembrance the services and benefits that they have received: neither ought he altogether to contemne glorie, as one who forbore to please his neighbours among who he liveth, as Democritus would have him: for neither ought horse-keepers or esquierries of the stable, reject the affection of their horses lovingly making toward them; nor hunters the fawning of their hounds & spaniels; but rather seeke to win & keepe the fame, for that it is both a profitable, and also a pleasant thing, to be able for to imprint in those creatures who are familiar, & do live & converse with us such an affectiō to us as Lyfsmachus his dog loved toward his master; & which the poet Homer reporteth that Achilles horses shewed to Patroclus. For mine own part I am of this mind, that Bees would be better entreated & escape better, so in case they would make much of those, & suffer them gently to come toward them, who norish them and have the care and charge of them, rather than to sting and provoke them to anger as they do; whereas now, men are driven to punish them and chase them away with smokes: also to breake and tame their frampold and unruly horses with hard bits and bridles, yea and curst dogs which are given to run away, they are faine to lead perforce in collars, or tie up and hamper with clogs. But verily there is nothing in the world that maketh one man willingly obedient and subject to another, more than the affiance that he hath in him for the love which he beareth, and the opinion conceived of his goodnesse, honestie and justice; which is the reason that Demosthenes said verie well: That free cities have no better meanes to keepe and preserve themselves from tyrants, than to distrust them; for that part of the soule whereby we believe, is it, which is most easie to be taken captive. Like as therefore the gift of prophesie which Cassandra had, stood her country-men and fellow-citizens in no stead, because they would never give credit or beleefe unto her: for thus the speaketh of her selfe,

*God would not have my voice propheticall
When I foretell of things, for ake effect,
Nor do my country any good at all:
Or why? alwaies they do my words reject,
In their distresse and woes, they would correct
Their folly past, then am I wise and sage:
Before it come, they say I do but rage.*

even so, on the other side, the trust and confidence that the citizens reposed in Crebryas, the good will and benevolence which they bare unto Battus, served them in right good stead: for that they used and followed their counsell, by reason of the good opinion which they conceived of them.

This is then the first and principall good which lieth in the reputation of State-men, and those who are in government, namely, the trust and confidence which is in them; for it maketh an overture, and openeth the doore to the enterprife and execution of all good actions. The second, is the love and affection of the people, which to good governours is to them a buckler and armor of defence against envious and wicked persons:

*Much like unto a mother kind who keeps away the flies
From tender babe whilst sweetly it asleepe in cradellies.*

putting backe envie that might arise against them; and in regard of might and credit, making equall a man meanly borne & of base parentage, with those who are nobly defended, the poore with the rich, & the private person with the magistrates: and to be briefe, when vertue & verity are joined together with this popular benevolence, it is as mightie as a strong and stee dy gale of a forewind at the poore, and driveth men forward to the managing and effecting of all publicke affaires whatsoever. Consider now and see what contrarie effects the disposition of peoples hearts, doth produce and bring forth by these examples following. For even they of Itale when they had in their hands the wife and children of Demys the Tyrant, after they had villainously abused, and shamefully forced their bodies, did them to death, and when they had burnt them to ashes, threw and scattered the fame out of a ship into the sea. Whereas one Menander who reigned graciously over the Bactrians, in the end, when he had lost his life in the warres was honorably entreated: for the cities under his obeisance joined altogether, and by a common accord solemnized his funerals and obsequies with great mourning and lamentation; but as touching the place where his reliques should be bestowed, they grew into a great strife and contention one with another, which at the last with much ado was pacified upon this condition and composition, that his ashes should be parted and divided equally among them all, and that every citie should have one sepulcher and monument of him by it selfe. Again, the Aggrigentines after they were delivered from the Tyrant Phalaris, enacted an ordinance: That from thence forth, it should not be lawfull for any person whatsoever to wear a robe of blew colour, for that the Guard & Pensioners attending about the said Tyrant, had blew callockes for their liveries: But the Perfians tooke such a love to their Prince Cyrus, that because he was hauck-nosed, they ever after and even to this day, affect those who have such noses, and take them to be best favoured. And verily of all loves, this is the most divine, holy and puissant, which cities and States do beare unto a man for his vertue: as for other honors so falsely called, and bearing no true enignes in deed to testifie love, which the people bestow upon them, who have builded theaters and shew-places, given them largesses, congrais and other doles, or exhibited combats of Sword-fencers at the sharpe: these wrong entituled honors do resemble the glosing flatteries of harlots and strumpets, who smile upon their lovers, so long onely as they give them any thing or gratifie them in any pleasure; and such a glorie as this lasteth not long, but after a day or two passeth away and is gone.

He whosoever he was, that said first: That he who began to give money by way of largesse unto the people, taught the verie high way to overthrow a popular state, knew verie well, that the people lose their authoritie, when they make themselves subject and inferior by taking such gifts: and even they also who are the givers must know thus much: That they overthrow themselves in buying their reputation so costily & at so high a price: & by that means they make the multitude more haughtie and arrogant, because thereby the people do presume, that it is in their power to give or take away so great a thing. I write not this, as though I would have a man of estate in his lawfull expenses and allowable liberalities, to shew himselfe too nere and mechanicall, especially when his State will beare and maintaine the fame: for that, in truth, the people carrie a greater hatred to a rich man, who will not part with any of his goods among them, than a poore man who robbeth the common chest: for they suppose the one to proceed from pride and contempt of them, and the other from meere need and necessitie. I would wish therefore that first and principally these largesses should come by way of gratuitie and for nothing, for that in such a fort, they make the authors thereof better esteemed and admired, and besides they binde and oblige the receivers so much the more. Secondly, I would that they were done upon a good, honest, and laudable occasion, as namely for the honour of some god; a thing that draweth on the people more and more to devotion and religion, because withall, it imprinteth in the hearts of the people a vehement opinion and strong apprehension that the majestie of the gods, must needs be a great and venerable thing, when they see those who honor them, and whom they repute for so woorthie and noble personages, so affectionate unto them, as for their service and worship to be at such cost and spend so liberally. Like as therefore Plato forbade young men who went to the Musicke schoole, that they should not learne either the Lydian & Phrygian harmony; for that the one stirred up in their hearts all lamentable, dolefull, and dumpish affections, the other increased the inclination to pleasure, riot, and voluptuous sensuality; even so, as touching these largesses and publicke expenses, banish and chase out of your citie as much as you can, those which provoke in their hearts beastly, barbarous, and bloody affections, or such as feed loosenesse and scurrilie: or if you be not able to rid them out cleane, yet do your endeavour at least wise to hold off and contest against the people, to your uttermost power, who call upon you for such spectacles; & order the matter so alwaies, that the subject matter of your dispenfe may be honest and chaste, the end and intention good and necessarie, or at least wise that the pleasure and mirth be without wrong and hurt to any person. But if peradventure ture your State be but meane, and that the center & circumference of your goods containe and comprehend no more than to serve and supply necessities, know well this: that it argueth neither a base mind nor an illiberal & ungentlemanlike heart to be known of your poverty, and so to give place unto other, who have wherewith to defray such ambitious expences & liberalities, and in by endebting & engaging your selfe in the usurers books, to be a spectacle both to be pitied & laughed at, for such publike miniftries: forasmuch as they whofoever they be that so do, cannot go to worke so secretly, but it will be thought and known how they enterprize above their abilitie, be driven to trouble and make bolde with their friends in borrowing of them, or els to flatter and court usurers to take up money at interest, in such sort as that they shall win no honour and credit, but rather shame and contempt by such expences; in which regard, good it is to were in these cases to set alwaies before your eyes the examples of Lamachus and Phocion. For Phocion one day when the Athenians at a solemne sacrifice called instantly upon him to contribute some money toward the charges: I would be ashamed (quoth he) to give you any thing, and in the meane while not be able to keepe my credit, and paie that I owe to this man here, and withall he pointed unto Callicles the usurer unto whom he was then indebted. As for Lamachus in his accounts of charges whiles he was lord generall of an armie under the Athenians in any expedition, put in alwaies, Thus much for a paire of shoes or pantofles for himselfe; Item, so much for a garment. The Theffalians ordeined and allowed unto Hermion who refused to be their captaine generall, because he was poore, a flagon or little runlet of wine monethly, and a measure or bulhell and halfe of meale every fower daies: whereby you see it is no shame for a man to confesse his povertie; neither have poore men lesse meanes to winne credit and authoritie in the government of cities, than they who lay out and spend much in making feasts or exhibiting publike shewes and spectacles, for to gaine the good will and favour of the people; provided alwaies, that by their vertue they have gotten reputation and libertie to speake their mindes frankly and freely unto them. And therefore a good governour ought wisely to master and rule himselfe in these cases; he must not (I say) enter into the plaine and champion ground on foote for to encounter with horsemen; nor being poore, to be seene in the race and shew-place for to set out games, or upon the scaffold & theater to represent plaies, or in great hals full set with tables to make feasts, and all to contend with rich men about glorie and magnificence; but he is to studie how to manage the people by vertue, by gentleness, by so wit and understanding joynded studies with wife words, wherein there is not onely honestie and a venerable port, but also a kinde of grace more amiable, attractive, and desireable,

*Than Cræsus coine of silver and gold,
Or all the money that can be told.*

For to a good man it is not necessarie to have a furlie, coy, and presumptuous looke; neither is it required that a wife and sober person should carie a sterne and rigorous countenance,

*Who as he walks along the streets,
In citie or in towne,*

*Doth cast a sharpe and hideous eie,
And on his neighbours frowne.*

But contrariwise, a good man is first and foremost affable and lightsome of language, of easie access, and ready to be spoken withall whofoever comes, having his house open alwaies, (as it were) an haven or harbour of refuge, to as many as have occasion to use him. Neither is this debonairity and care of his, seene onely in the businesse and affaires of such as employ him, but also in this; that he will as well rejoyce with them who have had any fortunate and happie successe, as condole & greeve with those unto whom there is befallen any calamitie or misfortune; never will he be knownen to be troublesome, and looke for double diligence of a number of servitors and vassals to waite upon him to the baines or stoupes; nor to keepe a stir for taking up and keeping of places for him and his traine at the theaters where plaies and pastimes are to be seene, ne yet desire to be conspicuous and of great marke above others in any outward signes of excessive delights and sumptuous superfluities; but shew himselfe to be equall, like and suitable to others in apparell, in his fare and furniture at the table, in the education and nouriture of his children, in the keeping of his wife for her state and array, and in one word, be willing to carrie and demean himselfe in all things, as an ordinary and plaine citizen, bearing no greater port and shew than others of the common multitude; moreover, at hand to give advice and counsell friendly to every man in his affaires, ready to enterteine, defend, & follow their causes as an advocate, freely, and without taking fee or any consideration whatsoever; to reconcile man and wife when they be at odds, to make love-daies and peace betwene friends, not spending one little peece of the day for a shew at the tribunal seat, or in the hall of audience for the commonwealth, and then afterwards all the day & the rest of his life, drawing unto himselfe all dealings, all negotiations and affaires from everie side for his owne particular behoofe and profit, like unto the north-east winde Cacias, which evermore gathereth the clouds unto it; but continually bending his minde and occupying his head in carefull studie for the weale publike, and in effect making it appeere unto the world, that the life of a Statef-man and a governor, is not as the common sort thinke it, easie and idle, but a continuall action and publike function: by which fashions and semblable courses that he taketh, he gaineth and winneth unto him the hearts of the people, who in the end come to know, that all the flattering devices and enticements of others be nothing else but false baits and baftard allurements, in comparifon of his prudence and carefull diligence. The flatterers about Demetrius vouchsafed not to call any other princes and potentates of his time, Kings, but would have Seleucus to be named the Commander of the elephants; Lysimachus the keeper of the treasure; Ptolomæus the admirall of the sea; and Agathocles the governour of the islands. But the people although peradventure at the first they reject a good wife and sage person among them; yet in the end after they have seene his truth, and knownen his disposition and kinde nature, they will repute him onely to bee popular, politike, and worthie to be a magistrate indeed, and as for the rest, they will both repute and call one, the warden and setter out of the plaies; another the great feaster; and a third, the president of games, combats, and publike exercises. Moreover, like as at the feasts and bankets that Callias or Alcibiades were at the cost to make, none but Socrates was heard to speake, and all mens eyes were cast upon Socrates; even so in cities and States governed aright, well may Ismerias deale largesses; Lichas make feasts, and Niceratus defray the charges of plaies, but Epinomondas, Aristides, Lysander, and such as they, are those which beare the magistracie, they governe at home, they command and conduct armies abroad. Which being well and duly considered, there is no cause why you should be discouraged or dismayd at the reputation and credit that they win among the people, who have for them builded theaters, and erected shew-places, founded halles of great receipt, and purchased for them common places of sepulture, for to burie their dead: all which glorie lasteth but a while, neither hath it any great matter, or venerable substance in it, so but vanishesth away like smoke, and is gone even as soone as either the plaies in such theaters, or games in shew-places are done and ended.

They that have skill and experience of keeping and feeding bees, doe hold opinion and saie, that those hives wherein the bees yeeld the biggest found, make most humming and greatest stir within, like best, are most found, healthfull, and yeeld most store of home: but he upon whom God hath laid the charge and care of the reasonable swarme (as I may say) and civill societie of men, will judge the happinesse and blessed state thereof most of all by the quietnesse and peace therein, and in all other things he will approve the ordinances and statutes of Solon, endeavoring to follow and observe the same to his full power; but doubt hee will and marvell what hee should meane by this, when he writeth, that he who in a civill sedition would not range himselfe to a side, and take part with one or other faction, was to bee noted with infamie: for in a naturall bodie that is sicke, the beginning of change toward the recoverie of health, cometh not from the diseased parts, but rather, when the temperature of the found and healthie members is so puissant, that it chafeth and expelleth that which in the rest of the bodie was unkind & contrary to nature; even so in a citie or State where the people are up in a tumult & sedition, so it be not dangerous and mortall, but such as is like to be appeased and ended, there had need to be a farre greater part of those who are found and not infected, for to remaine and cohabit still; for to it there cometh and hath recourse that which is natural and familiar, from the wife and discreet within, and the same entrench into the other infected part and cureth it: but such cities as be in an univerfall uprore and hurly-burly, utterly perish and come to confusion, if they have not some constraint from without, and a chastisement which may force them to be wife and agree among themselves. Neither is my meaning, that I would have you a politike person and Statef-man in such a sedition and civill discorde to sit still, insensible and without any passion or feeling of the publike calamitie, to sing and chaunt your owne repose and tranquillitie of blessed and happie life, and whiles others be together by the eares, rejoyce at their follie; for at such a time especially you are to put on the buskin of Theramenes, which served as well the one legge as the other; then are you to parley and common with both parties, without joyning your selfe to one more than to the other; by which meanes, neither you shall be thought an adversarie, rie,

rie, because you are not ready to offend either part, but indifferent to both, in aiding as well the one as the other, and envie shall you incur none, as bearing part in their miserie, in case you seeme to have a fellow-feeling and compassion equally with them all: but the best way were to provide and foresaith, that they never breake out to tearmes of open sedition; and this you are to thinke for to be the principall point, and the height of all policie and civill government; for evident it is, and you may easily see, that (of those greatest blessings which cities can desire, to wit, peace, libertie, and freedome, plentie and fertilitie, multitude of people, and unitie and concord) as touching peace, cities have no great need in these daies of wise governors, for to procure or mainteine the same, for that all wars both against the Greekes and also the Barbarians are chased away and gone out of sight; as for libertie, the people hath as much as it pleaseth their sovereigns and princes to give them, and peradventure if they had more it would be woofe for them; for the fertilitie of the earth, and the abundance of all fruits, the kind disposition and temperature of all seasons of the yeere,

*That mother in due time their babes
into the world may beare, Resembling in all points their fires,
to wit, their fathers deare.*

and that children so borne may live and be live-like, every good and wise man, will crave at Gods hands in the behalfe of his owne fellow citizens. Now there remaineth for a States-man and politike governour, of all those works proposed one onely, and that is nothing inferiour to the rest of the blessings above-named, to wit, the unitie and concord of citizens that alwaies dwell together, and the banishing out of a cite of all quarrels, all jarres and malice, as the manner is in composing the differences and debates of friends; namely, by dealing first with those parties which seeme to be most offended, and to have taken the greatest wrong, in seeming to be injured as well as they, and to have no lesse cause of displeasure and discontent than they; afterwards by little and little to seeke for to pacifie and appease them, by declaring and giving them to understand, that they who can be content to strike faile a little, do ordinarily go beyond those who thinke to gaine all by force; surmount them I say not onely in mildenesse and good nature, but also in courage and magnanimitie, who in yielding and giving place a little in small matters, are masters in the end and conquerors in the best and greatest; which done, his part is to make remonstrance both particularly to every one, and generally to them all, declaring unto them the feeble and weake estate of Greece, and that it is very expedient for men of sound and good judgment to enjoy the fruit and benefit which they may have in this weakenesse and imbecillitie of theirs, living in peace and concord one with another as they doe; considering that fortune hath not left them in the midst any prize to winne or to strive for. For what glorie, what authoritie, what power or preeminence will remaine unto them that haply should have the better hand in the end, &c. be masters over their adversaries, but a proconsull with one commandement of his will be able to overthrow it, and transport it unto the other side, as often and whensoever it pleaseth him; but say that it should continue stil, yet is it not worth all this labour and travell about it. But like as leare-fires many times begin not at stately temples and publike edifices, but 40 they may come by some candle in a private and little house, which was neglected or not well looked unto, and so fell downe and tooke hold thereof, or haply straw or rushes and such like stuffe might catch fire and suddenly flame, and so thereupon might ensue much losse, and a publike wasting of many faire buildings; even so it is not alwaies by meanes of contention and variance about affaires of State, that seditions in cities be kindled, but many times braules and riots arising upon particular causes, and so proceeding to a publike tumult and quarrell, have beene the overthrow and utter subversion of a whole cite. In regard whereof, it pertaineth unto a politike man, as much as any one thing els, to foresee and prevent, or else to remedy the same, to see (I say) that such diffinitions do not arise at all, or if they be on foot to keep them down from growing farther and taking head, or at leastwise that they touch not the State, but rest still among whom it began: considering this with himselfe & giving others to understand, that private debates are in the end causes of publike, and small of great, when they be neglected at first, and no convenient remedies used at the verie beginning. Like as by report the greatest civill diffention that ever hapned in the cite of Delphos, arose by the meanes of one Crates, whose daughter Orgilus the sonne of Phalus was at the point to wed: now it hapned by meere chance that the cup, out of which they were to make an essay or effusion of wine in the honour of the gods first, and then afterwards to drinke one to another, according to the nuptiall ceremonies

of

of that place, broke into peeces of it selfe, which Orgilus taking to be an evill presage, forsooke his espoused bride, and went away with his father, without finishing the complements of marriage. Some few daies after, when they were sacrificing to the gods; Crates conveyed covertly or underhand a certaine vessell of gold, one of those which were sacred and dedicated to the temple, unto them, and so made no more ado, but caused Orgilus and his brother, as manifest church-robbers, to be pitched downe headlong from the top of the rocke at Delphos, without any judgement or forme and processe of law: yea and more than that, killed some of their kinsfolke and friends, notwithstanding they entreated hard, and pleaded the liberties and immunities of Minervæ temple, surnamed Provident, into which they were fled and there tooke sanctuary. And thus after divers such murders committed, the Delphians in the end put Crates to death 10 and those his complices, who were the authors of this sedition, and of the money and goods of these excommunicate persons (for so they were called) seized upon by way of confiscation, they built those chapples which stand beneath the cite. At Syracuse also, of two yong men who were verie familiarly acquainted together, the one being to travell abroad out of his countrey, left in the custodie of the other a concubine that he had, to keepe until his returne home againe; but he in the absence of his friend abused her bodie: but when his companion upon his returne home knew thereof, he wrought so, that for to crie quittance with him he lay with his wife and made him cuckold: this matter came to hearing at the counsell table of the cite, and one of the ancient Senatours mooved the rest, that both twaine should be banished out of the 20 cite, before there arose further mischief, and left the cite by occasion of their deadly feud should be filled with parts taking of both sides, and so be in danger of utter destruction; which when he could not perswade and bring to passe, the people grew into an open sedition, and after many miserable calamities, ruinated and overthrew a most excellent State & government. You have heard I am sure of domesticall examples, and namely the enmitie of Pericles and Tyrannus, who went within a verie little of overthrowing the cite of Sardis, and upon small and private causes, had brought the same into civill war and open rebellion by their factions and particular quarrels. And therefore a man of government ought alwaies to be watchfull and vigilant, and not to neglect, no more than in a bodie naturall the beginnings of maladies, all little heart-burnings and offences that quickly passe from one to another, but to stay their course, and remedy the same with all convenient speed. For by a heedfull eye and careful prevention, as Cato saith, that which was at first great, becommeth small, and that which was small cometh to nothing. Now to induce and perswade other men so to doe, there is not a more artificiall device, nor a better meanes, than for a man of government to shew himselfe exorable, inclined to pardon, & easie to be reconciled in like cases; in principal matters of weight & greatest importance resolute and constant without any rankor or malice, and in none at all seeme to be selfe-willed, peevish, contentious, cholerike, or subject to any other passion which may breed a sharpnesse and bitternesse in necessarie controversies, and doubtfull cases which can not be avoided. For in those combats at buffets which champions performe for pleasure in manner of foiles; the manner is to binde about their fitts certaine round muffles like bals, to the end that when they 40 come to coping and to let drive one at another, they might take no harme, considering the knocks and thumps that they give are so soft, and can not put them to any paine to speake of; even so in the sutes, processe and trials of law which passe betwene citizens of the same cite, the best way is to argue and plead by laying downe their allegations and reasons, simply and purely, and not to sharpen or envenime their matters like darts and arrowes, with poisoned taunts, railing tearmes, opprobrious speeches and spightfull threats, and so to make deepe wounds, and the same festured with venom, whereby the controversies may grow incurable, and augment still in such sort, that in the end they touch the State. He that can so cary himselfe in his owne affaires, as to avoid these foresaid mischiefs and dangers, shall be able to compass others in the like, and make them willing to be ruled by reason: so that afterwards, when once the particular occasions of priue grudges be taken away, the quarrels and discords which touch a common-wealth, are sooner pacified and composed, neither doe they ever bring any inconveniences hard to be cured or remediless.

The Summarie.

His title of this discourse discovereth sufficiently the intention of the Author: but, for that they who manage affaires of State, and namely men in yeeres, fall oftentimes into one of these two extremities as touching their duetie, namely, that they be either too slacke and remisse, or else more stiffe and severe than they ought; these precepts of 20 Plutarch, a man well conversed in high places and offices, and who (as we may gather by his words) was well stricken in age when he wrote this Treatise, ought to be diligently read, considered and practised by men of authoritie. And albeit this booke containeth some advertisements in that behalfe, which sort not wholly with the order of government put in practise in these our daies: yet so it is, that the fundamentall reasons are so well laid, that any politician or States-man building thereupon, may assure himselfe that he shall raise & edifie some good piece of worke. Now he beginneth with the refutation of one common objection of certaine men, who enioyne & command elder folke to sit still and remane quiet, and he prooveth the contrarie, namely, that then it is meet that they should put themselves forth more than ever before; but he addeth this correction and caveat withall, that they have beene a long time already broken (as it were) to the world, and beaten in publick affaires, to 30 the end that they be not taxed and noted for their slender carriage or light vanitie, nor proove the cause of some great mischiefe, meddling as they do in that which they had not wel comprehended before. After this he proposeth and laith abroad the examples of men well qualified, who have given good proofe of their sufficientie in old age: whereupon he inferreth, that those be the persons indeed unto whom government doth appertaine, and that to go about for to make such idle now in their latter daies, were as absurd and as much injurie offered unto them, as to confine a prudent Prince and wise King to some house in the country: and this he inforceth and verifieth by eloquent comparisons, and by the example of Pompeius. Which done he setteth downe the causes which ought to put forward, and move a man well spent in yeeres to the government of a common-weale, confuting those who are of the contrarie opinion, and proving that elderly persons are more fit therefore than younger, be- 40 cause of the experience and authoritie that age doth afford them, as also in regard of many other reasons: then he returneth the objection upon them, and sheweth that young folke are unmeet for publick charges, unless they have beene the disciples of the aged, or be directed and guided by them: he refuteth those also who esteeme that such a vocation resembleth some particular trafficke or negotiation: and when he hath so done, he taketh in hand againe his principall point, detecting and laying open the folly of those who would bereave old men of all administration of publick matters: and then he exhorteth them to take heart and shunne idleness (which he doth diffame wonderfully) and setteth before their eyes their duetie, which he also considereth in particular: then he adviseth them not to take so much upon them; not to accept any charge unworthie, or not befitting that gravitie which time and age hath given them, but to occupie and busie themselves with that which is hono- 50 rable and of great consequence; to endeavour and strive for to serve their countrie, and above all matters of importance; to use good discretion as well in the refusal as the acceptance of dignities and offices, carrying themselves with such dexterity among young men that they may induce & set them into the way of vertue. And for a conclusion, he teacheth all persons who deale in State affaires what resolution they should put on and carry this; that they have an assured testimony in themselves, that they be affectionate servitors of the common-weale.

WHETHER

WHETHER AN AGED MAN ought to manage publick affaires.

E are not ignorant of Euphanes: that you are wont highly to praise the poet Pindarus, and how you have oftentimes in your mouth these words of his, as being in your conceit well placed and pithily spoken to the point,

*When games of price and combats once are set,
Who shrinketh back and doth pretend some let,
In darknesse hides and deepe obscuritie
His fame of vertue and activitie.*

But forasmuch as men ordinarily alledge many causes and pretences, for to colour and cover their sloth & want of courage to undertake the businesse and affaires of State, & among others, as the very last, and as one would say, that which is of the sacred line & race, they tender unto us old age, & suppose they have found now one sufficient argument to dull or turne backe the edge, and to coole the heat of seeking honor thereby, in bearing us in hand & saying: That there is a certain convenient & meet end limited, not only to the revolution of 20 on of yeeres, proper for combats and games of prooffe, but also for publick affaires and dealings in State. I thought it would not be impertinent nor besides the purpose, if I should send and communicate unto you a discourse which sometimes I made privately for mine owne use, as touching the government of common-weale managed by men of yeeres; to the end that neither of us twaine should abandon that long pilgrimage in this world which we have continued in travelling together, even to this present day, nor reject that civill life of ours, which hitherto we have led in lwaying of the common-weale, no more than a man would cast off an old companion of his owne age, or change an ancient familiar friend, for another with whom he hath had no acquaintance, & who hath not time sufficient to converse & be made familiar with him. But let us in Gods name remaine firme & constant in that course of life which we have chosen 30 from the beginning, & make the end of life & of well living all one and the same, if we will not (for that small while which we have to live) discredit, & diffame that longer time which we have already led, as if it had bin spent foolishly and in vaine, without any good & laudable intention. For tyrannicall dominion, is not a faire monument to be entered in, as one said sometime to Dionysius the tyrant: for unto him this monarchicall & absolute sovereignty gotten & held by so unjust & wicked means, the longer that it had continued before it failed, the greater & more perfect calamitie it would have brought; according as Diogenes afterwards seeing the said Dionysius his son become a poore privat man, & deposed from the princely & tyrannicall dignity which he had: O Dionysius (quoth he) how unworthy art thou of this estate, & how unfitting is it for thee! for thou oughtest not to live here in liberty, & without any feare or doubt of any thing with us, 40 but remaine there still as thy father did, immured up & confined (as it were) within a forresse all thy life time, until extreme old age came. But in truth, a popular government which is just and lawfull, wherein a man hath beene conversant and shewed himselfe alwaies no lesse profitable to the common-wealth, in obeying than in commanding, is a faire sepulcher for him, to be buried honorably therein, and to bestow in his death the glorie of his life: for this is the last thing (as Simonides said) that descendeth and goeth under the earth; unless we speake of them whose honour, bountie and vertue dieth first, and in whom the zeale of performing their duetie doth faile and cease before that the covetous desire of things necessarie to this life giveth over: as if the divine parts of our soule, & those which direct our actions were more fraile, & died sooner than the sensual & corporal; which neither were honestie to say, nor good to beleeve, no more 50 than to give credit unto those who affirme that in getting and gaining onely, we are never weary: but rather we are to bring that saying of Thucydides to a better purpose, & not to beleeve him who was of minde that not ambition alone and desire of glorie, aged in a man but also (and that much rather) focalitie or willingness to live & converse with company, & civility or affection to policy & managing of publick affaires; a thing that doth persevere & continue alwaies to the very end, even in ants and bees: for never was it knowne that a bee with age became a drone; as some there be who would have those who all their life time were employed in the State, after the vigor & strength of their age is past to sit still & keepe the house, doing nothing els but eat & feed

as

as if they were mued up, suffering their active vertue, through ease and idlenesse to be quenched & matted, even like as iron is eaten and consumed with rust & canker, for want of occupying. For Cato said verie wisely: That since old age had of it self miseries ynough of the one, they ought not to adde moreover thereunto the shame that proceedeth from vice, for to mend the matter. Now among many vices that be, there is not one that more shameth and defameth an old man than restivenesse, sloth, delicacie and voluptuousnesse: namely when he is seene to come downe from the hall and courts of Justice, or out of the counsell chamber and such public places, for to goe and keepe himselfe close in a corner of his house like a woman, or to retire into some farme in the country to oversee onely his mowers, reapers, and harvest-folke, of whom it may be well said, as we read in Sophocles:

What is become of wise Oedipus,

In riddles a-reading who was so famous?

For to begin to meddle in affaires of State in olde age, and not before (as it is reported that one Epimenides laied him downe to sleepe when he was very yong, and wakened an olde man fiftie yeeres after) and ere he have shaken off and laied aside so long repose and rest that hath stucke so close unto him by use and custome, to goe and put himselfe all at once upon a sudden into such travels and laborious negotiations, being nothing trained nor inured therein, nor framed nor exercised thereto in any measure, without converling at all beforehand with men experienced in matters of Estate, nor having practised worldly affaires, might peradventure give good occasion to one that were disposed to reprove and finde fault, for to say that which the 20 propheticke Pythias answered once to one who consulted with the oracle of Apollo about the like case:

For government and rule of citie state,

Who ever thou be, thou comest too late:

An houre this is undecent and past date,

Thus for to knocke at Court or Pallace-gate,

like an unmanerly guest, who cometh to a feast; or a rude traveller, who seeketh for lodging when it is darke night; for even so thou wouldest remooove not to a place, nor to a region, but to a life whereof thou hast no proofe and triall. As for this sentence and verse of Simonides,

The city can instruct a man,

true it is, if it be meant of them who have sufficient time to be taught and to learne any science which is not gotten but hardly and with much ado after great studie, long travell, continuall exercise and practise; provided also, that it meet with a nature painfull and laborious, patient and able to undergo all adversities of fortune. These reasons a man may seeme very well and to the purpose to alledge against those who begin when they be well stricken in yeeres to deale in publicke affaires of the State. And yet wee see the contrary, how men of great wisdom and judgement divert children and yong men from the government of common-weale, who also have the testimonie of the lawes on their side, by ordinance whereof, at Athens the publicke Crier or Bedle calleth and summoneth to the pulpit or place of audience, not such as yong Alcibiades or Pythias, for to stand up first and speake before the assemblie of the people, but those that be 40 above fiftie yeeres of age; and such they exhort both to make orations, and also to deliver their minds, and counsell what is most expedient to be done.*

And Cato being accused when he was fourescore yeeres olde and upward, in pleading of his own cause, thus answered for himselfe: It is an harder matter my masters (quoth he) for a man to render an account of his life, and to iustifie the same before other men, than those with whom he hath lived. And no man there is, but he will confesse that the acts which Cesar Augustus achieved a litle before his death in defeating Antonium, were much more roiall and profitable to the weale-publicke, than any others that ever he performed all his life-time before: and himselfe in restraining and reforming secretly by good customes and ordinances, the dissolute riots of yong men, and namely, when they mutined, said no more but thus unto them: Listen 50 yong men, and heare an olde man speake, whom olde men gave care unto when he was but yong. The government also of Pericles was at the height and of greatest power and authoritie in his olde age, at what time as he perswaded the Athenians to enter upon the Peloponnesacke warre: but when they would needs in all haste and out of season, set forward with their power to encounter with threecore thousand men all armed and well appointed, who forraied and wasted their territorie, he withstood them and hindered their designed enterprise, and that in manner by holding sure the armour of the people out of their hands, and (as one would say) by keeping ping the gates of the citie fast locked and sealed up. But as touching that which Xenophon hath written of Agefilus, it is worthy to be delivered word for word, as he setteth it downe in these tearmes: What youth (quoth he) was ever so gallant, but his age surpased it? what man was there ever in the flower and very best of all his time, more dread and terrible to his enemies, than Agefilus was in the very latter end of his daies? whose death at any time was more joyfull to enemies than that of Agefilus, although he was very olde when he died? what was he that emboldened allies and confederates, making them assured and confident, if Agefilus did not, notwithstanding he was now at the very pits brincke, and had in manner one foot already in his grave? what yong man was ever more missed among his friends, and lamented more bitterly 10 when he was dead, than Agefilus, how olde so ever he was when he departed this life? The long time that these noble personages lived, was no impediment unto them in atchieving such notable and honourable services; but we in these daies play the delicate wantons in government of cities, where there is neither tyrannie to suppress, nor warre to conduct, nor siege to be raised; and being secured from troubles of warre, we sit still with one hand in another, being troubled onely with civill debates among citizens, and some emulations, which for the most part are voided and brought to an end by vertue of the lawes and justice onely with words. We forbear (I say) and draw backe from dealing in these publicke affaires for feare, confessing our selves herein to be more cowardly and false-hearted (I will not say) than the ancient captaines and governours of the people in olde time, but even worse than Poets, Sophisters and Plaers in 20 Tragedies and Comedies of those daies. If it be true, as it is, that Simonides in his olde age won the prize for ending ditties and setting songs in quires and dances, according to the epigram made of him, which testifieth no lesse in the last verses thereof, running in this manner:

Fourescore yeeres olde was Simonides

The Poet, and some of Treoprepes,

Whom for his carrols and muscull vaine,

The prize he won and honour did gaine.

It is reported also of Sophocles, that when he was accused judicially for dorage by his owne children, who laied to his charge that he was become a childe againe, unfitting for governing his house, and had need therefore of a guardian; being convented before the judges, hereafter 30 in open court the entrance of the chorus, belonging to the Tragedie of his, entituled Oedipus in Colono, which beginneth in this wise:

Wel-come stranger at thy entrie,

To villages best of this countrie,

Renowned for good steeds in fight,

The tribe of faire Colonus light;

Where nightingale doth oft resort,

Her dolefull moanes for to report:

Amid greene bowers which she doth haunt,

Her sundrie notes and laies to chaunt,

With voice so shrill as in no ground,

Elsewhere her songs so much resound, &c.

And for that this canticle or sonet wonderfully pleased the judges and the rest of the company, they all arose from the bench, went out of the Court, and accompanied him home to his house with great acclamations for joy, and clapping of hands in his honour, as they would have done in their departure from the Theater where the Tragedie had bene lively acted indeed. Also it is confessed for certeine, that an epigram also was made of Sophocles, to this effect:

When Sophocles this sonnet wrote

To grace and honour Herodote,

His daies of life by just account,

To fiftie five yeeres did amount.

30 Philemon and Alexis, both comicall Poets, chanced to be attested and surprised with death even as they plaid their Comedie upon the stage for the prize, and were about to be crowned with garlands for the victorie. As for Paulus [or Polus] the actour of Tragedies, Erastobenes and Philochorus do report, That when he was threecore yeeres olde and ten, he acted eight Tragedies within the space of foure daies, a litle before his death. Is it not then a right great shame, that olde men who have made profession either to speake unto the people from the tribunal seat, or to sit upon the bench for to minister justice, should shew lesse generositie and magnanimitie magnanimitie than those who play their parts upon a scaffold or stage? and namely, in giving over those sacred games and combats indeed, to cast off the person of a politician and man of honour, and to put on another (I wot not what) in stead thereof: for I assure you, to lay downe the roiall dignitie of a king, for to take up the personage of an husbandman, were very base and mechanically: and considering that Demosphenes said how the sacred galley Paralus was unworthily and shamefully misused, when it was put and emploied to bring home for Meidas, wood and timber, flates and tiles, fed muttous or such like fatlings: if a man of honour and estate should at any time give up and resigne his dignitie of superintendencie over the publicke feasts of Bacchus, or government over Baotia, of presidentship in that great counsell or assemblie of citates called Amphyctiones, and then afterwards be scene occupied in measuring and selling meale, or the refuse & cakes either of grapes and olives after they be pressed, or to weigh fleeces of wooll, or to make merchandise of their felles; were not this as much altogether, as (according to the olde proverbe) to put on the age of an olde horse without constraint of any person? Moreover, to go to any base and vile occupation or handicraft, or to trafficke in merchandise, after one hath borne office of government in the common-weale, were all one as to tume a gentlewoman well descended, or a sober matron, out of all her faire and decent apparell, for to give her an apron onely and a single petticoat to cover her shame, and so to set her for to keepe in some taverne or victualling house; for even so, all the dignitie, maiestie and continuance of vertue politike is quite lost, when it is debased to any such vile ministeries and trades, smelling onely of lucre and gaine. But in case (which is the onely point remaining behinde) they call this a sweet and healthfull life, and the true enjoying and use of goods, to be given over to delicacies and pleasures, and doe invite and exhort a politician or man of State, in aging therein, and spending his olde yeeres so, to waste and consume by little and little to nothing: I wot not well unto which of these two pictures, dishonest and shamefull both twaine, this life of his were better to be likened; whether to that of the mariners, who would solemnize the feast of Venus all their life time, being not yet arrived with their ship into the haven or harbour, but leaving it still under saile in the open sea; or to the painted table of Hercules, whom some painters merily and in sport, but not seemly and with reverence, depaint how he was in the roiall Palace and Court of the Lydian queene Omphale, in a yelow coat like a wench, making winde with a fanne, and setting his minde with other Lydian damosels and waiting-maids, to broid his haire and tricke up himselfe: even so we despoiling a man of estate of his lions skin, that is to say, of his magnanimous courage and a minde to be alwaies profiting the common-wealth, and setting him to take his ease at the table, will make him good cheere continually, and delight his eares with pleasant songs, with sound of flutes and other musickall instruments; being nothing at all ashamed to heare that speech which sometime Pompeius Magnus gave unto Lucullus, who (after his warres and conduct of armies, giving over all regiment of State, wholly was addicted to banes and slothfules, to feasting, to wantonnesse and company with women in the day time, to all dissolute life and superfluous delights, even so much, as to build sumptuous edifices, besetting rather men of younger yeeres) reproved Pompeius for his ambition and desire of government above that which became his age; for Pompeius answered unto him, and said: It is more unseasonable for an aged man to live loosely and in superfluitie, than to governe and beare rule. Again, the same Pompey being one day fallen sicke, when his Physician had prescribed him a blacke-bird for to eat, which was at that time out of season, and could not be had in the market for any money, and one made answer that Lucullus had good store of them, for he kept and fed them in mure all the yeere long; hee would neither send to him for one, nor receive any from him, saying withall: What? unlesse Lucullus be a belly-god and glutton, can not Pompey tell how to recover and live? For say that nature seeketh by all meanes possible to take her pleasure and delight, yet surely the disableth the bodie of old folke, and denieth it the fruition of all pleasures, unlesse it be in some few necessities of this life;

For why? not Venus onely is Offended with old folke ywis.

as Eurypides the Poet saith, but also their appetite to eate and drinke is for the most part dull and overthrowen with mofse, and as one would say toothlesse, in such sort as they do but mumble, touch their victuals a little aloft, and hardly and with much ado enter and pierce inwardly into the same. In which regard they ought to be furnished and provided of pleasures of the mind, not such as are base, illiberall, and vile as Simonides saide unto those who reproched him for his avarice: for being bereft of all other fleshly and corporall pleasures by reason of his yeeres, yeeres, he entertained one still which fed and maintained his old age, and that was the delight which he tooke in getting money & gathering good: but the life politike of those who manage affaires, hath many pleasures, and those right great and honest, in which onely or principally it should seeme that the gods themselves take joy and contentment; and these be they that proceed from beneficence, or doing good unto many; and the glorie of some worthe and noble act. For if the painter Nicias pleased his owne mind so well in his workmanship, and was so affectionate to the operation of his art, that oftentimes he forgot himselfe, and would aske his servants whether he had washed, and whether he had dined or no: If Archimedes also was so bent & intente unto the table before him, in which he drew his figures geometrick, that his servants were faine to plucke him from it by force, for to wash and annoint him, and yet in the meane time that they were annointing of him, he would be drawing and describing of new figures upon his owne bodie: If Cassius likewise the plaier of the fluit (a man whom you know well enough) was wont to say: That men wist not how much more mirth he made unto himselfe in his playing, than he did unto those that heard him sound; and that they that came to heare his musicke, ought rather to receive a reward of him, than bestow any money upon him. Do wee not conceive and imagine in our selves, what great pleasures vertues do yeeld unto those who effect any commendable action tending to the good of their countrey, & turning to the profit of the common-weale? they tickle not, they itch not, neither do they after a stroking manner give contentment, as do these sweete motions, and gentle prickes of the flesh; for such bring with them a certaine impatient itch, an unconstant tickling mingled with a furious heat and inflammation; but those pleasures which come from notable and praise-worthie deeds, such as they be, whereof the ordinarie workman and author is he, who governeth a common-weale aright, and as it appertaineth unto him for to doe, lift up and raise the soule to a greatnesse and haughtinesse of courage accompanied with joy, not with gilded plumes (as Euripides saith) but with celestiall wings (as Plato was wont to say) And that the truth hereof may the better appeere; call to remembrance your selfe, that which oftentimes you have heard concerning Epaepete; call to remembrance upon a time what was the greatest pleasure that ever he felt in all his life? answered thus: Marie even this (quoth he) that it was my fortune to win the field at the battell of Leuctres, my father and mother both being yet living: And Sylla, the first time that he came to Rome after he had cleered Italy from civill and domestick warres, could not sleepe one winke, nor lay his eies together a whole night, for exceeding great joy and contentment wherewith his spirit was ravished, as if it had bene with a mightie and violent wind: and thus much he wrote of himselfe in his owne Commentaries. I can therefore hold well with Xenophon in that hee saith: That there is no sound or speech more delectable to a mans eare, than the hearing of his owne praises; and even so it must bee confessed: That there is no spectacle no sight, no report and memoriall, no cogitation, nor thought in the world, that bringeth so great pleasure & delectation to the mind, as doth the contemplation and beholding of those good and laudable deeds, which a man hath performed whiles he was employed in the administration of State and in bearing offices, as being conspicuous, eminent, and publicke places to be seene as farre off. True it is moreover, that the amiable grace and favour thereby gotten, accompanying alwaies vertuous acts and bearing witness thereto; the commendation also of the people who strive a vie and contend who can give out greatest praise and speake most good (the verie guide which leadeth the way of just and due benevolence) doth adde a glorie and lustre (as it were) unto the joy proceeding from vertue, for to polish and beautifie the same. Neither ought a man by negligence to suffer for to fade and wither in old age, the glorie of his good deeds, like unto a coronet or garland of greene leaves which was woun at some games of prizes; but evermore to bring forth some fresh and new demerites, to stir up and awaken (as a man would say) the grace of the old deeds precedent, and thereby to make the same both greater, and also more permanent and durable. For like as the carpenters and shipwrights who had the charge to maintaine the ship called the Gallion of Delos evermore made supply of new pieces of timber, as one of the olde began to decaye, keeping it in continuall reparation by putting in one ribbe and planke for another, and so preserved it alwaies entire and whole, as it was the verie first daie when it was built; even so a man is to doe by his reputation and credit. And no harder matter is it for to maintaine glorie once up and on foote, than to keepe a fire continually flaming which is once kindled, by putting effoones fresh fiewell under (bee it never so little) for to feede the same: but if they bee once out and throughly quenched indeede, then it is no small matter to set either the one or the other a burning againe.

59

again. And like as Lamp, as the rich merchant, and shipmaster, being demanded how he got his goods: Marie (quoth he) my greatest wealth I gained soone and with ease, but my smaller estate with exceeding much paine and slowly; even so it is no easie matter at the beginning to acquire reputation, or to win credit and authoritie in the managing of civill affaires, but to augment it after the foundation is laid, or to preserve and uphold the same, when it is once come to greatnes, is not so hard, for every litle thing, & the smallest meanes wil do it. And so we see that a friend when he is once had, requirith not many great pleasures & offices of kindnesse & friendship for to be kept and continued a friend still, but petie tokens & final signes of curesse, passing continually from time to time betweene, are sufficient to preserve mutuall love and amity. Sensible, the good will and affection of the people, their trust & confidence which they have conceived towards a man, although he be not able evermore to give largesses among them, although he doe not alwaies defend and mainteine their causes, nor sit continually in place of magistracie and office, yet nevertheless it holdeth still, if he doe but shew himselfe onely to carie a good heart unto them, & not to care for to take paines & care for the common good, nor refuse any service in that behalfe: for even the very expeditions and voiaiges in warre, have not alwaies battailes aranged, nor fields fought and bloudie skirmishes, ne yet besieging and beleaguering of cities; but they affoord betwene whiles, festivall sacrifices, parlies & enterviewes, some leasure also and time of rest, to follow games, sports, and pastimes. How then cometh it, that an old man should be afraid to meddle in State affaires, as if it were a charge unsupportable, full of infinite and innumerable travells, without any comfort and consolation at all? considering that there be allowed at times, varietie of plaies and games, goodly fights and shewes, solemne processions, and stately pompes, publike doles and largesses, daunces, musike and feasts, and ever and anon the honorable service and worship of one god or other, which are able to unkint the frownes and unbend the browes, to dispatch and dissipate the cloudy cares and austeritie of the judges in court hall, and of senatours also in counsell chamber, yielding unto them much more pleasure & contentment in proportion to their travells and paines belonging to their place. As for the greatest mischief which is most to be feared in such administrations of the common-wealth, to wit, envy, it seileth & taketh least hold upon old age of any other; for like as Heracitus was wont to say: That dogs do baite & barke at those whom they know not; even so envie assaileth him who beginneth to governe, just at the dore as it were, and the entrie of the tribunall and throne of estate, seeking to impeach his accessse and passage thither; but after it is accustomed and acquainted once with the glorie of a man, and when it hath bene nourished and fed therewith, it is not so troublesome and churlish, but becommeth more kinde and gentle; and this is the reason that some have likened envie unto a smoke, which at the first when the fire beginneth to kindle, ariseth grosse and thicke, but after that it burneth light and cleere, vanisheth away and is gone. In all other preeminences and superiorities, men are wont ordinarily to debate and quarrell, namely, about vertue, nobilitie of blood and honour, as being of opinion, that the more they yeeld unto others, the more they doe abridge from themselves; but the prerogative or precedence of time, which properly is called Presbeium, as if a man would say, the Honor of age, or Time-right, is voide of all jealousie and emulation, and there is no man but will willingly yeeld it to his companion; neither is there any kinde of honour whereunto so well sorteth this qualitie, namely to grace him more who giveth the honour, than the party who is honoured, as to the prerogative which is given to old men. Moreover, all men doe not hope nor expect to have credit one time or other by their riches, by their eloquence or wisdom; whereas you shall not see so much as one of those that rule in common-wealth, to despise of comming one day to that authoritie and reverence which old age bringeth men unto. He therefore who after he hath wrestled long against envie, retireth in the end from the administration of the common-wealth, at what time as it well appeared and at the point to be extinguished or laid along, should doe like unto that pilot who in a tempest having winde and waves contrary, spreadeth saile and roweth in great danger, but afterwards when the weather is faire, and a gentle gale of forewinde serveth, doth goe about to strike saile and ride at anchor in the pleasant funne-thine; he should I say in so doing, abandon together with his publike affaires, the societie, fellowship, alliance and intelligences which he had with his good friends; for the more time that he had, the more friends by good reason he ought to have gotten, for to stand with him and take his part, whom he neither cannot all at once leade forth with him, like as a master of carols his whole quire of singing men; nor meete it is and reason that he should leave and forsake them all: but as it is not an easie peece of worke to stocke up by the root olde trees, no more is

is it a thing soone done to extirpe a long government in the common-wealth, as having manie great rootes, and those entrelaced & entwined one within another, by reason of fundrie and weightie affaires, the which no doubt must needs worke more trouble and vexation to those that retire and depart from it, than to those that tarrie still by it; and say there remained yet behind for old men some reliques of envie, emulation, and contention, which grew in the time of their government; it were farre better to extinguish and quench the same by power and authoritie, than to turne both side and backe unto them, all naked and disarmed: for envious persons and evil willers never doe assaile them so much with despight, who make head againe and stand their ground, as they doe by contempt those who yeeld backe and retire: and to this accordeth well that which in times past that great Epinondas said unto the Thebans. For when the Arcadians had made offer unto them, yea and requested them to enter in their cities, during the winter season, and there to lodge and abide under covert; he would not permit them so to doe, nor to accept of their courtesie: For now (quoth he) all while that they behold you exercising and wrestling in your armour, they have you in great admiration, as valiant and hardy men; but if they should see you once by the fire side punning and stamping beanes, they would take you to be no better than themselves; even so I would make my application, and inferre heereupon; that it is a venerable and goodly sight to behold a grave and ancient personage speaking to the people, dispatching affaires of State, and generally to be honored of every man; but he who all the day long stirres not out of his warme bed, or if he be up, sitteth still in some corner of a gallerie, prating and talking vainly, or else reaching, hawking, spitting, or wiping his nose that drops for cold; such an one I say, is exposed to contempt. Homer verily himselfe hath taught us this lesson, if we will make and give good care to that which he hath written. For old Nestor being at the warre before Troie, was had in honour and reputation; whereas contrariwise Peleus and Laertes who taried behinde at home were set litle by and despised. For the habitude of wisdom doth not continue the same, nor is any thing like it selfe, in those who give themselves to ease, and doe not practise the same; but through idlenesse and negligence it diminisheth, and is dissolved by litle and litle, as having need alwaies of some exercise of the cogitation and thought which may waken the spirit, cleere the discourse of reason, and lighten the operative part of the minde to the dealing in affaires,

*Like as both iron and brasse is bright and cleere,
All while mans hand the same doth use and weare:
Where as the house wherein none dwells at all,
In tract of time must needs decay and fall.*

Neither is the infirmitie and feebleness of the bodie so great an hinderance unto the government of State, in those who above the strength of their age seeme either to mount into the tribunall, or to the bench, or to the generals pavilion and place of audience within the campe, as otherwise their yeeres bring good with them, to wit, considerate circumspection & staied wisdom: as also not to be troubled or driven to a non plus in the managing of any busines, or to commit an absurditie & error, partly for want of experience, in part upon vaine glorie, & so to draw the multitude therewith and doe mischief to the common-wealth all at once; like unto a sea tossed with windes; but to treat and negotiate gently, mildly, and with a seded judgement, with those who come unto them for advice, or have any affaires or to doe with them. And heereupon it is, that cities after they have sustained some great shake or adverse calamitie, or when they have bene affrighted, desire straight waies to be ruled by ancient men, and those well experienced; in which cases they have many times drawn perforce an old man out of his house in the country, for to governe them, who thought or desired nothing lesse; they have compelled him to lay his hand upon the helme, for to set all straight and upright againe in securitie, rejecting in the meane while Greene headed generals of armies, eloquent oratours also, who knew well enough how to speake aloud, and to pronounce long clauses and periods with one breath, and never fetching their winde; yea and beleve me brave warriors and woorthie captaines indeede, who had bene able and sufficient to have affronted their enemies, and fought valiantly in the field. Like as upon a time at Athens, the oratours there shewing before Timothew and Iphicrates, who were farre steep in yeeres, one named Chares the sonne of Theochares, who was a lustie young man, in the flower of his age, and mightie of bodie, stripped out of his apparell, desired that, hee who was to be captaine generall of the Athenians, were such an one as he for yeeres and for person: God forbid (quoth Timothew) but rather I could with the generals vantage to be such an one, who is to carie after him his bed and the furniture thereto belonging. As

for

for the commander and leader of an armie, he ought to be a man that knoweth how to see into the State, both before and behinde, and who will not suffer his counsels and resolutions for the weale publike, to be troubled and disordered by any passion whatsoever: for Sophocles when he was now become aged: I am well appaid (quoth he) that I am now escaped from wanton love and the delights of Venus; as being delivered from the subjection of a furious lord and raging master. But in the administration of the common-wealth, a man is not to avoid and shie one sort of masters, to wit, the love of boies and wenches, but many others which be more outrageous than it, and namely emulation and a contentious spirit, desire of vaine-glory, and a longing to be alwaies and in every thing the first and the greatest; a vice that engendreth most of any other, envie, jealousies, conspiracies, and factions; of which old age doth let slacke some, and dull their edge, others it cooleth and extinguisheth cleane, neither diminisheth and impairerth it the inclination and affection to well doing so much, as it representeth and cutteth off the passions which are too violent and over-hot, to the end that it may applie unto the care and studie about affaires, the discourse of reason, sober, staid, and well seiled: howbeit in very truth, and in the judgement of the readers, let this speech of the poet

Lie still poore wretched and keeper beed

Starve not from thence, and have no dread.

be alledged and spoken for to dissuade and distract him, who would with his grised beard and graie head begin now to be yong and plaie the youth, as also to taxe and reproove an old grand-fire, who after long repose in his house, out of which he hath not stirred, no more than in the time of a languishing discaise, will needs start up now on a sudden, and all at once belittle his old bones to be a capitaine forsooth in all haste, to leade an armie, or els to take upon him the charge of governing a citie. But he that would call away and reclaime one, who hath bene trained and employed all the daies of his life in politike affaires, and thoroughly beaten to the world, and the administration of the common-weale, not suffering him to runne forward in that course of life untill he have attained the goale, nor untill he have gained the prize of his victory, but will seeme to turne him out of his long journey for to take another way; he (I say) is altogether senselesse and unreasonable, and nothing resembleth the man we speake of. Like as he who to divert an old man being set out like a youth, with a chaplet of fresh flowers on his head, perfumed with sweet odors, and already to be married, would alledge those verses which in a Tragædie were sometime said unto Philoctetes,

What maiden yong what frise and lustie bride

Will marry thee so lie close by thy side?

Alas poore man for pitie, at this age

Thine for to venture upon marriage?

were nothing absurd nor out of the way, and beside the purpose; for even old folke themselves when they are disposed to be merrie, have manie such jests as these passe currant among them:

I marrie old, how faire I am bested?

I well wot I, for my neighbour I do wed.

But he that would perswade a man already married, to leave his wife with whom he hath lived so long in wedlocke, and dwelt together in one house without quarrels and complaints, supposing that because he is now grown in yeeres with her, he should forsake her, and live either a single life apart by himselfe, or else keepe a lemon or concubine in stead of his lawfull wedded wife, in my conceit were a verie absurd for in the highest degree; even so, it standeth to good reason, for to deale with an old man who having one foot already in his grave, or with one Chilon who had bene an husbandman all his life time; or with on Lampon the merchant venturer, who hath done nothing all his daies, but used shipping & trafficke beyond sea; or with some of these Philosophers out of Epicurus his orchard, who love a life to sit still and doe nothing, to admonish and dissuade them from approaching unto the publike affaires of the people, and to counsell them to hold them still to their former accustomed course of life, farre from troubles and busie dealings in common-weale: marie, he that tooke such an one as Phocion, Caro or Pericles by the hand, and said: My friend of Athens or Rome, whoever you are, now that you be arrived to withered olde age, make a divorce with the common weale, quit from this day forward all publike administration, all cares and affaires, as well of counsell as of warre; abandon both the tribunall seat in the citie and also the prætorie or pavilion of State in the campe, retire your selfe into an house in the countrey, and live the rest of your life there with one maid-servant to attend upon you; follow your husbandrie, or els employ your selfe in your private householde, to take accounts counts and reckonings of your receivers and factours; surely he should perswade him to unjust things, and exact of a Statel-man and politician that which neither pleaseh nor yet becometh him. How then? will some man say unto me, never heard we the olde fouldiour, how he speaketh thus in the Comedie?

My hoarie haies from war fare set me free,

That from henceforth enroll'd I shall not be.

Yes forsooth good sir, it is very true; for requirit it is, and fit, that the squires and servitours of Mars should be in the flower and full strength of their age, as those who make profession of warre and the painfull services belonging thereto, whose gray haies, although the head-piece and motion do hide and cover, yet inwardly their limmes are heave and decayed by yeeres, and their strength is not to their good will, nor their hand answerable to their heart. But of the ministers of Jupiter surnamed Counsellor, Oratour, and Patron of cities, we require not the works of feet nor of hands, but of counsell, forecast & eloquence; and yet not such eloquence I meane, as should make a stirre, or raise a noise, out-crie and shout among the people, but that which is full of ripe understanding, of considerate wisdom, and of good directions and plots well and surely laid. In which persons, the white head and gray beard (which some laugh and make good game at) the crow-foot about the eies, the furrowes in the forehead, the rivels and wrinkles in the face besides appearing, beare witness of long experience, and adde unto them a reputation and authoritie, which helpe much to perswade and to draw the minds of the hearers unto their will and purpose. For to speake truly, youth is made (as it were) to follow and obey, but age to guide and command: and that citie or State is preserved, wherein the sage counsels of the elders and the martiall prowesse of the yonger, beare sway together. And for this cause highly and woonderfully are these vertes following praised in Homer, and namely in the first place:

Then to begin, a goodly sort of ancient captaines bold

Asssembled hem in Nestors ship,

acounsell there to hold.

upon the same reason also, that counsell of the wisest and principall men assistant unto the kings of Lacedæmon, for the better government of the State, the oracle of Apollo Pythius first called Priest-physians, i. Elders: and Lycurgus afterwards directly and plainly termed Tiestras. i. Old men; and even at this very day, the counsell of Estate in Rome is named a Senate, that is to say, an assembly of ancient persons. And like as the law and custome, time out of minde, hath allowed unto Kings and Princes the diademe, that is to say, a roiall band or frontlet, the crowne also to stand upon their heads, as honourable mors & ensignes of their regall dignitie and soveraigne authoritie; even so hath nature given unto olde men (who in Greeke are called γῆρας) as honourable tokens of their right to command, and of their preeminence above others. And for mine owne part, I verily thinke that this nowne in Greeke, γῆρας, which signifieth a prize or reward of honour, as also the verbe γῆρασκω, which is as much to say, as to honour, continue still in use, as respective to the honour due unto olde men (who in Greeke are called γῆρας) not for that they bathe in hot waters, or sleepe in foster beds; but because in cities well and wisely governed, they be ranged with kings for their prudence, the proper and perfect goodnesse whereof, as of some tree which yeeldeth winter fruit which is not ripe before the latter end of the yeere, nature bringeth forth late and hardly in olde age: and therefore there was not one of those martiall and brave couragious captaines of the Greeks, who found fault with that great king of kings Agamemnon for making such a praiser as this unto the gods:

That of the Grecian host which stood

of many worsebie men,

Such counsellors as Nestor was,

they would vouchsafe him ten.

but they all agreed with him, and by their silence confessed, That not onely in policie and civill government, but also in warre, olde age carrieth a mightie great stroke: for according as the ancient proverbe beareth witness:

One head that knowes full wisely for to weed,

Outgoessen hands, and maketh better speed.

One advice likewise, and sentence grounded upon reason, and delivered with perswasive grace, effecteth the greatest and bravest exploits in a whole State. Well, say that olde age hath many difficulties difficulties and discommodities attending upon it, yet is not the same therefore to be rejected: for the absolute rule of a king, being the greatest and most perfect estate of all governments in the world, hath exceeding many cares, travels and troubles; inasmuch, as it is written of king Seleucus that he would often-times say, if the people with how laborious and painfull it were to read and write only so many letters as he did, they would not deigne to take up his diademe, if they found it throwen in their very way as they goe. And Philip being at the point to pitch his campe in a faire ground, when he was advertised that the place would not afford forage for his labouring beasts: O Hercules (quoth he) what a life is this of ours, that we must live (forsooth) and care to serve the necessitie of our asses? Why, then belike it were high time to perswade a king when he is aged, for to lay downe his diademe, to cast off his robes of purple, to clad himselfe in simple array, to take a crooked staffe in hand, and so to go and live in the country, for feare lest if he with his gray haire rained still, he should seeme to do many superfluous and impertinent things, and to direct matters out of season? Now if it were unseemely and a meere indignitie, to deale with Agesilus, with Xerxes and Darius, all kings and monarchs, after this sort; unmeet likewise it is, that we should remove and displace Solon out of the counsell of Athenes, or depole Cato from his place in the Romane Senate, because of their olde age. Why should we then goe about to perswade such an one as Pericles: to give over and resigne his government in a popular State? for over & besides, there were no sence at all, that if one have leapt and mounted into the tribunall seat or chaire of estate in his young yeeres, and afterwards discharged upon the people & common-wealth those his violent passions of ambition and other furious fits, when ripe age is now come, which is wont to bring with it discretion and much wisdom gathered by experience, to abandon and put away (as it were) his lawfull wife, the government which hee hath so long time abused. The foxe in Aesops fables would not suffer the urchin to take off the riques that were setted upon her bodie: For if (quoth she) thou take away these that be already full, there will come other hungry ones in their place; and even so, if a State rejected evermore from administration of the common-wealth those governours that begin once to be olde, it must needs be quickly full of a sort of young rulers, that be hungrie and thirly both after glory, but altogether void of politike wit and reason to governe: for how can it otherwise be? and where should they get knowledge, if they have not bene disciples to learne, nor spectatours to follow and imitate some ancient magistrate that manageth state affairs? The Cards at sea which shew the feat of sailing and ruling ships, can not make good sea-men or skillfull pilots, if they have not bene themselves many times at the steerne in the poope, to see the manner of it, and the conflicts against the waves, the winds, the blacke stormes and darke tempests,

What time in great perplexitie,

The mariner doth wish to see

Castor and Pollux, twins full bright,

Presaging safetie with their light.

How then possibly can a young man governe and direct a citie well, perswade the people aright, & deliver wise counsell in the Senate, having but read one little booke treating of pollicy, 40 or haply written an exercise or declamation in the Schoole. Lycum touching that argument? unlesse besides, he have stood close unto the reines, or hard by the helme many a time, & by marking both citie rulers and martiall captaines, how they have but bene put to their trial, and according to the fundry experiences and accidents of fortunes, enclining now to the one side and then to the other, after many dangers and great affaires, have gotten sufficient knowledge and instruction before hand? I can not see how it can be: but if there were no other thing at all besides; yet surely an ancient man is to manage still the affaires of State, and it were but to traine and teach the youonger, that be to come up after him: for like as they who teach children musick, or to reade, do themselves Solfes, & sing the note, they finger & strike the key or string, they reade & spell the letters before them, & all to shew how they should do; even so the ancient politician doth frame and direct a young man, not onely by reading unto him, by discour- 50 sing and advertising him without forth; but also in the very managing and administration of affaires, fashioning, forming and casting him (as it were) lively in a mold, as well by operation and example, as by words and precepts. For he that is schooled and exercised herein, not in the schooles of the Sophisters that can speake in number & measure, as in the wrestling hall where the body is annointed with a composition of oyle & waxe together, against exercises performed without any danger at all: but (as it were) at the verie publicke games indeed, in the view of the whole whole world, such as the Olympicks and Pythicks were: he (I say) followeth the tracts and foot- steps of his master and teacher, as saith Simonides:

As suckling foale, that keeps just pace,

And runnes with him in everie place.

This did Aristides under Cambyses, Cimon under Aristides, Phocion under Chabrias, Cato under Fabius Maximus, Pompeius under Sylla, and Polybius under Philopemen. For all these per- 10 sonages when they were young, drew neere and joined themselves with others that were ancient, and having taken root close by them, grew up together with them in their actions and admin- istrations, whereby they got experience and were inured to the managing of the State with honour and reputation. Aeschines the Academique Philosopher, when certaine envious sophis- 20 ters of his time charged him and said: That he made a semblance and shew, that he had bene the discipule and hearer of Carneades, whereas he never was. I say unto you (quoth he) that I heard the man, when as his speech abandoning the bruit applause and tumultuous noise of the people, by reason of his old age was shut up close and houlded (as it were) for to do good more familiarly in private conference. And even so it is with the government of an aged person, when as not onely his words, but also his deeds be farre remote from affected pompe in out- ward shewes, and all vaine glorie. Much like as is reported of the blacke Storke, called Ibis, who by that time that she is become old, hath exhaled and breathed forth all that strong and stin- king favour which she had, and beginneth to yeeld a sweet and aromaticall smell; even so, there 30 is no counsell nor opinion in old men, vaine, turbulent, or inconstant, but all grave, quiet, and seded. And therefore in any wise (as I said before) if it were but for young mens sake onely and no more; elder persons are to weld the affaires of State: to the end that as Plato speaking of wine mingled with water, said that it was to make the furious god wife, by chastising him with another that was sober and temperate: the staid wisdom of old age tempered with youth, swell- ing and boiling before the people, and transported with the greedy desire of honour, and with ambition, might cut off that which is furious, raging and over violent.

But over and besides all that hath bene said before, they who thinke, that to be employed in the managing of publicke affaires, is all one as to saile for trafficke, or to go forth to warre in some expedition, are much deceived: for both navigation & also war, men undertake for a cer- 30 taine end, and no sooner have they attained thereto but they cease: but the managing of State affaires is not a commission or office pretending or intending any profit and commoditie for the scope that it sheweth at; but it is the life and profession of a living creature, which is gentle, tame, civil, and sociable, borne to live so long as it pleaseeth nature, civilly, honestly, and for the publicke good of humane societie. This is the reason, that of a man it should be said, that he still is occupied in such affaires of common-weale, and not that he hath bene so employed: like as to be true, and not to have bene true; to be just and not to have bene just; to love his countrey and citizens, and not to have loved them, is his dutie and profession. For even nature her selfe directeth us hereto, and singeth this lesson in our eares (I speake to those who are not altoget- her corrupted and marred with sloth and idleness):

40 Thy father thee, a man hath once begot:

To profit men alwaies, in this or that.

Again:

Let us not cease nor any end finde

To do all good unto mankind.

As touching them who pretend and alledge for excuse, feebleness or impotencie, they do ac- cuse sicknesse & the maimed indisposition of the bodie rather than age. For you shall see many young men sicke & feeble, and as many old folke lusty & strong: so we are not to remove aged persons simply from the administration of the common-weale, but the impotent onely and un- sufficient; nor to call unto that vocation young men, but such as be able to undergo the charge: 50 for Ardeus was young enough, and Antigonum in yeeres; and yet this man as olde as he was, went within a litle of conquering all Asia; but the other had never but the bare name onely of a King, like as in a dumbe shew upon a stage, making a countenance onely with a guard of par- tizans and halberds about him, without speaking one word; and so he was a ridiculous pageant and laughing stocke among his nobles and peeres, who were alwaies his rulers, and led him as they list. And even as he who would perswade Prodicus the Sophister, or Phileras the poet (young men both, howbeit leane, feeble, sickly, and for the most part of their time bed-ridden) for to meddle with government of State, were a very foole and senselesse ass; so he were no whit better better, who should debarre such old men as Phocion, as Masaniissa the African, or Cato the Roman, from exercising publike magistracie in citie, or taking the charge of a Lord Generall in the field: for Phocion one day when the Athenians all in the haste, would needs have gone forth to warre at an unseasonable time, commaunded by proclamation that as many as were not above threecore yeres of age, should arme and follow him now when they were offended and wroth hereat: Why? my masters (quoth he) what cause have you to complaine? I will go with you my selfe and be your capitaine, who carie already above fourcore yeres on my backe. And of Masaniissa, Polybius writeth in his storie, that he died when he was fourcore and ten yeres old, and left behind him at his death a sonne of his owne bodie begotten, but fower yeres old: also that a little before his dying day, he overthrew the Carthaginians in a raunged battell, 10 and the morrow after was seene eating favourly at his verie tent doore a piece of browne bread: and when some marvelled at him why he so did, he answered thus out of the Poet Sophocles:

*For iron and brasse, he bright and cleare
All while mans hands the same doth weare,
But the house wherein none dwells at all
In time must needs decay and fall.*

and even as much may be said, of the lustre, glossie and resplendent light of the minde, by which we discourse, we remember, conceive and understand. And therefore it is generally held and said, that kings become much better in wars and militarie expeditions, than they be all the whiles they sit still quietly at home. In such sort, that it is reported of King Atridus, the brother of Enneus, how being enervate by long peace and rest, Philopemen one of his favourites led him up and downe as he list by the nose, and indeed being fed as fat as a beast, he might do with him what he would; so as the Romans were wont to aske by way of mockerie ever and anon, as any failed out of Asia, whether the king were in grace and favour with Philopemen, and might do any thing with him? There could not easily be found many Romane captaines more sufficient warriours in all kinde of service than was Lucullus, so long as he was in action, and mainteined his wit and understanding entier; but after that he gave himselfe over once to an idle life, and fat mued up (as it were) like an house-bird at home, and medled no more in the affaires of the common-weale, he became very dull, blockish and benumbed, much like to sea-spunges after a long calme, when the salt water doth not dash and drench them; so that afterwards he committed his olde age to be dieted, cured and ordered unto one of his affranchised bond-slaves, named Callisthenes, by whom it was thought he was medicined with amatorious drinks, and bewitched with other charmes and forceries, untill such time as his brother Marcus displaced this servitour from about him, and would needs have the government and disposition of his person the rest of his life, which was not very long. But Darius the father of Xerxes was wont to say: That in perillous times and dangerous troubles, he became the better and much wiser than himselfe. * Seleas a King of Scythia said, that he thought himselfe no better than his horse-keeper, when he was idle. Dionysius the elder being demanded upon a time, whether he were at leisure and had nought to do? God defend (quoth he) that ever it should be so with me: 40 for a bow (as they say) if it be over-bent will breake, but the mind if it be over-slacke. For the verie musicians themselves, if they discontinue overlong the hearing of their accords; the Geometricians likewise, to proove & resolve their conclusions, the Arithmeticians also to exercise continually their accounts and reckonings, together with the verie actions do impair by long time and age the habitudes that they had gotten before in their severall arts, albeit they be not so much practike as speculative sciences: but the politike habitude, which is Prudence, Discretion, Sage, advise, and justice, and besides all these, Experience which can skill in all occurrences how to make choise of opportunities and the verie point of occasions, as also a sufficiencie to be able with good words to perswade that which is meet; this habitude (I say) 50 and knowledge can not be preserved & maintained, but by speaking often in publike place, by doing affaires, by discoursing and by judgement: and a hard case (it were) if by discontinuing and leaving off these goodly exercises, it should neglect and suffer to voide out of the mind so many faire and laudable vertues: for verie like it is, that in so doing all humanitie, sociable courtesie, and gratitude in time, for want of use and practise would decay and fade away, which in deed should never cease nor have an end. Now if you had Tithonus for your father, who indeed was immortall, howbeit by reason of extreme age standing in need continually of great helpe and careful attendance, would you avoide all good meanes? would you denie or be weary of doing him him dutifull service, namely, to wait upon him, to speake unto him, to find talke with him, and to succour him everie way, under a colour and pretense that you had ministred unto him long enough? I trow you would not. Our countrey then, resembling our father, or our mother rather according to the tearme Mingus, which the Candiotis give it, which is more aged, and hath many more rights over us, and straighter obligations of us, than hath either father or mother, how durable and long lived so ever it be, yet notwithstanding subject it is to age, and is not sufficient of it selfe, but hath alwaies need of some carefull eie and good regard over it, and requireth much succour and vigilance; she (I say) plucketh unto her a man of honour and policie, she takes sure hold and will not let him go,

*She catcheth him by skirt of robe behind,
And holds him fast, lest that he from her wind.*

you know well that there be many Pythiades, that is to say, five yeres terames gone over my head, since I began first to minister as Priest unto Apollo Pythius: but yet (I suppose) you would not say thus unto me: Plutarch, you have sacrificed enough now; you have gone in procession often enough, already, or you have lead a sufficient number of dances in the honour and worship of your god; now you are grown in yeres and become aged; it were time now, that you laid off the coronet which you weare on your head in token of your priesthood, and give over the oracle by reason of your old age. Neither would I have you thinke that it is lawfull for you, notwithstanding you be farre steep in yeres, to relinquish and resigne up your holy service of Jupiter the tutor and patron of cities, the president of civill assemblies and councils; you (I say) who are the soveraigne high priest, and the great prophet of the sacred ceremonies of religion politike wherein you thus long time have bene entred and professed.

But laying aside if you thinke good, these arguments that may distract and pull an old man from the administration of the State; let us discourse philosophically, and consider a little upon this point: namely, that we doe not impose upon old age any enterprize and travel, which is either too greivous or unbecoming, considering that in the universall government of the common-weale, there be many parts besitting well enough and agreeable to that age whereunto both you and I at this present be arrived. For like as if of dutie we were commaunded to continue singing all our life long, we are not bound after that we be grown to great age for to reach 30 to the highest, lowdest, and most shrill notes, considering that there be in musicke many divers tunes and different intensions of the voice, which the musicians call harmonies; but reason would that we make choise of that which is easiest for our yeres, and most fittable to our nature and disposition; even so since that to speake and manage affaires is to men more naturall during their whole life, than singing to swannes even unto their houre of death, we must not abandon that affection of saying and doing, as if we should fling away an harpe too high set, but we ought to let the same downe by little and little, taking in hand those charges and offices which be lesse painfull, more moderate, and better according with the strength and manners of old folke: for even our verie bodies, we that are aged doe not suffer to rest still without all exercise, and allow them no motion at all, because we can no more handle the spade to dig the ground, 40 nor weld the plummets of leade in the exercise of dauncing, nor pitch the barre, fling the hammer, cast the coit, or throw a stone farre from us, or fight and skirmish in our armour, or handle sword and buckler as we could have done in those daies; yet we can abide to swing and hang at a rope for to stretch our limmes, we can away with shaking of our bodies moderately in a pendant ship, coach, or easie horse-litter; we like well enough of walking gently, and devising one with another upon the way, and mainteining pleasant discourses, wakening and reviving our vitall spirits, and blowing as it were the coles to kindle our naturall heat: and therefore let us not suffer our selves to grow over colde, nor stiffe and starke as if we were frozen and congealed through our sloth and idleness; neither on the other side overcharge our selves with all offices, nor be readie to lay our hand to all ministries and functions, nor enforce our old age 50 convinced of impotencie to come at length to these or such like words,

*Ah good right hand, how gladly wouldst thou take
The lance to couch, and pike in skirmish shake:
But now alas, this forward will to fight,
Thy feebleness doth checke, and worke thee spite.*

For neither is the man himselfe, who is able enough and in the floure of his yeres, commended, if he should undergo and lay upon his shoulders all the affaires of the common-weale, and not suffer any man else with him to take some part (like as the Stoicks affirme that Jupiter is content to do) but engaging himselfe in all things, and meddling in every matter, either upon an unsatiable desire of glorie, or for envie that he beareth to thole, who in some measure would have their part of honour and authoritie in the common-weale. But unto an auncient person I assure you, (although you should ease him of infamie in this behalfe) yet it were a painfull ambition, and a most laborious desire of rule to be present personally at all elections of magistratres; yea and a miserable curiositie to wait and attend every hour of judgement in court, and all meetings and assemblies in counsell; also an intollerable humour of vaine-glorie to stand at receit and catch every occasion of embassage, or know every verdict of our grand-jurie, or undertake the patronage of all publike causes whatsoever; and say that all this might be performed with the favour and love of every man, yet greivous it is, and above the ordinarie strength of that age. 10 But what will you say if they meet with the cleane contrarie? for to yong men they be odious, because they let nothing passe their owne hands, but intercept from them all occasion and means of action, not giving them leave to arise and put themselves forth; as for their equals, this covetous desire of theirs to hold the highest place in all things, and to have the sole authoritie every where, is no lesse hated of them, & accounted infamous, than either avarice or loose life, and voluptuousnesse in other old folke. And therefore like as (by report) king Alexander the great, not willing to overcharge his horse Bucephalus when he grew in age, used to mount other couriers before the fight began, for to ride up and downe to review his armie and all the quarters and regiments thereof, but after he had ranged it in array, & set his squadrons and companies in ordinance of battell, and given the signall, he would alight and get upon his backe 20 againe as he was wont, and presently march directly affront his enemies, give the charge, and hazard the fortune of the field: even so a politike man of State, if he be wise and of sound judgement, will favour his strength a litle, when he feeleth himselfe aged, as he holdeth the reines in his owne hand, he will forbear to deale in those charges which are not altogether so necessarie, and suffer younger men to manage matters of lesse importance; but in weightie affaires of great consequence, he will lay to both his owne hands in good earnest, contrary unto the practice of the champions in publike games and combats of prize, who carefully looke unto their bodies without touching at all any necessary works, and all to employ and use them in needlesse, unprofitable, and superfluous feats: but we contrariwise letting passe by the petie and sleight charges, are to reserve our selves whole and entire unto those that be serious and of moment indeed: for a yong man as Homer saith, all things be seeme indifferently & alike, all the world smileth on him, every body loveth him; if he enterprise small matters, and many in number, they say he is a good common-wealths man, he is popular, he is laborious; if he undertake great works and honorable actions, he hath the name of generous, noble & magnanimous; yea, and divers occurrences there be, wherein rashnesse is selte and a contentious humour of emulation have a kinde of grace, and become gaily well such as be fresh and gallant youthes; but for a man of yeeres, who during the administration of the common-weale, undertaketh these and such like ministeries and commissions; namely, the letting to ferme the customes & revenues of the citie, the charge of maintaining an haven, or keeping of the market place and common hall in order and reparation; over and besides, the embassies and voiajes in forren parts to princes 40 and potentates, or the riding in poste thither, to treat about no matter of necessitie nor weighty affaires of any importance, but onely to salute them or make court unto them, or performe some offices of courtesie and courtesie: In my conceit, and be it spoken unto you my good friend, he is to be pitied for it, and his case is rather lamentable than commendable. To others haply it may seeme an odious trouble & a burdensome matter for him so to be employd; for surely this is not an age wherein a man should be encumbered with any offices, but such as wherein there is dignitie, grandence & reputation, such as that is, which your selfe at this time do execute in Athens, to wit, the presidence of the counsell or senate called Ariopagus, and verily of that kinde also is that dignitie of being one of that honorable counsell and assemblee of the States, called Amphyctiones, which your country hath conferred upon you by patent to hold all your life 50 time, the labour belonging whereto is pleasant, the paines easie, and the travell tolerable. Howbeit I would not have an auncient person to range and hunt after these offices, nor to accept them, as demanding the same, but to receive them by way of refusall, so as he may seeme to take them volens nolens, not as meanes for to be himselfe in honor, but as one that meanby his acception to grace and honour them. For it is no shame as Tiberius Caesar was wont to say, for men above three-score yeeres of age to reach forth their hand to a physician for to have their pulse felt; but rather to stretch out their hands to the people, in praying them to give their voices

voices or suffrages with them at the election of magistratres; for this is a very vile and base thing: as contrariwise there is in this a certaine venerable majestie, and a dignitie right honorable; that when the country hath elected one to be a magistrat, when they call upon him and give attendance at his doore, hee should then come downe unto them out of his house, with a kinde of reciprocall honour of his part, a cheerefull countenance and courteous behaviour to the people againe, to salute, embrace, wel-come; and accept this their present, woorthily indeed and be seeming honourable old age. Semblable also in some sort an auncient man ought to use his speech in the congregation and assemblee of the people, not running ever and anon and leaping up into the pulpit or place of audience to make an oration unto the people, nor readie alwaies like as a cocke croweth againe when hee heareth 10 others, to counterchaunt (as it were) to all those that make any speech; nor in falsing upon them, and striving to take hold and vantage of their words, to unbride the reverence that yong men beare toward him, nor to breed in them by that meanes matter to exercise and accustom themselves in disobedience and unwillingnesse to heare him: but hee must otherwhiles seeme to passe by, and make semblance as though hee saw and heard nothing, and give them leave a litle to brave it, to sling out, and cast up the head like a wanton yong horse, neither to bee present, among or to search curiously into everie thing that is done or saide, especially when the daunger is not great, nor a matter touching the safetie of common weale, nor any honour and reputation; for there in such cases he ought not to stay until he be called, but to put forth himselfe and to runne even above the ordinarie strength of his age, or 20 else if he be not able, to yeeld his bodie to be led by hand and susteined up by folkes armes, yea and to be caried in a chaire; as the historie doth report of Appius Claudius, who having heard that the Senate of Rome after a great foughten field which king Pyrrhus had won of the Romaines, inclined to accept of articles and capitulations tending to a composition and to peace, could not endure that indignitie, nor containe himselfe, (blinde though he were of both his eyes) but would needs be caried through the common place even to the senat house; and being entred in upon his feet, he stood in the mids of them all and said: My masters, hitherto I have beene grieved for the losse of mine eye-sight, in that I could not see; but now I with that I had lost the use also of mine eares, and that I might not heare the shamefull counsels & coun- 30 ses that you take, besides the lewd exploits that you performe: then partly by reprooving them sharply, and in part by his effectuall reasons and remonstrations exciting them, he wrought so, that perswaded they were presently to resume armes for to fight with Pyrrhus, for the feignoric and empire of Italy. And Solon at what time as the flatterers of Pisistratus wherewith he abused the people of Athens, were openly detected and discovered, and that it appeared once that he aimed at nothing else but to usurpe tyrannie over them, and when no man durst make head against him and empeach or crosse his designs, himselfe alone bringing forth armour out of his house, and laying the same in the street before his very doores; cried with a loud voice unto the citizens for to aide him; which when Pisistratus heard, hee sent unto him for to 40 demaund & know upon what assurance that he had, he durst be so bold as thus to do: Mary (quoth he) I presume upon mine old age. Such occurrences as these so necessarie, doe rekindle and set on fire againe old men, who were in maner extinct and cleane dead before, provided, that there remained in them any sparke or breath at all: but in other smaller occasions, an auncient personage shall do well and wisely to excuse himselfe otherwhiles, and refuse base or vile ministeries, wherein greater toyle and paines groweth unto them that be employd therein, than profit and commoditie doth accrue unto the parties for whose sake they be undertaken. It falleth out also sometimes, that if he stay until he be called and fought unto, until he be desired, & that they fend to seeke for him at his house, he shall win more credit and authoritie among his citizens by comming among them in the end at their request: and say that he be present in place, he shall be silent himselfe for the most part & suffer younger men to speake, as being the judge of civill 50 contention and emulation among them, provided alwaies that the same exceed not a certaine meane; for then hee shall reproove them mildly, after a kind & loving sort cut off all opinionative debates, all head-strong opinions, all opprobrious tearmes and heat of choler. Now the advices and opinions delivered of any matter in question, his part is to comfort and encourage him that commeth short of the point, not reprooving and blaming him at all, but rather reaching him how to do better against another time, yea and to praise him boldly, who hath done well, and suffer his owne selfe willingly to take the woofe and be overcome, giving the place to some many times, and not disdaine to be overmarched and perswaded by reason: to the end

end that they may take the better heart and be more bold, and ready to helpe out and supplie others in their defects, and that with good words and faire language, like as that old Nestor did in Homer:

*Of all the Greeks there is no man,
Who blame these words or gaine say can:
But yet forsooth you say not all,
Nor come are to the finall.
For why? you seeme but young by your visage,
And well my sonne you may be for your age.*

Moreover, this were more civilly done, nor to reprove and checke them openly nor in publicke place, although it be without any great biting and nipping, which is enough to abate and cast downe the courage of yong men; but rather apart and privately, especially such as be well framed and disposed by nature to government of State another day; instructing and leading them gently into the right way, setting before their eyes some excellent sayings, examples and inventions tending to policie, and inciting them alwaies to good and honest enterprises, heartening and inbolding them by that meanes, that they may shew a lively and light some spirit, and even at the beginning, making the people catch a liking and love unto them, and be more gentle and tractable afterwards: like as it is the manner of those, who when they teach yong men to sit and ride an horse, bring them first one that is gentle and easie to be mounted upon; now if peradventure one of them at his first entrance do faile and catch a fall, he must not let him lie along, and so breake the heart of a youth for ever, but lift him up and set him on his feet againe, yea, and give him comfortable and gracious words. Thus did Aristides in times past by Cimon, and Meneptilus by Themistocles, whom the people at the first could not abide and brooke, as having but a bad name in the citie for their audaciousness and loose life; and yet these good men stood their friends, brought them into credit, and mightily encouraged them. It is reported also even of Demosthenes himselfe, that the first time he came to the barre, he suffered a disgrace, and was rejected by the people, which he tooke to heart & was wondrously dismayed, untill such time as an ancient and fatherly citizen, one who had sometime heard Pericles making orations to the people, tooke him by the hand & said unto him: That he resembled Pericles for all the world in speech and gesture, and that he did himselfe great wrong upon such an occasion to be faint-hearted and cast downe. Semblably, Enripides after the same manner inboldened Timotheus the Musician, who at his first comming upon the stage was hissed out by the people, as one that by his novelities which he brought up, seemed to violate and breake the lawes of Musicke; but he willed him to be of good cheere for all that, saying: It would not be long after, but he should be able to draw and leade the whole Theater after him as he would, and have the people at his devotion. To be briefe, like as the terme of time limited and appointed for the vestall virgins or nunnas votaries at Rome, was divided into three parts: The first, to learne that which pertained to their religion; the second, to practise; and the third, to teach the yonger. And likewise, as in the citie of Ephesus every one of those maidens vowed to the service of Diana, was at the beginning called Meliere, which is as much to say, as a Novice to be a priestresse hereafter; then Hiere, that is to say, a full priestresse in deed; and last of all, Pariere, which signifieth one that had power to imitate and professe others in the same orders; even so, he that is a perfect politician and States-man, at the first is but a learner and a questionist (as it were) to doe his acts, and so to commence in that profession; but in the end, he teacheth others, he is a regent over novices, and sheweth them the secrets of policie. For to be a president and overseer of others that trie matters or combats, is not to be a fencer or champion himselfe; but he that instructeth and traineth a yong man to publike affaires and matters of State, framing and fitting him for his country another day, in shewing him how

*To frame his words with comely grace,
And deeds performe meet for his place.*

is a good and profitable member of the common-wealth, not in a small and base kinde office, but in a ministerie of great consequence; and to which especially and principally, Lysander having given himselfe and aimed at, accustomed yong men even from their infancie to obey and doe reverence to every elder, no lesse than to a ruler and law-giver. For in what regard els, and to what other purpose said Lysander? That there was no place in the world, where it was so honourable for to be old, as in Lacedemon. Was it because it was permitted and lawfull there for elder persons more than for any other, to till the ground, to put out money to usurie, to play at dice, being set together, and to keepe good fellowship, drinke merrily as they are close at their game, and playing hard at hazard? I suppose neither you nor any man els will so say. But it was because all such, being after a sort in place of rulers, of fatherly governours and tutors over youth, have not a vigilant eye over the publicke affaires onely, but a particular regard also alwaies to every action of yong men, enquiring and learning not lightly, and as it were passing by their whole demeanour, namely, how they exercise their bodies in publicke place; how they play and disport themselves; what their diet is, and how they converse and live together, shewing themselves dread and terrible to those that do ill, but venerable and desirous to the good; for in truth yong folke alwaies observe & looke after them, and to such they make 10 court; for that ancient persons do labour for to make them better, & augment the generosity of their mind, without all envie. For this passion, as it becometh no time of mans age, howsoever in yong men it be entituled with a number of faire and honest names, to wit, emulation, zeale, and desire of honour; so in olde men it is altogether unreasonab, absurd, rude, savage, unmanly and base. And therefore a man of yeeres, who is a politician, must be very farre off from this humour of envie, and not like unto old runt-trees or dodles, which repining as it were at others, doe manifestly hinder and take away the spring and growth of yong poles and plants which come up under them, or grow neere about them: but contrariwise, he ought to admit and receive them kindly, yea, and to offer himselfe lovingly unto those that make toward him and be glad to fort and converse with him; such he ought to enforce, to direct, to daide and leade by 20 the hand, yea, and to cherish and nourish them, not onely with good instructions, sage counsels and wise admonitions, but also in yeelding unto them the place and meanes to exercise some functions of government, whereby there may grow unto them some honour and glorie, in preferring them to those charges and commissions which be not hurtfull to the State, but pleasing and acceptable to the common people. As for others, which at the first entrie be untoward and shew some resistance, be difficult, dangerous and hard to be achieved (like unto some medicines and potions which presently doe gnaw and wring the bellie, or make the stomacke sick) and whereof the honour and profit ensueth long after; it is not good to put such into yong mens hands, nor to helpe them to such hard bargaines, ne yet to expose them raw as they be and unacquainted, to the mutinous exclamations and obloquies of the rude multitude, 30 which is hard to be pleased; but rather he himselfe is to undergoe the displeasure and ill-will of the people for the weale publicke; for this will cause the yonger sort to be more affectionate unto him, and better willing a great deale to enterprise all other services. But over and besides all that hath bene delivered already, this would be well remembered, that to administer and governe the common-wealth, lieth not onely in bearing an office, or going in ambassage, or in crying with a loud voice to an assembly, or in the pulpit or tribunall for publicke orations, to fare as if he were mad and out of his wits, in vehement preaching to the multitude, or in penning a number of decrees, acts and edicts, wherein the common sort suppose that all policie and government doth consist, like as they imagine also; that to be a Philosopher, is nothing els, but to discourse and dispute in the schooles at certaine times of philosophical points aloft 40 in a chaire, and reade lecture at their houres out of their books, and in the meane while be ignorant of that civill administration and philosophie which is continually scene in works and daily actions. For this were all one, according to Dicarchus, as if one should say, that they only walked, who fetched many turnes up and downe in galleries, and not they, who went into the country on foot, or visited their friends. But wee must thinke, that to governe a common-wealth, is very like unto the profession of Philosophy: for Socrates was not to be thought a Philosopher onely, when he caused stooles and formes for to be made readie to sit upon, against a conference, or when he sat him downe himselfe in a chaire, or when he observed precisely the houres of lecture, of disputation, or of walking in the schooles, which were appointed for his disciples and familiar followers; but also otherwhiles, when he was at his game and play, as it fell 50 to, when he dranke and eat, when he was in warfare or in the campe with some, bargaining, buying and selling with others; and finally, when he was in prison, and even then, when as he drunke that cup of hemlocke for his poison; having taught and proved plainly before, that mans life at all times, in all parts, in every occasion and accident, and generally in all affaires admitteth the use of Philosophie. And even so, we are to make account of civill government; namely, to thinke that fooles or leud persons doe not administer the common-weale, either when they be Generals of armies, or L.L. Chancellors, or when they seeme to leade the people after them with their eloquent tongue; but rather raise tumult and sedition among them, or flatter and insinuate into their favour, or declare for ostentation, or els execute some charge and office, and do that which they do compelled by force. Whereas contrariwise, a good and true politician in deed, who affecteth his citizens, loveth his country, hath a care and heedfull regard of the weale-publicke, although he never be clad in his rich coat of armes, nor have the roiall mantle of estate upon him, yet he is daily and hourelly employed in the administration of publicke affaires, inciting and exhorting to action those that are sufficient, instructing such as be unskillfull and wanting, assisting as many as come to him for counsell, reclaiming them who are ill given and about to practise mischief, confirming and encouraging those who be well minded, and shewing evidently in effect, and not for forme and fashion, that he is amused and wholly bent upon the good of the State: not because there is to grow thereby any interest to him or his, or in regard that he is called by name to go first into the Theater, or to be the principall and first man in the assemblie of counsell, or otherwise by way of recreation, as if he came thither to see plaies & games, or to heare some pleasant musicke when he is there; but contrariwise, when he cannot be present personally, yet to be there in spirit and advice; and after he hath intelligence of the proceedings there, to approve some things well done, and to shew himselfe displeased in other things. For neither Aristides the Athenian, nor Cato the Roman, were in place many times of chiefe government, yet they ceased not for all that, during their whole life, to be in action for the good and service of their countries. And Epaminondas achieved (I must needs say) many noble acts and valiant exploits, whiles he was capitaine generall for Beotia; howbeit, one act there is reported of his, when he was neither generall nor in any office at all, which he exploited in Theffalie, not inferior to any one of his other worthy deeds: for at what time as the capitaines of Thebes had engaged a battalion or regiment to farr into a difficult place and a ground of much disadvantage, whereby the enemies charged sore upon them so violently, that they were in great affright, and ready to be defeated, he being in the forefront among the footmen heavily armed, was called backe, and at his first coming appeared all the trouble & affright of the army, and put them in assured hope with his very precence: afterwards he set in order and arranged in battel-ray, that Squadron which had broken their ranks and were in confusion, delivered them easily out of this freight and difficult passage, and made head againe upon the enemies, who hereupon were so daunted, that they changed their minds and retired. Also when Agis the king of the Lacedaemonians led his armie in ordinance of battell ready to fight with his enemies in Arcadia, there was one ancient Spartane cried aloud unto him, and said: My lord, you thinke to remedie one mischief by another: (giving him thereby to understand, that this meaning was by this present and unseasonable forwardnesse of his, in giving battell unto the enemy, for to salve and cure (as it were) his former speedy retreat and departure from the siege before the citie Argos, according as Thucydides reporteth in his storie) which when Agis heard, he gave credit unto the man, retired presently, but afterwards he had the victory. This Agis caused his chaire of estate to be set every day before his palace gate, and many times the Ephori would rise from their Consistorie, and repaire unto him thither, for to aske his advice, and consult with him about the affaires of greatest importance; for he seemed to be a man of great reach, and is renowned in the histories for a most wise and sage prince. And therefore upon a time, after that the strength of his bodie was utterly decayed, in such sort as for the most part of the day he kept his bed and stirred not forth; when the Ephori sent unto him and requested that he would give them meeting in the common hall of the citie, he arose out of his bed, and strained himselfe to walke thither; but when he was gone a prettie way with much paine and difficultie, he chanced to meet with certaine little boies in the street, and demanded of them, whether they knew any thing more powerfull than the necessitie to obey their master; and when they answered No, he made this account, that his impotence ought to be the end and limit of his obedience, and so returned backe immediately to his owne house. For surely, ones good will ought not to shrink before his power; but when might faileth, the good will would not be forced further. Certes, it is reported that Scipio both in war abroad & also in civill affaires at home, used the counsell of Caius Laelius, in so much as some there were, who gave out and said, that of all those noble exploits Scipio was the actour, but Laelius the authour. And Cicero himselfe confesseth, that in the bravest & most honourable counsells which he exploited during his consulship, by the means whereof he saved his country, he consulted with Publius Nigidius the Philosopher. So that we may conclude, that in many kindes of government and publicke functions, there is nothing that impeacheth and hindereth old men, but that they may well enough shew their service to the common-wealth, if not in the best simply, yet in good good words, sage counsell, libertie and authoritie of franke speech and carefull regard, according as the Poets say: for they be not our feet, nor our hands, nor yet our whole bodie and the strength thereof, which are the members and goods onely of the common-weale; but first and principally, the soule and the beauties thereof, to wit, justice, temperance and prudence; which if they come slowly and late to their perfection, it were absurd and to no purpose, that men should enjoy house, land and all other goods and heritages, and should not themselves procure some profit and commoditie to their common country, by reason of their long time which bereaveth them not so much of strength able for to execute outward ministeries, as it addeth sufficiency of those faculties which are requirit for rule and command. Loe, what the reason was that they portraied those Hermes, that is to say, the statues of Mercurie, in yeeres, without either hands or feet; howbeit, having their naturall parts plump and stiffe; giving us thereby covertly to understand, that we have least need of olde mens labour and corporall travell, so that their words be active, and their speeches full of seed and fruitfull, as it is meet and convenient.

THE APOPTHEGMES OR NOTABLE SAYINGS OF KINGS, PRINCES AND GREAT CAPTAINS.

The Summarie.

IF speech be the signe and lively picture of the minde, as it is indeed, a man may judge by these Apophthegmes or notable Sayings, and collected here together, how excellent in feats of armes, in politike government, or otherwise particularly these personages were, who are here represented unto us; like as some speciall acts entered among their sayings doe also shew. Two sorts of people there be who abuse the fruit that good men might draw out of the consideration & reading of these discourses. The one be certaine glorious persons, who upon a vaine desire of outward shew, and to be seene, and for no other intent, following Acleps crowd, trim themselves with the plumes and feathers of others: these have gotten together a heape and store-house as it were of wise sayings from ancient times, whereby they might be conspicuous, and seeme to be of some valour and reputation among those who have not wit enough to see into them, and know what they are. The other are hypocrites; who having a loathsome stinke and bitter gall in the heart, pretend sweetnesse and bonie at the end of their tongue, and all to seduce their neighbours, or rather to deceive their owne selves, for that they have never any regard of their owne duties.

But: here in this discourse there is to be seene nothing affected, nothing borrowed from others, nor farr set, but there is represented unto us a certaine open, simple & admirable nature in this diversitie of grave, pleasant & learned speeches, wherein sweetnesse is mingled with profit, for to fit all persons, and to be aptly applied unto their manners and behaviour, of what calling and degree soever they be in the world. Item, herein are represented acts proceeding from great wit, deep reach, and high conceit, of valour, of equitie, modestie, good disposition, and singular civility in the whole course and management of mans life: the which are proposed and manifested unto us to this end, that the wisdom and bounty of the almighty might so much the better appeere, in that he hath vouchsafed such ornaments to publike States, for to maintain and uphold mans life amid those confusions which were brought into the world by occasion of sin. Moreover, this first collection may well be divided into five principall parts, whereof The first containeth the notable sayings & deeds of the kings of Persia, and other strange nations. The second of the governors and potentates of Sicilie. The third of the Macedonian kings, and namely of Alexander the great and his successors. The fourth of the great himselfe wounded in fight, he seized upon his enemies body, & brought him perforce armed as he was alive, out of his galley into his owne. Being encamped in the land of his friends and confederates, yet nevertheless he fortified his campe with a deepe trench and high rampar round about verie carefully; and when one said unto him, what needs all this? and whom are wee to feare? The woorthie speech (quoth he) that can come out of a captaines mouth is this: Had I wist, or I never looked for such a thing. As he was putting his armie in array, for to give battell unto the Barbarians; he said that he feared nothing at all, but that they should not take knowledge of Iphierates, whose verie name and preface was enough to affright all their enemies. Being accused of a capitall crime, he said unto the Sycophant who had enformed and drawn a bill of enditement against him: Canst thou tell what thou doest good fellow? when the citie is environed with warre on everie side, thou perfwadest the people to consult about me, and not to take counsell with me. Harmolitus (who was descended from the race of that ancient and noble Harmodius) reproched him one day for his meane parentage, as being come from an house of base degree: The noblenesse (quoth he) of my line beginneth in me, but thine endeth in thee. An orator making a solemne speech in the assembly of the people, grew to these tearmes with him before them all: And what are you sir, if we may be so bold as to know, that you beare your selfe so bigge, and thinke so well of your selfe, are you a man at armes, are you an archer, a pike man, or a footman or what are you? I am not indeed (quoth he) any of these; but he I am, who knows how to command and direct all these?

TIMOTHEUS had the name to be a fortunate captaine, rather than otherwise a speciall warrior; and some who envied his good estate, shewed him a picture, wherein certaine cities were entrapp'd, and of themselves fallen into the compasse of net and toile, whiles hee lay asleepe; whereupon he said unto them: Consider now, if I can catch and take such cities lying asleepe, what shall I be able to doe when I am awake? When one of these venturous and too forward captaines, shewed upon a glorious braverie unto the Athenians, what a wound he had received upon his bodie: But I (quoth he) my selfe was a greatly abashed and ashamed one day, being your captaine generall before the citie of Samos, that a short discharge from the walles, light but nere unto me. When the orators highly praised and recommended captaine Chares, laying: Lo what a brave man is here to make the generall of the Athenians, shewing his goodly personage. Timotheus answered againe with a loud voice: Never say Generall, but rather a good stout groom to carrie the trulle of a captaines bedding after him.

CHARRIAS was wont to say, that they were the best captaines who had most intelligences of their enemies defeignings & proceedings. Being accused together with Iphierates of treason, he gave not over for all that, to frequent the publicke place of exercises, and to take his dinner at his accustomed howers: and when Iphierates rebuked him for being so rechelesse, standing in such danger as he did; hee answered him in this manner: In case the Athenians proceede against us otherwise than well, they shall put you to death, all foule and fasting, but me full and faire cleane washed, and having well dined. This was his ordinarie speech: That an armie of flags and hindes having a lion for their leader, was better than an armie of lions led by a flag.

HEGESIPPUS surnamed Crobylus, solicited and incited the Athenians to take armes against King Philip: and when one spake unto him aloud from out of the assembly: What Sir, wilt thou that we draw upon us war? Yea verily (quoth he) and bring in among us blacke mourning robes, solemne and publicke obsequies, yea and funeral orations too, if we desire to live free still, and not to be servile and subject to the Athenians.

PYTHEAS being but yet verie young, presented himselfe one day in open place to crosse and contradict the publicke decrees which had passed by the peoples voices, in the honour of King Alexander; what saith one unto him: Darest thou presume, so young as you are to speake of these lo weightie matters? And why not (quoth he) seeing that Alexander whom you will needs make a god by your suffrages, is younger than my selfe?

PHOCION the Athenian was a man of so laied and constant behaviour, that he was never seene of any person, either to laugh or weepe. Upon a time in a great assembly of the citie, one said unto him: You are verie sad and pensive Phocion, it seemeth you are in a deepe studie. Guesse againe (quoth he) and guesse not so; for I am indeed studying and devising with my selfe how I may cut-off somewhat of that which I have to speake unto the Athenians. The Athenians underloody by an oracle that they had one man among them in the citie, who was thwart & contrary to the opinion & advice of all others: Now when they caused diligent search & enquiry quie to be made for this fellow, and cried out upon him in great furie whosoever he was; Phocion stood up, and with a loud voice: I am the very man (quoth he) seeke no further; for I am he alone, who am nothing at all pleased with whatsoever the people either doth or faith. One day, when he had delivered his advice in a frequent assembly of the people, he pleased the whole audience very well, and seeing that they all with one accord approved his speech, he was abashed thereat, and turning toward his friends: What? (quoth hee) have I let fall and escaped some words that are not good, and otherwise than I meant? For the better furnishing of this solemnitie, they demanded of every man a contribution of money toward it: all others gave liberally, only Phocion after he had bene called upon by name sundry times to do the like, in the end said thus unto them: I would be ashamed to give any thing (I trow) unto you, and not be able to pay him there, pointing with his finger to an usurer, unto whom he was indebted. When Demades said unto him: The Athenians will one of these daies kill thee, if they fall once into their furious fits: True indeed (quoth he) they will kill me in their mad mood, but thee they will put to death when they be come againe into their right wits. Ariflogon the sycophant or false promotor, being condemned to death for troubling men with wrongfull imputations, and at the point to be executed within the prison, sent unto Phocion, requesting him to come and speake with him; but Phocions friends would not let him goe to talke with such a leaud and wicked wretch: Why (quoth he unto them) in what place may honest men more willingly and better speake with Ariflogon? When the Athenians were highly offended and angrie with the Bizantines, for that they would not receive into their citie captaine Chares, whom they had sent with a power for to aid them against King Philip, Phocion came among them, and said: That they were not to be displeased with their confederates for being mistrustfull, but rather with such captaines as they mistrusted: upon which remonstrance of his, hee was immediatly himselfe chosen captaine; who being admitted and well trusted by the Bizantines, defended them so valiantly against King Philip, that he forced him to raise his siege, and retire from thence without effect. King Alexander the great sent unto him a present of one hundred talents; but he demanded of the messengers that brought it, why the king their master sent unto him alone, considering there were so many Athenians besides himselfe; they answered: It was because he esteemed him to be the only honest and vertuous man among them all: Why then (quoth he) could not hee let me both to seeme and also to be a good man still? Alexander upon a time demanded of the Athenians certaine gallies; whereupon the people called unto Phocion by name, for to give his advice, and to counsell them what was best to be done in this case: then he stood up and said: My counsell unto you is this; That you make meanes either to be your selves the stronger in armes, or els at the least well friended by them who are mightier than you. When a brute was blazed abroad, without any certaine author, that King Alexander the Great was deceased, the orators at Athens mounted the pulpits by-and-by, and strave avie who could perswade the people most, even in all haste to put themselves in armes and rebell; but Phocion was of a contrary minde to them all; and his opinion was; That they should stay and rest quiet, until more assured newes came of his death: For (saith he) if he be dead to day, he will be so to morow, yea and afterwards also. When Leosthenes had set the citie all upon warre, feeding the peoples hearts with great hopes of recovering their freedom and the sovereignty of all Greece, Phocion compared these projects of theirs unto the Cypres trees: For they (quoth hee) be faire, straight and tall, but not a whit offruit do they beare: howbeit, when the Athenians at the first sped well in sundrie battels and wan the field, whereupon the citie made sacrifices unto the gods for the good newes thereof, some would come unto him, and say: How now Phocion, are you not pleased herewith? and would you with all undone againe? I am contented very well (quoth he) that it hath so fallen out, but yet I repent never a whit of my former counsell. The Macedonians, immediatly after this, made rodes into the countrey of Asia, and beganne to overrun, harrie and spoile all the sea coasts: for remedie whereof, he caused all the lustie men of the citie, who were of age to beare armes, to enter into the field; and when many of them came running unto him, some calling upon him to seize such an hill, others as instant with him to put his men in battell-ray in such a place: O Hercules (quoth he) what a number of captaines doe I see, and how few good souldiers? howbeit, he gave the enemies battell, wan the victorie, and slew Necton the captaine generall of the Macedonians in the place. Not long after, the Athenians being vanquished in warre, were constrained to receive a garrison from Antipater, and Antimachus captaine of the said garrison sent unto him in free gift certaine money; wherewith he being offended, said: That neither Menillus was better than Alexander, nor the cause so good, for which he should take any gift at his hand at this present, considering that he refused the like from Alexander. Moreover, Antipater was wont to say: That he had two friends at Athens, the one of whom, to wit, Phocion, he could never persuade to take any thing; and the other, who was Demades, he could not satisfie whatsoever he gave him. When Antipater was in hand with him to do a thing which was not just: ' You cannot (quoth he) Antipater, have me to be your friend and a flatterer to. After the death of Antipater, when the Athenians had recovered their libertie and free state or popular government, concluded it was and pronounced in a generall assembly and counsell of the people, that Phocion together with his friends and associates, must suffer death: as for the rest, they went weeping and lamenting as they were led to execution, but Phocion marched gravely, and gave not a word: now as he was going upon the way, one of his enemies met him and spet upon his face; whereupon he turned backe to the magistrates, and said: Is there no man here to repress the insolencie and villanie of this wretched varlet? one of them who were to suffer with him, tooke on and tormented himselfe exceedingly: What (quoth he to him) Euippus,<sup>k</sup> doth it not thee good that thou goest to take thy death with Phocion? And when the deadly cup was presented to him to drinke his last draught of hemlocke, he was asked the question, whether he had any more to say or no: then addressing his speech unto his sonne: I charge thee (quoth he) and beseech thee, not to cary any ranckor and malice in thy heart to the Athenians for my death.

PISTRATUS, a tyrant of the Athenians, being advertised that some of his friends having revolted and conspired against him, had seized upon the fort called Phyle, went towards them, carying himselfe about at his backe a fardell of his bedding, and the furniture thereto belonging: whereupon they demanded of him what he would? I come (quoth he) with an intent either to persuade you to returne with me, or else with a resolution to tarry here with you myselfe; and therefore have I brought my baggage with me. He was advertised that his mother loved a yong man, who secretly kept her and used to lie with her; howbeit in great feare, and refusing her company many times; whereupon he invited the man to supper, and after supper, he asked him how he did, and how he liked his entertainment? Gaily well (quoth he: Thou shalt (quoth Pisistratus) finde no woofe every day so thou content and please my mother. Thrasibulus cast a good liking and fancie to his daughter; and as he met her one time upon the way, bestowed a kisse upon her; whereat her mother was offended, so as she exasperated her husband against him for it: but he mildly answered her in this wise: Why woman, if we set our selves against them that love us and grow to malice them, what shall we doe to those who hate us? and so he gave the maiden in mariage to Thrasibulus. Certaine lustie yoonkers after they had taken their cups well, went in a maske and plaid the fooles through the citie, and chauncing to meete with his wife, abused her both in worde and deed very unbecomely and dishonestly; but the morrow after they came weeping before Pisistratus, acknowledging their fault, and craving pardon; who made them this answer: As for you, endeavour to be more wife and sober from hence forth: ' But I assure you, my wife yesterday went no whither abroad, nor stirred out of her dores. When hee was about to marrie a second wife; the children whom he had by the former, demanded of him, whether he were in any respect discontented with them; that he should in despight of them espouse another: No, (quoth he) that is the least of my thought; but cleane contrary it is, because I like and love you so well, I would willingly have more children to resemble you.

DEMETRIUS, surnamed Phalerem, counselled king Ptolomus to buy and reade those books which treated of policie and government of kingdomes and seigneories; for that which courtiers and minions durst not say unto their princes, was written within those books.

LYCURGUS, who did set downe and establish the lawes of the Lacedaemonians, accustomed his citizens to wear their haire long: For that (saith he) side haire, maketh those who are faire, seeme more faire and amiable; but those who were foule more hideous and terrible. In so the reformation of the Lacedaemonian State, some one there was who persuaded him to erect the popular government called Democracy, wherein everie one in his course hath as much authorities as another: unto whom hee answered: Begin thou first to set up this government in thine owne house. He ordained that in building of houses there should be used nothing but the sawe & the axe: For that (quoth he) it were a shame to bring into houses so simple builded, any plate of silver and gold, rich hangings, carpets and furniture of beds, or costly and sumptuous tables. He forbad his citizens to fight at buffets, or to enter combat in that generall exercise of of hand, foot, teeth and all together, called Pancratium, to the end that they should not accustom themselves so much as in sport and game to faint, give over, or yeeld themselves overcome. Likewise he debarrd them from encountering often with their very enemies; for feare they should make them more warlike and better soldiers: Whereupon afterwards when king Agesslaus was brought out of the battell very grievously wounded; one Antalcides said unto him: You have met with a fairer reward at the Thebans hand, and no lesse than you well deserve, for schooling and reaching them to fight whether they will or no.

CHARILLUS the king, being asked the question why Lycurgus made so few lawes? answered thus: That they who used few words, had no need of many lawes. One of those slaves whom they call Elotes, had behaved himselfe somewhat too insolently and knavishly against him: Now I sweare by the two twins (quoth he) Castor and Pollux, were I not angrie, I would doe thee to death out of hand. unto one who demanded the reason why the Lacedaemonians ware long haire: It is (quoth he) because of all trimming and ornaments of the bodie, it costeth least.

TELECHUS king of Lacedaemon answered unto a brother of his, who complained unto him of the citizens of Sparta, saying: They use me more uncivilly and uncourtiously, than they doe you: It is for nothing else (quoth he) but because you know not how to endure and put up any wrongs.

THEOPOMPUS, being in a certaine citie, was shewed by one of the inhabitants the wals, and demanded whether he thought them not to be faire and high: Faire, (quoth he?) no in verie truth, kept though they be by none but women.

ARCHIDAMUS during the time of the Peloponnesian warre, when as the allies and confederates of Lacedaemon requested him to set them downe a certaine taxe and rate which they were to contribute toward the charges thereof; answered them in this manner: Warre knoweth not how to be gaged and feed within the teddar.

BRASIDAS chaunced to finde a mouse among certaine dried figs, which bit him so, as he was glad to let her goe; and thereupon said to those about him: See, how there is nothing so little, but it is able to make shift and save the owne life, if it have but the heart to defend it selfe against those who assaile it. In a certaine skirmish his hap was to be hurt with the head of a par-tisane, or javelin, which went through his brain; and when he had drawne it out of his wound, with the very staffe and steile of it, he slew his enemy: now when one asked him how it came to passe that he was thus wounded? Forsooth because my shield deceived and betrayed me. His fortune was afterwards to die in the country of Thrace, whither he had bene sent to deliver and set free the Greeks who inhabited those marches: And the embassadours who were sent from the said parts to Lacedaemon, went to visit his mother: who at the first asked them whether Brasidas her sonne did valiantly and like a man? the embassadours highly praised him, in-somuch as they said; That there would never be his like againe: Oh, you are mightily deceived (quoth she:) true it is that Brasidas was a brave and valiant man, but Lacedaemon hath many faire better men than he by farre.

King AGIS was wont to say, that the Lacedaemonians used not to aske how many their enemies were, but in what place they were. At Manius he was forbidden to strike a battell, because the enemies were many in number to one: It must needs be (quoth he) that whosoever would rule and command many, should likewise fight with many. unto them who greatly commended the Eliens for observing such good order and formality at the Olympick games: What great marvell is it (quoth he) if the Eliens in foure yeeres space use justice one day? but when they continued still in their praise and commendations: What wonder is it (quoth he) if the Eliens use a good thing well, to wit justice. A naughtie fellow there was and a troublesome, who importuned him exceeding much, by asking him oftentimes, who was the best man of all the Spartans? Mary even he (quoth he) that is most unlike to thee. To another who questioned with him and would needs know how many the Lacedaemonians were in number: Enough (quoth he) to drive out all lewd and wicked persons: And when another asked him the same question, he answered: Thou wouldest say they were a great number if thou sawest them fight.

LYSANDER would not accept of the rich and sumptuous robes, which Diogenes the Tyrant sent unto his daughters, saying: I am afraid that these garments will make them looke the fouler. Some there were who reprooved and blained him, for that he exploited the most part of his acts by craft and subtiltie, as if it were an unworthie thing for one who vaunted himselfe to be of the race of Hercules: unto whom he answered: That where the lions skin would not serve, it were good to fow thereto a little piece of a foxes case. There was some difference and debate between the Argives and Lacedæmonians about their confines; and it seemed that the Argives alleged better reasons, and brought forth more pregnant evidences for the land in question; but he drawing out his sword: They (quoth he) who are the better men at handling this, are those who plead the better for the bonds of their territorie. The Lacedæmonians found much difficultie in assaulting the walles of Corinth; and when he sawe them draw backe and go unwillingly about that service, he chanced to espie at the very same time an hare to start from within the trench and towne ditch; whereupon he tooke occasion thus to say: why make you doubt to give the assault unto the walles of those men, who are so idle as to suffer hares to sleepe within the verie precinct of their walles? There was a certaine Megarian, who in the generall assembly of all the Sates of Greece, spake unto him his minde freely and boldly; unto whom he answered thus: Thy words have need of a citie, that is to say, that Megara, wherof he was a citizen, was not able to make good and maintaine his words.

* Brave words without means to effect matters, are vouch naught.

Agessilaus used to say: That the inhabitants of Asia, (to speake of free men) were but bad, & namely so long as they enjoyed libertie; marie they be passing good slaves (quoth he.) These Asians had a custome to call the King of Persia the Great King: And why (quoth Agessilaus) is he a greater king than I, if he be not more just and temperat? Being demanded his opinion as touching Fortitude & Justice, whether of them was the better vertue: We have no need or use (quoth he) of Fortitude if we were all just. Being enforced to breake up his campe, and dislodge one night in great haste out of his enemies countrey, and seeing a boy whom hee loved well, weeping and all blubbered with teares, for that he was left behind, &c could not follow by reason of weaknes: It is (quoth he) an hard matter to be pitifull and wise both at once. Meneceates the physician who would entitle himselfe with the name of Jupiter, wrote a letter unto him with this superscription; Meneceates Jupiter unto King Agessilaus long life, &c. Unto whom hee returned this answer: King Agessilaus unto Meneceates better health: meaning in deed that he was braine-sicke. The Lacedæmonians having defeated those of Athens with their allies and confederates neere unto the citie of Corinth: when he heard what a number of enemies lay dead in the field: O unhappie and unfortunate Greece (quoth he) that hath destroyed so many men of her owne, as had bene able to have subdued all the Barbarians in the world. Having received an answer from the oracle of Jupiter at Olympia, according to his minde; the great Lords controllers, called Ephori, willed him also to consult with the oracle of Apollo as touching the same: when he was therefore at Delfos, he demanded of the said god, whether he were not of the same minde as his father was? When he sued for the deliverance of a friend of his who was taken prisoner, and in the hands of Idrieus a prince of Caria, he wrote unto him about it in this manner: If Nicias have not trespassed, deliver him for justice sake; if he have transgressed, deliver him for my sake; but howsoever it be, in any wise deliver him. He wast requested one day to heare a man sing, who could marvellous lively and naturally counterfeit the voice of a nightingale: I have heard (quoth he) the nightingale her selfe many a time. After the overthrow at the battell of Leuctres, the lawe ordained that as many as saved themselves by their good footmanship, should be noted with infamy: but the Ephori fore-seeing, that in so doing the citie would be dispeopled and empty, were willing to abrogat & disanul this ignominie, and for this purpose declared Agessilaus for law-giver: who going into the market place, and mounting up into the pulpit, ordained that from the next morrow forward, the lawes should remaine in their ancient force and vertue. Sent he was upon a time to aide the King of Aegypt, where he together with the King was besieged by the enemies who were many more in number than they, & had begun to cast a great trech about their camp, & so beleaguered them that they could not escape: Now when the king commaunded him to make a sally upon them, and to keepe them battell: I will not (quoth he) empeach our enemies, but that they may (as I see them go about it) willingly fight with us so many to so many: and finding that their trench wanted but a litle of both ends meeting and joining together; in that verie distance and space betweene, he set his souldiers in battell array, and so comming to encounter on even hand he defeated his enemies. When he died, he charged his friends to make no image nor statue of him: For if I have (quoth he) done any thing in my life worthy of remembrance, that will be a sufficient monument and memoriaill for me after my death: if not, all the statues and images in the world shall never be able to perpetuate my memorie.

* Vertue immortalizeth a man and not works in stone, wood or brasse.

ARCHIDAMVS

ARCHIDAMVS the first time that ever he saw the shot discharged out of an engin or battering peece which had bene newly brought out of Sicilie, cried out aloud: O Hercules the prowesse and valour of man I see well is now gone for ever.

* The invention of warre engins diminisheth valor.

When Demades mocking at the Lacedæmonian courtlaffes, said merrily; That they were so little and short, as that the jugglers and plaiers at leger-damein, were able to swallow them downe whole as they be. Agessilaus the younger answered verie fely and said: Yet as short as they be, the Lacedæmonians can reach their enemies verie well with them. The Ephori charged him upon a time to deliver vp his souldiers into the hands of a traitour: I will beware I crow (quoth he) to commit another mans souldiers to him who betrayed his owne.

CLEOMENES when one promised to give him certaine cocks of the game, so courageous, that they would with fighting die in the place and never give over: Give me not (quoth he) those that will die themselves, but such rather as in fight will make others to die.

PAEDARETVS missing the place to be chosen one of the great counsell consisting of three hundred, returned from the assembly verie joycond merrie and smiling: I am well appaied (quoth he) that in the citie of Sparta there be found three hundred better men and more sufficient than my selfe.

DAMONIDAS being by the master of the Revels set in the last place of the dance: Well fare thy heart (quoth he) thou hast devised a good meanes to make this place honourable.

NICOSTRATVS captaine of the Argives, being sollicit by Archidamus to take a good round summe of money for to deliver up unto him by treason, a place wherof he had the keeping, with a promise also, that he should espouse and wed what damosell he would himselfe chosse in all Sparta, excepting those of the blood-royall, made him this answer: You are not (quoth he) of the race of Hercules; for that Hercules went thorow the world, punishing and putting to death in all places, malefactors and wicked persons: but you go about to make those naught and leaud who are good and honest.

* EYDAMONIDAS seeing in the great schoole Academie, Xenocrates an auncient man among other yoong scholars, students in Philofophie, and understanding that he sought for vertue: And when will he use vertue (quoth he) if he have not yet found it? Another time hearing a philofopher to mainteine this paradox: That a learned Sage was onely a good captaine: Brave words (quoth he) and a marvelous position; but the best is, he that holdeth it, never in his life heard the found of a trumpet in the campe.

* To become much not a clerk to school of names.

ANTIOCHUS, one of those controllers in Sparta, named Ephori, being advertized that king Philip had given unto the Massenians their territorie: But hath hee withall (quoth he) given them the meanes to vanquish in battell when they shall be put to it, for to defend the same?

ANTALCIDAS answered unto an Athenian who termed the Lacedæmonians ignorant persons: Indeed (quoth he) it may well be so, for wee are the onely men who have learned of you no evil. Another Athenian contested with him and said: we have driven you manie a time from the river Cephissus, which is in Attica: but he replied againe and said: And we never yet chased you from the river Eurolas which is neere Lacedemon. There was a certaine Rhetorician would needs rehearse an oration which he had made concerning the praise of Hercules: Why (quoth he) was there ever any man that blamed or despised him?

So long as EPAMINONDAS was captaine general of the Thebans, there was never seene in his campe any of these sudden foolish frights, without any certaine cause, which they call Panique Terrors. He was wont to say, that no death was so honourable as to die in the warres: Also that a man of armes or warriour ought to keepe his bodie not exercised after the manner of champions, for to be faire and full; but rather hardned with travel, and made lanke as cometh good soldours. He loved therefore to fight with those enemies who were corpulent; and such soldours as he found in his owne bands grosse & fat, he would be sure to cassier & displace them, if it were for nothing else: For he was wont to say of them, that three or foure bucklers would hardly cover their grand-panch, which bare out so bigge that they could not force for it their privy parts. Moreover, so strict and precise he was in his living, and hated so much all excessse & superfluitie, that one time above the rest being bidded to supper by one of his neighbors, when he saw in the house great provision of viands, cates, juncques, comfutures and sweet perfumes, he said unto him: I had thought you made a sacrifice, and not an expense of superfluitie, and so went his way & would not stay supper. When the head cooke or clerke of the kitchen gave up his account unto him and other his companions in government, of their ordinary charges for certaine daies; he misliked nothing in his bill but the great quantitie of oyle that was spent: and when his colleagues wondered that he should fare so at that; he said unto them: That it was not the cost and expence that hee stood upon, but onely this, that so much oyle should goe down mens throats. The city of Thebes upon a time made a great publike feast, and besides, privately they were all in their bankers, inviting one another, and meeting in companies to make merrie together: he contrariwise all this while, without being either annointed with oile and sweete perfumes, or clad in his best clothes, all pensive and sad, walked alone thorough the citie; and when one of his familiar friends who met him, wondered thereat, and would needs know why he went so alone and out of order and formalitie: Mary (quoth he) that you all might in securitie follow your drinking and good cheere, and not bee troubled with thinking of any other cares. He had caused a meane man and of base condition to be put in prison for some light trespasse that he had committed, and Pelopidas requested him for to set him at large, but he denied him flatly; howbeit afterwards a woman whom he loved, intreated him, and at her suite he granted his libertie, saying: That in such pettie favours and cutesies as these it became him to gratifie concubines and harlots; but not generals and great warriors. When the Lacedemonians came with a puissant power to make cruell war upon the Thebans, there were brought oracles unto the Thebans from sundrie parts, some promising the victory, others menaling an overthrow: he went up therefore into the tribunall seat and commanded, that the oracles of victorie should be set upon the right hand, and those of discomfiture on the left: when they were thus disposed and bestowed, he stood up, and in this wise spake unto the Thebans: If you will be directed by your captaines, shew obedience unto them, and withall put on a resolution and good heart to encounter your enemies; these heere, (shewing the good oracles on the right hand) be yours; but if for want of courage you cast doubts and start backe for feare of perils, those there, (pointing to the bad oracles on the left hand) are for you. Afterwards as he led the armie into the field, for to meet with the Lacedemonians, it began to thunder; whereat they that were neerest unto him asked, what he thought this might presage and signifie: Surely (quoth he) it betokeneth thus much; That God hath astonished our enemies, and put their braines out of temper, who having such commodious places neere unto them for to encampe in, have pitched here where they are. Of all the honorable and happie fortunes that ever befell unto him, he said; This was most to his hearts joy and contentment; that he had defeated the Lacedemonians in the battell at Leutres, whiles his owne father that begat him, and his mother who bare him were both alive. Being a man who otherwife all his life time used to be seene abroad, fine, neat, & wel anointed, with a cheerefull and merrie countenance also; the morrow after the said battell, he came forth into the publike place, all foule, sullied, heavy and pensive; whereupon, his friends by and by were in hand with him to know, whether any sinister accident was come unto him: None (quoth he) but I perceived yesterday that for the joy of my victorie, my heart was lifted up more than it ought, and therefore to day I doe abate and correct that which was the day before too excessive and out of order: knowing full well that the Spartans used to cover and hide as much as they could such misfortunes, and being desirous to make them see and acknowledge the great losse and overthrow which they had sustained, hee would not in any wise permit them to gather their dead all together, and pile them up in one entire heape; but to every citie he gave leave one after another to entere them; by which it appeared, that there were more of the Lacedemonians slaine by a thousand. Jason a prince and monarch of Thessalie, being allied and confederate with the Thebans, came one day into the citie of Tales, and sent unto Epaminondas a present of two thousand pieces of gold, knowing that indeed he was exceeding poore: this gold would not he receive at his hands; but the first time after that he saw Jason, he came unto him and said: You begun twise to offer me injuries; and in the meane while he borrowed of a certeine burgesse of the citie fiftie drams of silver, for to defray the charges of a journey or expedition which he intended; and therewith entred in armes and invaded Peloponnesus. After this, when the great king of Persia sent him thirtie thousand pieces of gold called Dariques, he was displeased highly with Diomedes, and sharply checked him, asking him if he had undertaken so great a voiage, thinking to bribe and corrupt Epaminondas; and with that commaunded him to deliver this message backe unto the king his master; That so farre forth as he intended and procured good unto the Thebans, hee should make reckoning of him to be his friend without any pennie cost; but if he wrought or practised any losse or displeasure unto them, he would be his enemy. When the Argives were entred into league and amitie with the Thebans, those of Athens sent their ambassadours into Arcadie, to assay if they could draw the Arcadians to side with them:

* Excessive joy in prosperitie ought to be abated.

So

So these ambassadours began to charge and accuse unto them, as well the Argives as the Thebans, in so much as Callistratus the orator, who was their speaker, upbraided both cities, and hit them in the teeth with Orestes and Oedipus: then Epaminondas who sat in this assembly of them in the councell, rose up and said: We confesse indeed (my masters) that in times past there was in our citie one parricide who killed his owne father, like as another in Argos who murdered his owne mother; but when we had chafed and banished them for committing these facts, the Athenians received them both. And when the Spartans had charged the Thebans with many great and grievous imputations: Why my masters of Sparta (quoth Epaminondas) these Thebans, if they have done nothing els, yet thus much they have effected, that you have forgotten your manner of short speech and using few words. The Athenians had contracted alliance and amitie with Alexander the tyrant of Pheres in Thessalie, a mortall enemy of the Thebans, and who promised to the Athenians for to serve them flesh in the market at halfe an obolus a pound weight: And wee (quoth Epaminondas) will furnish the Athenians with wood enough for nothing, to roast and feede the said flesh; for if they begin busily to intermeddle more than we like of, we will fell and cut downe all the trees growing in that cuntry. Knowing well enough that the Boeotians were lost for idleness, he determined and advised to keepe them continually in exercise of armes: now when the time approached for the election of governors, and that they were minded to chuse him their Baotarches, that is to say, the ruler of Boeotia: He well advised my masters (quoth he) what ye do, whiles it lieth in your hands; for if you elect me your captaine generally, make this reckoning, that to warrre you shall. He was wont to call the cuntry of Boeotia, because it lieth plaine and open, the stage and scaffold of warre, saying that it was impossible for the inhabitants to keepe and hold it, so long as they had not one hand within their shield and the other on their sword. Chabrias the captaine of the Athenians having put to foile and defeated some few Thebans about Corinth (who for heat of fight had run disbande and out of aray) made a bravado: for which exploit, as if he had won some great field, he caused a trophae to be erected in memorie of this victorie: whereas Epaminondas scoffed and said: That hee should not have set up a trophaeum there, but rather an hecatæsum, that is to say, the statue of Proserpina, for that in times past it was an ordinary thing to set up the image of Proserpina in manner of a crosse, at the first carrefour or meeting of crosse waies which was found nere unto the gate of a city. When one brought him word that the Athenians had sent an armie into Peloponnesus bravely set out and appointed with new armour: Now surely (quoth he) Antigenidas wil weep and sigh when he knoweth once that Tellis hath gotten him new flutes and pipes to play upon: now this Tellis was a bad minstrell, and Antigenidas an excellent musician. He perceived upon a time that his squire or shield-bearer had received a good piece of money for the ranfome of a prisoner, which was in his hands; whereupon he said unto him: Give me my shield, but goe thou thy waies and buy thee a tavern or victualling house, wherein thou maist leade the rest of thy life, for I see well, that thou wilt no more expose thy selfe to the dangers of warre as before-time, since thou art now become one of these rich and happie men of the world. He was once demanded the question, whom he reputed to be the best captaine, himselfe, Chabrias, or Iphicrates, his answer was: It is hard to judge, so long as we all be alive. At his returne out of the cuntry of Laconia, hee was judicially accused for a capitall crime, together with other captaines joined in commission with him, for holding their charge longer by four moneths than the lawes allowed: as for his companions and colleagues above-said, hee willed them to derive all the fault from themselves, and lay it upon him, as if he had forced them so to doe; but in his owne defence he pleaded thus: Albeit I can not deliver better words than I have performed deeds, yet if I be compelled (as I see I am) to say somewhat for my selfe before the judges, I request thus much at their hands, that if they be determined to put me to death, they would command to be engraven upon the square column or pillar of my sepulchre, my condemnation and the cause thereof, to the end that all the Greekes might know how Epaminondas was condemned to die; for that hee had forced the Thebans against their willes to waste and burne the cuntry of Laconia, which in five hundred yeeres before had never bene forraied nor spoiled; also that hee had repopled the citie of Messene two hundred and thirtie yeeres after it had bene destroyed and left desert by the Lacedemonians: Item, that he had reunited, incorporated and brought into one league all the States and cities of Arcadie; and last of all, that he had recovered and restored unto the Greeks their libertie: for all these acts have bene achieved by us in this voiage: the judges when they heard this speech of his, rose from the bench, and went out of the court laughing heartily; neither would they so much as receive the voices or verdicts dicts to be given up against him. After the last battell that ever he fought, wherein he was wounded to death; being brought into his tent, he called first for Diophantus, and after him for Iolidas, but when he heard that they were both slain, hee advised the Thebans to compound and grow to an agreement with their enemies, as if they had not one capitaine more that knew how to lead them to the warres; and in truth, the event did verifie his words, and bare witness with him that he knew his citizens best of any man.

PELOPIDAS joint capitaine with Epaminondas in the charge of Naotia, when his friends found fault with his neglect in one thing right necessary, to wit, the gathering of a masse of money together: Money indeed (quoth he) is necessary, but for such an one as this Xicomedes here, shewing a poore cripple, maimed, lame and impotent in hand and foot. When he departed from Thebes upon a time to a battell, his wife praised him to have a regard unto his owne safetie: This is (quoth he) an advertisement fit for others; as for a capitaine who hath the place of command, he is to be put in minde for to save those under his charge, and not himselfe. To one of his souldiers, who said unto him: We are fallen among our enemies: And why (quoth he) are we fallen among them more than they among us. Moreover, being treacherously held prisoner, and kept in yrons during a truce, against the law of armes, by Alexander tyrant of the Pheareans, he grew to heat and gave him some hard words, calling him perjured traitour: whereupon the tyrant asked him if he made so great haste to die: Yea (quoth hee) to the end that the Thebans may be more provoked against thee, and that so much the sooner thou maiest be punished for thy disloyaltie. Thebe the tyrants wife came to visit him in prison, and seeing him, said so that they marvelled how hee could be so joyous, being as hee was, a prisoner and bound with chaines: Yea, but I rather wonder at you, that being as you are, at libertie and not bound, you can endure such a wicked wretch as Alexander. When Epaminondas had delivered him out of prison, he said that he tooke himselfe much beholden to Alexander: For now (quoth hee) by his meanes I have made a triall of my selfe and my resolution, more than ever before, and namely, how my heart is settled not against the feare of warre onely but also of death.

* Roman.

MANIUS CURIUS, when one of his souldiers complained, that of the lands conquered from the enemies, he had given to every souldier very little, but had incorporated in the common weale the greatest part of the said demeanes: I would it were Gods will (quoth he) that there were not a Romane who thought that land but little, which is sufficient to nourish and mainteine one man. The Samnites, after that hee had vanquished them in a battell, sent unto him as a present, a good summe of gold: him they found sitting by the fire side, tending the pot, wherein hee boiled certaine rape-roots: and when the Samnite embassadors tendered unto him the said present, he made them this answer: That hee who could content himselfe with such a supper, had no need at all of gold: also that he thought it more honorable to command them who had the gold, than to have gold himselfe.

* Some read thus: said unto Levinus, that Pyrhus, and not the Epirotes had overcome the Romans.

C. FABRICIUS hearing of the overthrow that King Pyrhus had given the Romaines, said: That Pyrhus had overcome Levinus & not the Epirotes vanquished the Romaines. Being sent unto Pyrhus to treat for the deliverance of certaine Romaines taken prisoners, the king offered him a great summe of gold, but he would not receive it: the next morrow Pyrhus commanded that the greatest Elephant which he had, should be brought and set just behind Fabricius without his knowledge, and that suddenly he should be forced to bray, which was done accordingly: whereat Fabricius turning him about, and looking behind him, began to smile and say: Neither thy gold yesterday, nor this beast thy Elephant to day, hath once astonished me. Pyrhus thought to have perswaded him to take his part and to stay with him, with promise that he should have all the authoritie in managing of the affaires next unto himselfe; but he answered him in this sort: This would not be good and expedient for you: and why? when the Epirotes shall know us both well, they will rather have me than you to be their king. When Fabricius was created Consull of Rome, King Pyrhus his physician wrote unto him a letter, wherein he made promise unto him for to kill the king his master with poison if he would. Fabricius sent the verie same letter incontinently unto King Pyrhus, willing him to see by that, how his judgement served not him well to discerne and to make choise of his enemies and his friends. When this ambush was discovered and directed thus unto Pyrhus, which was laid for his life, he caused the said physician to be apprehended, and sent backe those Romaines whom he had prisoners, unto Fabricius without any ransom paid: howbeit Fabricius would not receive them from him as in free gift; for he returned likewise as many of his men who remained prisoners with him: which he did, for that he would not be thought to take take any thing at his hands by way of a reward or recompense for disclosing the foresaid treason: for hee did it not so much to gratifie King Pyrhus and do him a pleasure, as for feare it should be thought that the Romaines practised his death by treacherie, whom they could not vanquish by vertue.

FABIUS MAXIMUS not willing to fight a set battell with Annibal, but by tract of time to spend his armie; which by that meanes grew to a great default of victuals and money: went alwaies as though he dogged and followed him, keeping the rough places and hilly grounds, coasting him otherwhiles, but evermore having him in his eie: for which manner of service many mocked him and called him the Pedagogue of Annibal: but he nothing at all regarding such words, persisted still continually in his designs & counsels particular to himselfe, saying thus to his friends: That he who could not abide a scotte, but feared frumps and reviling words, was a greater coward than he who fled before his enemy. When his colleague or brother in office Minutius, had discomfited certaine of his enemies, in such sort, as there was no talke of him any more, but every man gave out of Minutius, that he indeed was a man worthy of Rome: he said: That he feared more the prosperitie than the adversitie of Minutius: and within a while after, when Minutius was fallen into the danger of an ambush that Annibal had set for him, so as he and all his men had like to have left their bodies dead behinde them, Fabius came speedily to his rescue, and not onely delivered him out of this perill, but also slew a number of his enemies; whereupon Annibal said then unto his familiars about him: Did not I foretell you many times, seeing as I did this cloud lowering upon the tops of the mountains, how it would one time or other powre downe a good shewre upon our heads? After the overthrow at Cannae, when he was chosen consull of Rome together with Claudius Marcellus a valiant and courageous man, who desired nothing more than ever to be fighting with Annibal; he was of a contrary minde, and hoped, that if he were not fought with, his army within a while by delays onely and holding off, would of it selfe come to nothing; so as Annibal would oftentimes say: That he feared more Fabius that fought not, than he did Marcellus who was ever fighting. It was tolde him that he had in his campe a Lucane, who was wont to steale out by night, forth of the campe, for the love of a woman whom he used to visit; but otherwise he heard say, that the man was a right good souldier and woonderfull hardie in armes; whereupon he gave commandment that the woman upon whom this souldier was so enamoured, should be secretly and without the mans knowledge attached and brought unto him: now when she was come, he sent for the souldier aforesaid: I am advertised (quoth he) that thou against the lawes of military discipline, usest many times to lie out of the campe, and I understand likewise full well, that setting that fault aside, thou art a souldier good enough: well, in regard of thy good services, I am content to pardon all that is past, but from henceforth thou shalt abide and tatie with me, for I have a good pawne and suretie within that thou shalt not start; and with that he caused the woman to come forth and appeare, and so he gave her into his hands to be his wedded wife. Annibal held all the citie of Tarentum with a strong garrison, saving onely the castle, but Marcellus by a wile and subtil stratageme, trained him as farre as he could from thence, and then returning with all expedition, was master of the whole towne, and sacked it: in the execution of which service his scribe or chancellour asked him what should be done with the sacred images of the gods among the rest of the pillage: May I let us leave (quoth he) unto the Tarentines their gods, being thus angered as they are with them. When M. Livius, who had the keeping of the castle, wanted and boasted that by his meanes the citie was woone, all the rest who heard him, laughed and mocked him; but Fabius answered: Thou saiest truth indeed, for if thou hadst not lost it once, I had never recovered it againe. After he was stepped farre in yeeres, his sonne was chosen consull, and as he was giving audience in open place and dispatching certaine publicke affaires in the presence of many, Fabius his father being mounted on horsebacke, came toward him; but the sonne sent one of his liectors or hushers before, to command him to alight from his horse: whereat all the rest there present were abashed, and thought it a great shame and unseemly sight; but the olde man dismounting quickly from his horse, came toward his sonne as fast as his yeeres would give him leaue, embraced him and said: Thou hast well done my sonne, to know whom thou dost governe, and to shew that thou art not ignorant what the greatesse is of that charge which thou hast undertaken.

SCIPIO the elder, whensoever he was at any leasure and repose either from military affaires or politike government, employed all that time in his private study at his booke; whereupon he was wont to say: That when he was alone, he had most companie; and when hee was at leasure sure, he had greatest businesse. After hee had woonne by assault the city of New Carthage in Spain, some of his souldiers brought a most beautifull damosell taken prisoner, and her they offered unto him: I would receive her willingly (quoth he) if I were a private person, but being as I am, a capitaine generall, I will none of her. Lying at siege before a certaine citie * situated in a low place, and over which might be seene the temple of Venus, he gave order unto them that by vertue of writs were to make appearance in court, that they should come and plead before him within the said temple, where they should have audience the third day after; which hee made good, for before that day hee had forced the citie. When one demanded of him being in Scitlie, ready to embarke and passe over to Africke, upon what confidence hee presumed so much to crosse the seas with his armada against Carthage: See you not 10 heere (quoth he) 300 men how they disport and exercise them selves armed all in militarie feats of armes, along an high tower situate upon the sea side? I tell you, there is not one of all this number, but if I bidde him, will runne up to the top of this tower, and cast himselfe downe from thence with the head forward. Being passed over sea, and soone after master of the field; when hee had burnt the campes of his enemies, the Carthaginians sent immediately unto him an embassage to treat of peace; in which treatie it was concluded, that they should quit all their vessels at sea, abandon their elephants, and besides pay a good grosse summe of money: But so soone as Annibal was retired out of Italy into Africke, they repented themselves of these capitulations and conditions, for the trust which they had in the forces and person of Annibal: whereof Scipio being advertised, said unto them: That although they would 20 performe the articles of the foresaid agreement, yet the accord should not stand for good, unlesse over and above they paid 5000 talents, because they had sent for Annibal to come over. Now after that the Carthaginians had bene vanquished by him in open battell, they sent new embassadors for to treat of peace againe; but hee commaunded them presently to depart, for that he would never give them audience, unlesse they brought backe unto him lord Terentius, a knight of Rome, and a man of worth and honor, who by the fortune of warre was taken prisoner, and fallen into the hands of the Carthaginians: now when they had brought Terentius, he caused him to sit close by his side in the counsell, and then gave he audience to the foresaid embassadors, and granted them peace. Afterwards when he entred Rome in triumph for this victorie; the said Terentius followed hard after his triumphant chariot, wearing a cap of libertie on his head, like an enfranchised slave, and avowing that he held his freedome by him: 30 and when Scipio was dead, unto all those who accompanied his corps when it was caried forth to sepulture, Terentius allowed to drinke a certaine kinde of mede, made of wine and honie; and for all other complements belonging to an honorable funerall, he tooke order with great diligence; but this was performed afterwards. Moreover, when king Antiochus saw that the Romanes were passed over into Asia, with a puissant armie to make warre upon him, he sent his embassadors to Scipio, for to enter into a treatie of peace: unto whom he answered: This you should have done before, and not at this present, now that your king and master hath already received the bit of the bridle in his mouth, and the saddle with the rider upon his backe. The Senat had granted out a commission unto him that he should take forth certaine money out 40 of the publick chest and chamber of the citie; but when the treasurers would not suffer him that day to open the treasury, for to be furnished from thence; he said: He would be so bold as open it himselfe; Which (quoth he) I may well doe, considering that by my means it was kept fast shut and locked first, for the great quantitie of gold and silver which I have caused to be brought into it. Perilius and Quintus, two Tribunes of the commons, accused him before the people, and laid many grievous matters to his charges; but he in stead of pleading his owne cause, and justifying himselfe, said thus: My masters of Rome, upon such a day as this, I desired in battell the Carthaginians and Annibal, and therefore will I goe my selfe directly from hence with a chaplet of flowers upon my head, up into the Capitoll to sacrifice and give those 50 unto Jupiter for my victorie; meane while, whosoever will give his voice either for or against me, let him doe as he thinketh good: and having thus said, he went out of the court, and all the people followed after him, leaving his accusers to plead there their fill to the bare walls.

T. QUINTIUS, immediately upon his comming to the management of State affaires, grew to such reputation and renowne, that before he had bene Aedile, Prætor, or Tribune of the common-weale, he was chosen Consull of Rome, who being sent as capitaine and lieutenant generall for the people of Rome, to warre against Philip king of Macedonia, was counselled and perswaded to a parle and personall conference first with him: Philip for the better securitie of his owne person, demanded of him hostages: Because (quoth he) the Romanes have heere many capitaines besides you, but the Macedonians have none but my selfe: No marvel indeed (quoth Quintus) that you are heere by your selfe alone, for you have done to death all your kinsfolke and friends. After that he had vanquished in battell king Philip, he caused proclamation to be made in the solemnitie of the Isthmian games; That he restored all the Greeks to their ancient liberties and full freedome, to live from that day forward according to their owne lawes: and thereupon, the Greeks caused all the Romanes to be fought out throughout all Greece, who had bene sold thither for slaves during the warres with Annibal, and having redeemed & bought them againe out of their masters hands for 500 drams a poll, they presented them unto him as a free gift: these followed him in his triumph, with caps upon their heads, as the custome was of such slaves as were newly enfranchised & endued with liberty. The Achæans were minded and fully purposed to enterprize the conquest of the isle Zacynthus: But he admonished them not to goe forth of Peloponnesus, unlesse they would put themselves into evident danger, like unto the Tortoises, when they stretch forth their heads out of their shells. When the brute was blown over all Greece that king Antiochus came with a mightie power, inso much as all men wondered & were affraid to heare what numbers there were of soldiours and fighting men, and what diversitie of armors they brought with them; he made such a speech as this in the generall counsell of the Achæans: It was my chance (quoth he) upon a time to be lodged in the house of an old host and friends of mine within the citie of Chalcides, and as I sat with him at 20 supper, I marvelled how possible he could come by so many sorts of venison which I saw served up to the boord before me; at last mine host answered that all was but swines flesh, and the fame altered by sundry kinds of sauces and varietie of dressing: Semblably (quoth he) be you not dismayd and troubled at this great armie of king Antiochus whom you heere named, his men at armes and horsemen armed at all pieces, his light horse, his petronels and archers on horsebacke, and his footemen, for all these be no more but poore Syrians, men borne to servitude and slavery, and no better, differing one from another onely in diversitie of harnais and weapons. Philopemon was at that time capitaine generall of the Achæans, who had a number sufficient both of horse and foot, but he wanted money for their pay: whereat Quintus merrily scoffing; Philopemon (quoth he) hath hands and feet enough, but he wants a bellie; which 30 jest was indeed the more pleasant, for that Philopemons body was in truth naturally so shapen and made so flat, as if he had no belly at all.

C. DOMITIUS, he whom Scipio the great left in his place, next after his brother L. Scipio in the warre against king Antiochus; when he had viewed the armie of his enemies standing in battell-array, the Roman captaines who were about him, counselled him with all expedition to give them battell, but hee answered them thus: That they had not day enough to massacre and hew in peeces so many millions of men; to spoile also and make pillage of their tents and baggage, and then to returne when all was done into the campe for to refresh and looke to themselves; so the morrow after he charged upon them and slue fiftie thousand enemies.

P. LICINIUS, a Consull of Rome, in one battell of horsemen was vanquished by king Perseus, and lost about two thousand and eight hundred men, partly slaine, and partly taken prisoners in the field: after which victorie, Perseus sent unto the said Consull, embassadors to treat of peace and attonement; in which treatie the condition which the vanquished proposed to the Conquerour was: That he should submit himselfe wholly and his whole estate, unto the Romanes for to doe with them according to their will and discretion.

PAULUS ÆMILIUS waking fure for his second Consulship, was rejected and tooke repulse: but afterwards when it was seene that the warre against King Perseus was drawn out in length, and like to hold long, through the ignorance, sloth and idleness of those capitaines which were sent with the armie: the Romanes chose him consull for the second time; but he 50 said unto the I Con you no thank at all now, for that you have not elected me for to gratifie my selfe (because I sought for no office at this time) but in regard that your selves stand in need of a capitaine. Being returned from the common-place into his owne house, hee found a little daughter that he had named Tertia, weeping and all blubbered with teares: What is the matter (quoth he) that my pretie girle crieth and weepeth thus: with that the child: O father (quoth she) our Perseus is dead: (now a little puppet she had of that name.) In good houre be it spoken my sweet daughter (quoth he) I take it for a good offe and preface of happie fortune. When he was arrived and come into the campe, hee found much bibble-babble there, and vaunting braverie on everie hand of those souldiors, who would busily intermeddle in the affaires properly pertaining to the captaine, and in more matters than concerned them: hee willed * them to be quiet and still, not to be dealing in such things, but onely to looke well to their swords, whether they were sharpe edged and wel pointed: As for the rest (quoth he) I will provide therefore. Those that kept the night sentinels, he commanded neither to beare launce nor weare sword, to the end that knowing they had no meanes to fight, in case they should be surprised by the enemie, they should be the more vigilant and carefull to withstand sleepe. After that he had passed over the mountaines in Macedonie, and was newly entered into the campe, hee found his enemies readie ranged in battell array before him: whereupon Scipio Nasica advised him to charge out of hand: If I were (quoth he) as yong as you, I should be of the same mind that you are; but now long experience forbiddeth me to advance forward, all weary as I am, upon any journey against mine enemies, being set strongly in ordinance of battell. After he had fully defeated Perseus in making feasts to his allies & confederates, for joy of victo-rie, he said: That it belonged to one and the same skill and experience, to know how to range a terrible battell against enemies, and to set out an acceptable feast for friends. Perseus being his prisoner, made earnest sute & humble supplication unto him, that he might not be lead in his triumph: That lies (quoth he) in your owne power o Perseus: by which words he gave him good leave to make himselfe away. Among the treasures of this king, there was found an infinit masse of gold and silver, whereof he touched not one jot for his owne proper use; onely to Tubero his sonne-in-law, who had married his daughter, in honor of his vertue he gave one 20 silver boun, weighing five * lytres: where (by the way) this is to be noted, that (by report) this was the first piece of silver plate that ever came into the house of the Aemilii. Of foure children-males that he had, two of the eldest he had given away before from himselfe to be adopted into other noble families of Rome, and of the two yongest which remained behinde in his owne house and name; the one (being fouretee yeeres of age) died five daies before his triumph;

the other (twelve yeeres old) changed his life five daies after: whereat the people forrowed, and tooke it verie heavily, bewailing & pitying his desolate estate; but he himselfe went into the common place to comfort them, saying: That now from hence forth, he thought to be out of all feare and danger in the behalfe of the common-wealth, hoping that no infortunite would befall unto it: for that himselfe for them all, bare the heave load of the envie attending 30 upon so great prosperities which he had achieved for the weale publike, * in that fortune had derived and callt all despite upon his familie alone.

Cato the elder, in a solemne speech before the people of Rome, reprooving sharply their intemperance, riot and superfluous delicacies: I know full well (quoth he) that it is an hard matter to speake unto the belly which hath no eares. He said also, that he wondered how such a citie could long stand, wherein a fish was sold dearer than an ox. Also inveighing against the over-much libertie and power which generally was given to women: All other men (quoth hee) doe rule their wives, wee rule all men, and our wives rule us. It was a speech likewise of his: That hee had rather receive no favour and grace when hee had done any good service, than not be punished when he had committed a fault: I pardon moreover (quoth 40 he) all those, who upon error or ignorance have trespassed, * but I except my selfe. Furthermore, in solliciting and mooving the magistrates to chastice those who offended the lawes, he plainly said: That whosoever had rule and authoritie sufficient to repress malefactors, if they did not execute the same, were themselves the authors and commanders of evil. He delivered these words moreover: That yong men who blushed when they were reprooved, pleased him better than those that looked pale: and that he could not abide that souldier, who in his way as he walked, waggeth his hands; in fight stirreth his feet; and when he sleepeth snoreth lower than he holloweth as he encountreth his enemie. Item, that he was a bad ruler, who knew not how to rule himselfe. He was of opinion, that everie one ought to have more reverence of himselfe, than of any other person whatsoever; for no man was ever from himselfe. 50 Perceiving that many there were who made sute that their statues might be erected: I had rather (quoth he) that men should aske another daie, why there was no image set up for Cato, than why he had any. He counselled them who had power to do what they would, to spare and make much thereof, to the end that their libertie might last with them for ever. They who deprive vertue * of honour, take away vertue (quoth he) from youth. He was of advice that no man ought to entreat a magistrate or judge in good and just causes to maintaine them, nor sue unto them in bad and unright, as matters to passe by or winke at them. His saying was: That injustice

injustice and wrong doing, if it brought no perill to him that committed it, yet it was dangerous to all others. He admonished old folke not to adde unto their age the foulness of vice:
for that they had deformities enough besides. His opinion was, that anger and fury differed in nothing, but that the one endured longer than the other. He was wont to say that they were not highly envied, who knew how to use their fortune wisely and with moderation: For that (quoth he) it is not our person that is envied, but that which is about us. Also they who are carnest in ridiculous matters, make themselves laughing stocks in serious affaires. Over and besides, this was one of his sage sawes: That faire and commendable actions ought to meet with faire and laudable words to set them forth, to the end that they never be without the glory to them belonging. He reprehended the citizens of Rome, for giving alwaies their voices to one & the same person, at the elections of their magistrats: For it should seeme (quoth he) in so doing, that either you do not much esteeme the honour of magistracies, or els that in your judgment you have not men sufficient enough & worthy to beare them. He made semblant upon a time, that he had in great admiration the strength of one who sold and made away his lands that lay along by the sea-coast, as being a man more mightie and puissant than the verie sea:
For (quoth he) that which the sea undermineth, catcheth & swalloweth by little & little this good fellow hath swallowed & devoured all at once. When he stood to be chosen Censor, & saw that other of his competitors & concurrents trudged up & downe, glaving, glosing and flattering to the people for to insinuate themselves into their good favour & grace: he contrariwise went crying out: That the State & people had need of a rigorous & hard hearted physician, both to discumber & cut off some part, and also to give them a strong purgation: and therefore they were not to choose one who was most gracious, but him that was most severe; thus whiles he made these remonstrances, he was himselfe chosen before all the rest. In teaching yong men for to fight va-liantlie and with resolution, hee said: That a word often-times frighted the enemie more than the sword, the tongue also more than the hand, and caused him to take his heeles and runne away. Whiles hee warred in Spain against those who inhabit along the river Ba-tis, hee was in great danger, by reason of a great multitude of enemies who were in armes against him; neither could he be provided of aids upon a sudden, but from the Celtiberians, who for to succour him demanded two hundred talents: now the other Romane captaines would 30 not yeeld that hee should make promise unto those barbarous nations of this money for their hire and sallarie; but Cato said: They were much deceived and out of the way; for if we winne (quoth he) we shall be able to pay them, not of our owne, but of our enemies goods; if we lose the day, there will be none left either to be paid or to call for pay. Having woon more townes in Spain, than hee had bene daies there (according as he said himselfe) he reserved of all that spoile and pillage for his owne use, no more than hee did eat and drinke; but hee divided and dealt to every one of his souldiers a pound weight of silver, saying: That it were better that many should returne home out of warre with silver in their purses, than a few with golde; for that rulers and captaines ought not to grow rich themselves by their provinces and places of government in anything but in honour and glorie. In that expedition or voiage of his, hee 40 had with him in his traine five of his owne servitors; of whom, one there was who bought three prisoners taken in warre; but when he knew that his master had intelligence thereof, before that ever he came in his sight hee hung and strangled himselfe. Scipio surnamed Africanus, praised him to favour the causes of the banished and fugitive Achaeans, and to be good unto them, namely, that they might be recalled and restored againe to their owne countrey; but he made semblance as though hee tooke no great heed and regard to such affaires; and when hee saw that the matter was followed hotly in the Senate, and that there grew much speech and debate about it, he stood up and said: Here is a great stirre indeed; and as though we had nothing els to do, we sit here & spend all the long day disputing about these old gray-beard Grecks, and all forsooth, to know whether they shalbe carried forth to their buriall by our porters and corse-50 bearers heere, or by those there. Posthumius Albius wrote certaine histories in Greeke, in the Preface and Proeme whereof, hee praised the readers and hearers to pardon him, if hee had committed any folloefine or incongruities in that language; but Cato by way of a mocke, scoffed at him, and said: That hee deserved indeed to be pardoned for writing false Greeke, in case that by the * ordinance and commandement of the high commission of the Amphyctiones, who were the chiefe Estates of all Greece, hee had bene compelled against his will, to enterprise and goe in hand with the said histories.

folde, nor yet built: and it is for certaine reported, that in so great an house and substance as his might seeme to be, there was never found but three and thirtie pound weight of silver plate, and two of golde, notwithstanding the city of Great Carthage was in his hand, and he had enriched his souldiers more than ever any captaine did before him. Observing well the precept which Polybius gave, he hardly & without much ado would not returne out of the market place, before he had assailed to make in some fort one new friend and familiar or other, of those whom he met withall. Being but yet young, he was of such reputation for his valour and wisdom, that Cato the elder being demanded his opinion as touching others that were in the campe before Carthage, among whom he was one, delivered this commendation of him:
